THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
[WHICH OPENED 27 APRIL 1992]

FORTY-SECOND YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES — VOLUME 221

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SECURITY

Private Pensions

1. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the number and percentage of individuals over official retirement age in receipt of one or more occupational or private pensions as at (a) 1 January 1978 and (b) 1 January 1993; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): The number of people receiving occupational pensions increased from approximately 3 million in 1979 to 4·5 million in 1989. That represents an increase from a third to nearly one half of that age group in 10 years.

Mr. Dunn: Will the Secretary of State please confirm that pensioners' average income from occupational pensions has nearly doubled since 1979? Is not that strong evidence of the Conservative party's determination to continue to improve the living standards of those who are retired?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. We have increased the number of people receiving occupational pensions and the size of the occupational pensions that they receive. Overall, during the past decade or so in which we have been in power, we have increased the living standards of pensioners on average every year by more than they increased in the entire five years under the previous Labour Government.

Mrs. Golding: The Minister is, as ever, concerned to speak about the haves, not the have nots. How many times does he need to be asked before he much gives needed help to the pensioners who are refused additional benefits because they receive only tiny occupational pensions? When will he speak about helping them? Would it not have been better to have used the £2,600 that it cost to install a satellite television in benefit offices in Nottingham to show golden oldie films to claimants, to help those pensioners who are in such desperate need?

Mr. Lilley: My reference to the improvement in living standards of pensioners covered all categories of pensioners, not only those in receipt of an occupational pension, welcome though it is that now; among those reaching retirement, two thirds have occupational pensions. However, in addition, we have increased provision for the least well-off pensioners as I was able to confirm in the uprating statement last autumn. I confirmed that an extra £½ billion was to be channelled to pensioners through the pensioners' premium on income support, which was additional to the increase to compensate for inflation.

The hon. Lady may not want appropriate facilities in our benefit offices, but I believe that they should be good and appropriate to the needs of claimants.

Mr. Jenkin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the worst possible pensions policy, which seems to be advoated or toyed with by the Labour party's social justice commission, would be to means-test the state pension while at the same time do nothing to encourage—or perhaps even discouraging—the alternative methods of private pensions provision?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is correct. There is an extraordinary new twist to the Labour party's policy. In the past, it undermined pensions by allowing inflation to be rampant and now it appears that it is to consider means-testing pensions while, at the same time, discouraging private provision. One wonders whether it wants to help pensioners or to harm them.

Water and Sewerage Charges

3. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to increase that proportion of income support paid to contribute towards water and sewerage charges.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): Water and sewerage charges are treated similarly to electricity and gas in that there is no separate identifiable proportion of income support.

Mr. Madden: Is it not about time that there was a specific, and substantial, amount? Is not the Minister worried that water disconnections are now running at the rate of 400 a week nationally, 50 a week in Yorkshire and 40 a week in the Minister's area? Is he not aware that, as water charges rocket, a large number of people on income support are having deductions made from their benefit to pay those charges? Is it not time for a ban on water disconnections in homes and an end to compulsory water metering?

Mr. Burt: In fact, the number of deductions made is about 3 per cent. of the total income support load, which shows that the vast majority of people are able to manage water charges. Water charges are analogous to electricity and gas charges rather than to anything else. It is up to the water companies to make provision for low-income customers. Over the years, the electricity and gas companies have developed a variety of methods—often frequent payment methods—to help those on low incomes who might otherwise get into difficulties. The best way to prevent disconnections is for the water companies to follow that lead.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is not the important point the overall amount available to low-income families? Is not it a fact that income support for low-income families has gone well ahead of inflation in recent years?

Mr. Burt: Yes. The changes to income support made in the late 1980s enabled extra money to be channelled to low-income families. An extra £1 billion will have been spent by the end of the current year. The income support system, by providing premiums for disability and for families, tries to ensure that those who use more of a particular commodity, such as water, receive more money.

Mr. Kirkwood: The improvements made by the Government are welcome, as far as they go. However, does the Minister accept that water charges in the year to January 1993 went up by 10 per cent. compared with a 1·7 per cent. increase in the retail prices index? That position is set to worsen in the next 10 to 15 years as water authorities and local authorities in Scotland plan future capital investment in the water industry. Will the Minister at least consider the possibility of a formula or mechanism to take account of the drastic increases so that people who can hardly afford to buy food can at least afford water?

Mr. Burt: I am not sure that I can help the hon. Gentleman. As he knows, income support is not based on specific amounts for particular goods, simply because people on low incomes want the opportunity that everyone else has to spend what they want on different commodities. A change to that system would be a massive administrative change and I am not convinced that it would work to the benefit of low-income families. The national proportion of deductions for water charges remains at about 3 per cent. which suggests that the majority can manage.

The difficulties that the hon. Gentleman mentioned with the increasing investment in water must be covered by the water companies and by their charging policies. The electricity and gas companies do that far better than the water companies. The Office of Water Services has recommended that all water companies should provide at least one frequent payment method. That would go some way towards alleviating the concern, which I share, expressed by the hon. Gentleman and others about disconnections.

Mr. John Marshall: Can my hon. Friend confirm that those on income support can look forward to an increase in their living standards in April because income support rates will rise by more than the rate of inflation? Can he also confirm that the introduction of the council tax will benefit those who are on community charge benefit and in receipt of income support?

Mr. Burt: Yes. The amount that was previously in income support to cover the 20 per cent. payment of community charge has not been clawed back. It will provide £750 million for low-income families—[Interruption.] Opposition Members may scoff; it shows what they think about amounts such as £750 million. Once again, large amounts are like water to them.

Mr. Spearing: In so far as there is support for the rapidly rising water charges, is not the Minister aware that those charges cover potential losses incurred by the water companies in any business in virtually any part of the world? Will he look into the matter and will he confirm, or otherwise, that those charges and public money will defray the possible losses incurred by the companies virtually anywhere?

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman is straying somewhat from my responsibilities. As I said, responsibility for water charges rests with the water companies. There are different ways in which the companies can help low-income customers.

Unemployment

4. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of his Department's budget in 1992-93 can be accounted for by unemployment.

5. Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total amount spent in the course of a year on benefits for those who have been unemployed for more than 12 months.

Mr. Burt: The estimated cost of unemployment benefit, housing benefit and social fund payments to unemployed people represents some 12 per cent. of my Department's budget. It is not possible to provide separate figures for benefit expenditure in respect of people who have been unemployed for more than 12 months.

Mr. Bayley: Does the Minister accept that that amounts to billions and billions of pounds a year, and that that goes a long way to explain why the proportion of national wealth taken in taxation by the Conservative Government now is higher than the proportion taken by the Labour Government in 1979? Will he guarantee that the Government will try to cut that sum—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—by reducing the number of unemployed and not by cutting the scope or value of benefits for the unemployed?

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman almost dug a trap for himself but tried to extricate himself from it. The Government share the view of everyone that the best way to deal with unemployment benefit costs is to reduce the number of unemployed. The Government intend to provide practical help for those who are unemployed and we are, indeed, providing more practical help and advice than ever before for those who are looking for work.

It should also be recognised that the employment market is never static. In January, there were 180,000 vacancies in jobcentres—the highest figure for two years—and the Department of Employment and the Employment Service are constantly working to put people back into work. Last year they placed 1·3 million people and this year they hope to place 1·5 million people. I persist in saying that the best way to ensure that more people are employed is to ensure that interest rates and inflation are low. Those are precisely the policies which the Government are pursuing, and we shall see more jobs as a result.

Mr. Wicks: Does the Minister agree that his answers—and I am being generous—further illustrate the substantial impact that mass unemployment is making on his Department's budget and priorities and the fact that it is distorting the way in which we meet need? Does he agree that that is further evidence that Britain cannot afford unemployment, and that what the unemployed need is not income support but jobs—not workfare but fair work?

Mr. Burt: I do not disagree with the sentiment behind the hon. Gentleman's question; I am happy to agree with it. Despite the recession, Britain has the highest percentage of people in work of any country in the European Community apart from Luxembourg and Denmark. Vacancies at jobcentres are at a two-year high and confidence among the business community has increased. The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues may have a vested interest in reducing confidence, but he should remember that he does not speak for the nation. We are determined to come through a very deep world recession with confidence, and to emerge from it with jobs, industry, dignity and success.

Mr. Evennett: Can my hon. Friend confirm that,, since the Government came to office in 1979, social security expenditure has increased by two thirds in real terms? Will he reaffirm the Conservative party's, and the Government's, belief in channelling benefits to those in the greatest need and confirm that we will continue to do that until we ensure that everyone has a decent standard of living?

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend is quite correct. The Government place the highest priority on ensuring that benefits go to those most in need, while making sure that the economy works so that there are fewer unemployed in future. What the unemployed need, more than benefit, is jobs.

Mr. Congdon: Will my hon. Friend confirm that now that base rates are down to 6 per cent., they are the lowest in Europe and that that provides the best basis for future growth and hence a reduction in unemployment?

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend is quite right. Such statistics provide the basis for jobs in the future to which I referred.

Mr. Dewar: But will the Minister confirm that the 12 per cent. of his budget that goes on unemployment amounts to the frightening figure of £10·4 billion in the coming year? Is not that a condemnation of the destructive policies that the Government are following? If the Minister recognises that the real cure is to reduce the number in the dole queues, does not he have a duty to back policies designed to achieve that end, rather than holding to the rather primitive view of the Secretary of State that Governments should do nothing? Specifically, does he agree with his colleagues in the Department of Employment that the principle of workfare must be rejected because it would lead to "a low wage, low productivity economy"?

Mr. Burt: The Government have no intention of introducing a workfare model in the manner described by the hon. Gentleman. The Government have been providing as much practical help for the unemployed as possible and the Department of Employment is doing just that. At the start of the hon. Gentleman's comments, he persisted in trying to suggest that unemployment and the recession are purely British phenomena. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman spends some of his spare time visiting his socialist friends in France who will very shortly be spending rather more time with their families because they are about to be thrown out of office. The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues do not have the distinction of being thrown out of office—simply because they were too awful to gain office in the first place.

Pensioners

7. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what extra help has been directed to lower income pensioners in the last three years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): Poorer pensioners received extra help worth £70 million in April 1991, £60 million in April 1992, £315 million in October 1992 and they will gain a further £260 million this year because although income support recipients will no longer have to pay local taxes, their benefit will not be reduced.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that pensioners' average income from savings has more than doubled since 1979 while between 1974 and 1979 pensioners' average income from savings in real terms fell by 16 per cent? Does my hon. Friend agree that that is powerful evidence of the poverty that socialism brings for those on fixed incomes in comparison with the success of Conservative policies?

Miss Widdecombe: Indeed. My hon. Friend put it extremely well.

Mr. Olner: The Minister could not have put it better herself.

Miss Widdecombe: I could hardly have put it better, but I will now supplement my hon. Friend's comments by saying that inflation is the single biggest evil facing pensioners in their endeavours to save for their od age. The Labour Government managed so successfully to wipe out pensioners' savings in the inflation years of the 1970s that the net result was that many of the older pensioners who can no longer rely on their savings have had instead to be rescued by our package of help for poorer pensioners. We have much to be proud of and Opposition Members should hang their heads in shame.

Mr. Winnick: If anyone should hang their heads in shame Government Ministers should. Do they not realise that millions of pensioners, especially pensioners who rely on the state pension and supplementary benefit or who perhaps have a small occupational pension, are in a desperate state because of low incomes? Why do so many pensioners ask Members of Parliament—they have certainly asked me this and I am sure that they have asked Conservative Members the same question—who won the last war? They ask that when they compare their plight with that of people in other European countries like Germany.

Miss Widdecombe: What they do know is that the pensioners won the last election. Our policies are such that pensioners are very much better off than they would have been if we had had a resurgence of Labour's policies which is all that Labour promised at the last election. As for pensioners having to rely on the state pension, very few people in this country have to manage on the state pension alone. It should not be forgotten that those who receive income support to supplement their state pensions can have 100 per cent. of their rent paid; 100 per cent. of their council tax paid and, in many cases, they can double the value of their state pensions.

Mr. Ward: Does my hon. Friend agree that on average, pensioners' income increased by 30 per cent. between 1979 and 1993? My hon. Friend might like to contrast that with what happened under the Labour Government. Is it not important to continue to ensure that any funds available from the taxpayer go to those in greatest need rather than to increases across the board?

Miss Widdecombe: Yes, indeed. That is why our support plan for pensioners in the greatest need is worth about £1 billion a year. It is quite true that pensioners' incomes from all sources have risen by 30 per cent. since the Government have been in power. That is because, among other things, of our policy of encouraging occupational pensions, which was so deeply scorned by the Opposition, and of creating personal pensions. The Opposition fought against the incentives that enabled people to take up those pensions.

The Government are wholly committed to the pensioner and to pensioners' incomes. We are not blinkered in believing that the only source of income is the state pension. [HON. MEMBERS: "Boring."] As Opposition Members are shouting, "Boring", they obviously find the problems of pensioners boring because they do nothing about them.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister confirm that the pension is now equivalent to about 15 per cent. of the average weekly wage and that it has fallen dramatically in the past 14 years? Widows of retired miners in my constituency get £10 or £11 from British Coal, as a result of which they are disqualified from many of the benefits that the Minister mentioned. Pensioners in many other countries throughout the world, including some in the so-called Common Market countries, receive pensions that equate to 50 or 60 per cent. of average weekly earnings. Those retired miners' widows get nowhere near that, and if they surrender their coal allowance and take money for gas in lieu they lose every penny of housing benefit that they receive.

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was most unwise to mention other countries in the Common Market, because we do better by pensioners on half average earnings than do most of our European neighbours. The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong, because in, for example, Germany and France there is no basic pension. The pensions that he mentioned are for higher earners and are earnings related, whereas Britain has a flat basic-rate pension available to all who have paid national insurance contributions. The value of the state pension has been more than maintained since 1979, and those whose entitlement to coal takes them slightly above the income support level can still, in certain circumstances, get help with other income-related benefits.

Family Credit

8. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current size of the family credit caseload.

Mr. Lilley: At the end of October 1992, there were 450,000 families receiving family credit.

Mr. Lidington: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that his Department expects to spend more than £850 million on family credit in the forthcoming financial year? Does he agree that that is a sensible way of channelling Government resources to ensure that people are better off in work than out of it and are not caught in a poverty trap when they take on employment?

Mr. Lilley: I confirm my hon. Friend's point. We expect to spend £864 million in 1992-93—13 times the real value of expenditure on family income supplement, which this benefit replaced. It does an excellent job in enabling people to return to work without loss of income.

Mr. Rooney: Does the Secretary of State accept that, in many ways, family credit is a taxpayers' subsidy to the bad employer, and does he recognise the poverty trap in which people on family credit find themselves, with a claw-back rate of 93 per cent?

Mr. Lilley: I do not accept that, because pay levels are set according to a range of people who are in and are seeking employment, not just those with families. It is not surprising that the Opposition try to snipe at this benefit because it was introduced by this Government. The Labour party has never done anything to deal with the problem and it should turn its mind constructively to doing so, not destructively.

Mrs. Angela Knight: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the number of hours that have to be worked to be eligible for the benefit have recently been reduced from 24 a week to 16? Is not the impact of this change that more families will be eligible and helped by the benefit?

Mr. Lilley: Yes, my hon. Friend points to an important development. As a result of this change in the hours rule, 60,000 extra families are already in receipt of this benefit and it is open to a wider number of people. I am sure that improvement in benefit will be widely welcomed by Conservative Members, even though Opposition Members do not seem to welcome it.

Mr. Bradley: Does the Secretary of State acknowledge that a large proportion of the increase in family credit claimants is due to the change in the definition for income support of full-time work? Is he aware that many people who would have been entitled to income support from April 1992 onwards are now worse off because they cannot get help with their mortgage costs? Will he give an estimate of the number of people who have lost their entitlement to help with their mortgage interest charges as a result of the change in the hours rule, and will he urgently consider helping people on low incomes with their mortgage costs to ensure that no one is disadvantaged from taking up a job because they cannot afford to do so following the change in the hours rule?

Mr. Lilley: The number of people on this benefit has increased by 100,000 over the past year. As I said, about 60,000 of that is due to the improvement of the hours rule in respect of eligibility for the benefit.

I shall look into the hon. Gentleman's question to see whether I can give him figures for the impact on income support and I shall write to him.

Pensioners (Telephones)

9. Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioner households had a telephone in 1979 and in 1990.

Miss Widdecombe: Only half all pensioner households had a telephone in 1979. This had risen to 87 per cent. in 1990 and 89 per cent. in 1991. This of course reflects the general improvement in pensioners' living standards since we took office in 1979.

Mrs. Roe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Will she confirm that there has been not only an enormous increase in telephone ownership among pensioners, but a vast increase in the number of pensioner households with central heating? Does she agree that that is striking evidence of how the Government's economic policies have enormously benefited millions of pensioners?

Miss Widdecombe: Yes, indeed, I am pleased to confirm that, whereas in 1979, when we got rid of the Opposition, about 43 per cent. of pensioners had central heating, today 76 per cent.—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. This has been remiss of me. The question relates to telephones and I should be glad if questioners and those who answer would relate their remarks directly to the question on the Order Paper.

Miss Widdecombe: I am sorry, Madam Speaker, if I am out of order. A telephone is a consumable durable, as is central heating——

Madam Speaker: Order. In my book, there are two lines to this question, which asks

"how many pensioner households had a telephone in 1979 and in 1990."

That is the question to answer.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: Given the Minister's reply, will she acknowledge that any suggestion tomorrow that VAT should be added to the cost of public utilities, such as telephone charges and other public utility charges, would have an extremely detrimental effect on pensioners' living standards?

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Lady does not seem to understand what VAT is already charged on.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my hon. Friend aware that many pensioners in Bolton are using their telephones to ring the hotline run by Bolton hospital to seek counselling and advice on the problem of the doctor who had AIDS? Will she ask the Department of Health to give the hotline a little more information——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now trying my patience. The question relates to the number of telephones. It has nothing to do with passing on information to Health Ministers. Does the hon. Gentleman have a direct question related to the question on the Order Paper? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Leave it to me.

Young People (Benefits)

10. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people between the ages of 16 and 21 years are in receipt of benefits.

Mr. Lilley: It is not possible to give a single figure since some young people receive more than one benefit. But in 1991 there were 490,000 claiming income support, 143,000 claiming either housing benefit or community charge benefit, 49,000 claiming unemployment benefit, 34,200 on severe disablement allowance and 9,200 receiving family credit, plus small numbers on other benefits.

Miss Lestor: When does the Minister intend to do something about what amounts to a penalty on education and training for the large number of young people who are trying to continue in some form of education? They cannot find a job, yet they are penalised because they cannot get benefits. I remind him of the case in my constituency—I am sure that it has been repeated all over the country—of two young men serving apprenticeships who, when their firm went bust, tried to continue a college course to gain qualifications over a period of a year or two. They were denied benefits and thus became a burden on their families. Surely that is a penalty on education and training.

Mr. Lilley: As the hon. Lady knows, there is an allowance for those aged 16 to 17 on training schemes, but benefit has never been paid to those in school or further education. If there is a choice between spending money on maintenance or on increasing and improving education, we have opted for the latter. I am pleased to say that the number of people staying on at school and going on to further and higher education has increased enormously. If the hon. Lady thinks that there is a penalty, happily the vast majority of people are ignoring it and recognising the benefits of education, which is the important thing to get across.

Mr. Willetts: Does my right hon. Friend accept that since 1979 the number of people in the 16 to 21-year-old age group going into higher education has more than doubled and that there has been an enormous expansion in the number of training places? Was not the story of the 1980s a significant extension of public responsibility for people in that age group?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend puts it clearly and that is the case. On training alone, nearly 300,000 people are on youth training courses provided by the Government, compared with only 7,000 in 1978 when the Labour Government were in power.

Mr. Frank Field: As the Government's cuts in benefits for young people have directly resulted in large numbers of them sleeping rough on the streets, what are the Government going to do about it?

Mr. Lilley: I do not accept the premise of the hon. Gentleman's question. Far from cutting expenditure on that age group, we have substantially increased it through our increased spending on youth training. It was right to move away from a system in which people automatically had access to income support on leaving school and to replace it with the opportunity to stay on at school or to go to further or higher education or on a youth training course. The important thing is to activate and implement the guarantee. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has seen to it that every training and enterprise council has the money to implement that guarantee and see is vigorously ensuring that they do so. If young people do not have a place on a guaranteed training scheme, income support is available, even though they are aged only 16 or 17.

Mr. Brazier: Does my right hon. Friend agree that millions of taxpayers think that it is absolutely right that 16 and 17-year-olds who are not at school or in a job should be required to do youth training if they want to get assistance from the state? It is right that benefits are available only in the most exceptional circumstances to people in that age group.

Mr. Lilley: I am sure that that is the widely held view of the majority of people, especially of parents and young people, who want to make productive use of their lives rather than go straight on to benefit. I believe that 7,000 people are having to wait more than eight weeks for a place on a youth training scheme and that 3,000 have been offered a place, but it was not satisfactory.

Disability Allowances

11. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost of advertising the disability living allowance and disability working allowance in 1991-92; and what is his estimate of the total expenditure on such advertising for 1992-93.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The answer is £6·4 million and £1·9 million respectively.

Mr. Flynn: Was the £2·5 million spent at this time last year on advertising those benefits an act of incompetence or something worse, as 94 per cent. of applicants for disability working allowance did not qualify because they were cruelly misled by Government advertising, which was targeted on winning the election for the Tories? Will the Government repay that £2·5 million in taxpayers' money and tell us where the £17 million donated anonymously to the Tory party's election chest by foreign millionaires came from? The Italians have confessed that their electoral——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying a long way from the question. He was perfectly in order at the beginning.

Mr. Scott: Our advertising for disability living allowance, which formed part of the hon. Gentleman's question, was spectacularly successful in attracting claimants for that allowance and has resulted in more than 400,000 awards in the intervening period. I, too, am disappointed in the take-up of disability working allowance, but it is a new concept and many people confused the two allowances and claimed for the wrong one. I am anxious to ensure that as many people as possible can take advantage of disability working allowance, which, for the first time and almost uniquely in the world, will provide disabled people who wish to work and who are able to do so with the option of having their earnings topped up by a Government benefit.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Can my right hon. Friend quantify the total increase in expenditure on the disabled since 1979?

Mr. Scott: In broad terms and in real terms, expenditure has trebled since the Labour Government left office and we assumed responsibility for such matters.

Ms Eagle: If the disability working allowance is such a success, how many people are receiving it?

Mr. Scott: Perhaps the hon. Lady was rehearsing her supplementary question rather than listening to what I said. I said that I was disappointed with the take-up of disability working allowance and was anxious to see— [HON. MEMBERS: "How many?"] About 2,500 people receive disability working allowance and I am anxious that that is increased as quickly as possible. A little bit of help, instead of those sort of remarks from Opposition Members, would help us to spread knowledge of this benefit. They could help in that way.

Pensioners

12. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total value of extra help which has been directed to less well-off pensioners since 1989.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that, by April, the total extra help given to pensioners on income-related benefits since October 1989 will be worth around £1 billion a year.

Mr. Harris: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and congratulate her on it. However, does she accept that difficulties arise increasingly among people who are just above the general benefit level? For example, someone in my constituency wrote to me only last week to say that he was facing a bill of £500 from South West Water, on an income of just under £6,000. Can anything be done to help such people, who qualify for no benefit at all?

Miss Widdecombe: Those who do not qualify for income support can qualify for housing benefit or council tax benefit and to be eliminated from receiving those, people must have savings of £16,000 a year or an income that is substantially above the income support rate.

Although we always have those limits under review and although we have raised them each year and more than in line with inflation recently, as has been pointed out, we believe that the system strikes a fair balance between those who have resources and savings and those who do not.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Investment Policy

30. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what discussions they have had with their counterparts in the Roman Catholic Church on investment policy.

Mr. Michael Alison (Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing the Church Commissioners): Although the Commissioners have no exactly comparable counterpart in the Roman Catholic Church, they discuss a wide range of investment issues with representatives from other denominations, including the Roman Catholics, at regular Church investors' meetings.

Mr. Banks: I am delighted to hear it. May I suggest that next time that the Church Commissioners meet representatives of the Roman Catholic Church, they discuss investment possibilities in child care facilities in Bosnia, in view of the grotesque advice offered by the Pope to Bosnian women who have been raped by sub-human Serbian scum that they should have the babies? If the Pope has no better advice to offer women who have been subjected to rape, I suggest that he stays inside the Vatican and contemplates the evils being perpetrated on women in this world.

Mr. Alison: As a fellow Church Commissioner, Madam Speaker, no doubt you appreciate the significance of the church-state link, as demonstrated by the hon. Gentleman, but I am afraid that his observations lie somewhat outside the scope of the Church Commissioners, whose finances are regulated and controlled by statute and have to be directed according to certain specific conditions. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that a large number of lay people in all the Churches dip into their pockets privately to contribute towards the relief of the Bosnian crisis.

Archbishop of York (Palace)

31. Mr. Bates: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what are the annual running costs of the Archbishop of York's palace at Bishopsthorpe; what the accommodation comprises; and what is its latest valuation.

Mr. Alison: In 1992, maintenance costs at Bishopsthorpe were £20,600. The accommodation includes domestic living quarters, state rooms—hall and drawing room—a chapel and offices. The value of such a piece of our historic heritage is incalculable. The Commissioners have it insured for £4·6 million.

Mr. Bates: I am grateful for that answer. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it may be of some considerable interest to my constituents who heard His Grace the Archbishop recently on BBC television taking the Government to task for the measures that they were taking for alleviating poverty and homelessness? Given that the Church Commissioners administer a portfolio of equities to the value of £0·8 billion and a property portfolio worth £1·2 billion, may not the message from my constituents to their Archbishop in future be that Archbishops in expensive glass palaces should not throw stones?

Mr. Alison: My hon. Friend criticises the attacks made by the Archbishop of York, from his palace, on the Government. If the Commissioners or the Government were to make the Archbishop homeless, I fear that his attacks would be likely to be exacerbated and not moderated.

Mr. Frank Field: When is the report of the inquiry into the Commissioners' assets expected and will it be published?

Mr. Alison: It will be published. I cannot give the exact date when it will be available.

Marriages (Fees)

32. Mr. Madden: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what assessment the Church Commissioners have made of the level of clergy income from fees for performing marriages.

Mr. Alison: In the year to 31 March 1992, church and churchyard fees received by clergy totalled about £5 million, but no central records are held of the amount specifically attributable to marriage services.

Mr. Madden: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that reply. Does he accept that any cleric who was dependent on fees from marriages performed in the Chapel would have an extremely lean time? Will he do what he can, with the Church Commissioners and perhaps the Archbishop of Canterbury, to have discussions with the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Lord Chancellor and Madam Speaker to see whether the Chapel can be registered for marriages so that a wider range of marriages than hitherto could be conducted in the Crypt?

Mr. Alison: I shall make representations——

Madam Speaker: Order.

Ordination of Women

33. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what is the estimated financial effect on the Church Commissioners of the introduction of women priests.

Mr. Alison: Any direct additional stipends' costs will be met by dioceses rather than the Commissioners. However, the cost of financial provision for those who leave on conscience grounds will be a statutory charge upon the Commissioners' general fund and will reduce the amount available for other purposes. The gross cost per 100 men is estimated to total £4·6 million of income spread over a period of up to 20 years.

Mr. Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend accept that while we are pleased to serve under the first woman Speaker, we are looking forward to women priests and the first woman bishop in the Church of England and many of us would regard the sum to which my hon. Friend referred as a price worth paying to get women as fully fledged priests and bishops?

Mr. Alison: I voted in the General Synod for the ordination of women measure and I shall be responsible for piloting the measure through the House. I echo the views expressed by my hon. Friend. I hope that he will be prepared to stay up late and, if necessary, vote on the issue when the measure is debated on the Floor of the House.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Commercial Court

39. Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps he is taking to reduce delays in the commercial court.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. John M. Taylor): Plans to appoint 10 additional High Court judges were announced recently, together with plans to establish management information systems to enable long-term decisions on the size of the judiciary to be based on proper management information about workload and throughput and on consideration of other ways of handling the load.

The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice have agreed that some of the additional judge power will be available to address any continuing problems in the commercial court.

Mr. Ottaway: May I congratulate my hon. Friend on his response to the matter, which I first raised in my recent Adjournment debate? Will he accept the congratulations of the business community, which has been most concerned about delays in the commercial court? Does he agree that a further way of taking pressure off the judicial system would be to give some support to an alternative disputes resolution service, which, again, would be warmly welcomed by the business community?

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his gracious remarks. The Lord Chancellor welcomes initiatives in alternative disputes resolution services in the widest sense. I have no doubt that some of my hon. Friend's professional connections will have helpful contributions to make, based on their considerable experience.

Courts (Dress)

40. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on standards of dress in courts of justice.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice issued a consultation paper on court dress last summer, inviting the views of the public, the judiciary and the professions. The period for submission of responses ended on 31 December 1992 and an analysis of them is now under way. It is hoped that the outcome of the analysis will be available next month.

Mr. Martin: May I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. As for the wearing of wigs, I would not wish to suggest to my hon. Friend in particular that lack of hair on the head implies any less competence or wisdom. Will he confirm that he will not give any undue encouragement to those who wish to prevent barristers, both male and female, from wearing wigs in courts where it is now customary to do so?

Mr. Taylor: I think that my hon. Friend seeks to imply that I am bald, which is fine and also true. However, had he even hinted that I was follicly challenged, I would have had something to say about it. I am not disposed to tell others not to wear wigs, but I certainly will not be wearing one myself.

Mr. Enright: Is the Parliamentary Secretary aware that the wearing of hats even funnier than those worn in the House and the putting on of what appear to be nighties outrages the sensibilities of many people in Yorkshire?

Mr. Taylor: I did not know that this was a specifically Yorkshire question, but I defer to the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of Yorkshire. No doubt he speaks heartily for all his constituents.

Women Judges

41. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps he is taking to increase the number of women judges.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor's policy is to appoint to judicial office those best qualified, regardless of gender, ethnic origin, political affiliation or religion. Without prejudice to that overriding principle, the Lord Chancellor has repeatedly stressed that he would like to see more suitably qualified female legal practitioners appointed to the judiciary.

Mrs. Gorman: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the massive imbalance between men and women judges. Of about 1,000 judges in Britain, only 61 are women. There is not a single woman out of 10 Lords of Appeal; only two women out of 13 judges in the family division; and only 24 women out of 463 circuit judges.

Does my hon. Friend agree that, as women are very good when put on the bench as magistrates, it is time to reconsider the criteria for appointing judges? Is not it terribly important, as so many elderly gentlemen judges hand out wholly inadequate sentences in cases of abuse of women, especially rape—judgments which I think would be different if the judge were a woman?

Mr. Taylor: I sympathise with a great deal of what my hon. Friend has said——

Mr. Corbyn: What is the Parliamentary Secretary going to do about it?

Mr. Taylor: As I have said previously, the Lord Chancellor can appoint only from the recruiting ground, by age and experience——

Mr. Corbyn: Change the recruiting ground.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Taylor: The recruiting ground is, to a degree, self selecting because it is necessary for members of the professions to offer themselves for part-time judicial office. [Interruption.] Quite clearly, the mood of the House is not sympathetic to my answer.

Hon. Members might be more sympathetic if I point out that the number of women joining the professions has increased greatly during recent times. Therefore, when they have a little more experience and are of a suitable age for judicial appointment, a great number of them will be available for appointment. The House should be aware that that is already beginning to show through. At the lower rungs of the ladder, women assistant recorders represent 12 per cent. of the judicial community and, among assistant recorders in training, 14 per cent. are women. I am quite prepared to admit that there should be more, but the trend is in the right direction.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Parliamentary Secretary aware that as the average woman has had to deal with male children and a male husband, she is perfectly capable of judging the behaviour of even the strangest of people who come before her? Will the hon. Gentleman be more positive in his efforts? Frankly, although we are delighted by the number of women now entering the profession, to wait another 30 years for the millenium would be simply to repeat the position in the House, where all the men tell us that if we wait long enough, something will happen.

Mr. Taylor: I am asked to say what, perhaps, has already taken place. The Lord Chancellor has operated age limits flexibly in respect of women candidates. He has asked that women be included wherever possible in the list of those under consideration for appointment. Specific reviews of female candidates are carried out from time to time. The Lord Chancellor has co-operated with the bar in research into sex equality at the bar and in the judiciary and he is considering the findings of that research.

In 1992, two more women were appointed to the High Court Bench and both assigned to the Queen's Bench division—the first women to be so assigned.

Lay Magistrates

43. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will give the figures for the number of lay magistrates in office in England and Wales in 1992.

Mr. John M. Taylor: At 31 December 1992 the number of active justices in office in England and Wales, including those within the area of responsibility of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, was 29,686. This compares with 29,441 for the previous year and 27,926 at the end of 1987. In short, the number of magistrates is going up.

Mr. Hawkins: My hon. Friend will be aware that considerable concern has been expressed publicly among the magistracy about the effects of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. What is his response?

Mr. Taylor: I am endeavouring to travel widely throughout the country to talk to magistrates, not least about the White Paper, "A New Framework for Local Justice". They tell me of their concerns, which I pass on to the Government. I remind my hon. Friend that questions of changing criminal law are for the Home Office.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Minister give consideration to the low numbers of black and women lay magistrates appointed? Will he also examine carefully the problem that too many magistrates do not in any way reflect the communities over which they are asked to make judgments?

Mr. Taylor: The number of women magistrates is rising and is now 46 per cent. of all magistrates. The number of ethnic minority representatives varies between 4 and 5·4 per cent., which reflects their numbers in our society generally. As to the policial orientation of magistrates, I remind the hon. Gentleman and the House that they are drawn from among those who apply. One cannot appoint people who do not apply.

Mr. Boateng: We know that lay magistrates and their clerks spend time informing the Minister and the Lord Chancellor of their concerns in relation to the administration of justice. Will the Minister and the Lord Chancellor show some indication that they are listening? Lay magistrates throughout the country are sick and tired of receiving diktats from the Lord Chancellor's Department which show it to be much more informed and influenced by market policy and the Government's obsession with their own ideology than it is with the interests of justice.

Mr. Taylor: That criticism lies unfairly on the head of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, who has been an exceptional supporter and proponent of the lay magistracy. He supports it on all occasions and I seek to do the same. I do not know a man to whom applying the word "diktat" would be less appropriate than my noble and learned Friend.

Female Magistrates

44. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what efforts his Department are making to obtain the appointment of more female magistrates.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor, through his advisory committees, seeks to achieve a balance in the appointment of men and women. At 31 December 1992, 46 per cent. of magistrates were women, compared with 43 per cent. at the end of 1987 and 34 per cent. at the end of 1970. The Lord Chancellor also aims to achieve equality of sittings and he is very near achieving that. The percentage of women on the bench is rising consistently.

Mr. Jones: Is not it true that many working women find it hard to get time off and that many employers are paring back to the point where females who could serve as magistrates cannot entertain the prospect? In many homes in which the male partner is unemployed, the female partner must go out to work. That is certainly the case in Wales. Many people feel that the junior Minister should do more to emphasise the need for female magis trates—and that if he did, he would have far better courts with which to work.

Mr. Taylor: I am glad to hear the hon. Gentleman challenge me in his customary friendly way. My next magistrates visit will be to Cardiff and I shall bear the hon. Gentleman's remarks very much in mind when I am there.

Mr. Burns: Does my hon. Friend agree that although more female magistrates and judges would be welcome, provided that they are appointed on merit, he should not be tempted positively to discriminate in favour of women if that is done simply for the sake of appointing more women, when they might not be as well qualified as men? That would be dangerous for the cause of women and for the judiciary.

Mr. Taylor: I understand my hon. Friend's warning.

Land Registry Offices (Staff)

45. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement of staffing levels at Land Registry offices; and what increase in work he expects in the medium term.

Mr. John M. Taylor: A contracting workload has meant that, since 1989, staffing levels have been reduced by over 2,300 posts, but the registry retains the capacity to respond to recovery in the property market. The registry is planning for a workload increase of 20 per cent. between 1993 and 1998.

Mr. Bruce: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. I wonder whether he will be able to fit into his busy schedule a visit to Weymouth Land Registry office, where I am sure that he will have a warm welcome from the very efficient staff there. I know that they are very keen to see the Chancellor's Budget tomorrow, which I am sure will increase the number of houses being bought and therefore registered and hence the number of jobs in Weymouth in my constituency.

Mr. Taylor: I am pleased to accept my hon. Friend's invitation. It is my intention to go to Weymouth to see the Land Registry and I hope that for some part of that visit my hon. Friend will be able to join me.

Hong Kong

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement about political development in Hong Kong.

There is widespread support in the House and elsewhere for the proposals put forward by the Governor last October. We sought to respond to the wish of the Hong Kong people for a greater say in their own affairs while staying within the terms of the Sino-British joint declaration, the Basic Law and other relevant exchanges with the Chinese side.

The Governor's proposals represent our judgment of the right way forward for Hong Kong, but we have said from the start that we are open to alternative ideas, from the people of Hong Kong or from the Chinese side. We have had a wide range of suggestions from people in Hong Kong. The Chinese side have opposed the proposals without offering anything in their place. Since last October, we and the Governor have been urging the Chinese side to discuss these electoral issues with us in order to reach an understanding. We are ready to enter such discussions without preconditions. We want to see as much continuity as possible in Hong Kong's electoral arrangements before and after 1997.

Some two months ago, we renewed our efforts to get talks under way with China, and since then there have been intensive diplomatic contacts in Peking. It may be useful for the House if I set out briefly the basis on which we were prepared to hold discussions.

First, we accepted that the talks should be on the basis of the joint declaration—which I have mentioned—the principle of convergence with the Basic Law and the relevant understandings and agreements reached between Britain and China. The Governor's proposals are wholly compatible with those.

Second, as I made plain to the House on 10 March, we told the Chinese side that the British team in these discussions would include representatives of the Hong Kong Government on the same basis as other officials taking part in the talks. Hong Kong officials have joined over the past 10 years in discussions with the Chinese side as members of the British team, including during the negotiations on the joint declaration and later as members of the Joint Liaison Group. We cannot and do not accept what some Chinese officials have said in the past few days —that the role of people from Hong Kong in discussions about Hong Kong's future should be downgraded.

We received a positive response on the principle of talks from the Chinese side in early February. To help get the talks started, we and the Governor therefore decided, with the advice of the Executive Council in Hong Kong, to postpone the original plan to publish the draft electoral legislation in Hong Kong's Official Gazette on 12 February. As the diplomatic contacts proceeded, we held up publication for four further weeks; but we told the Chinese that it was not possible to delay indefinitely, given the need to pass legislation before the Legislative Council rose for its summer recess in July.

It is disappointing that, despite all those efforts, the Chinese side were still not able to agree by 12 March to a date for talks—or even to a date on which an announcement of talks could be made. As we had forewarned them, the Governor therefore published his proposals on that day, 12 March. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Publication in the Official Gazette is only the first step in the legislative process. Introduction of the Bill into the Legislative Council would be a separate step. As the Governor has said, we will have to judge, in the light of developments, when to take that step. Thereafter, I am sure that Members of the Legislative Council would want to discuss the draft legislation in great detail, in the light of the various alternatives put forward, before they reached a decision.

Publication of the legislation therefore should not make it more difficult to begin talks with China. The Bill sets out the Governor's proposals, which have been public since October, in legislative form. This does not affect the basis for talks with China, the need for such talks, or our wish to hold them. We have said that if we reached an understanding with the Chinese side we would recommend this to the Legislative Council.

So we remain ready for talks at any time and I hope that the Chinese side will be prepared to settle quickly on arrangements for such talks. We in Britain have responsibility for the administration of Hong Kong until 1997, and part of that responsibility is to maintain steady progress towards democracy in Hong Kong. We are open to discussion about how to achieve that, but the key point is that the electoral arrangements in Hong Kong should be fair, open and acceptable to the people of Hong Kong.

The Chinese side also have responsibilities and interests as the future sovereign power. Britain and China have every incentive to work together to ensure the future success of Hong Kong. We will continue to the greatest extent possible to pursue steadily the path of co-operation with China, and we look to the Chinese side to do the same.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's decision to make a statement about the circumstances in Hong Kong and on relations between the People's Republic of China and Her Majesty's Government. We had asked for such a statement, and I think that the whole House will be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for making one. There is much in the statement with which to agree. It is conciliatory in tone and continues to offer open discussions without preconditions to the Government of the People's Republic of China. That, too, is welcome. It safeguards the legitimate interests and the right to make final decisions of the people of Hong Kong themselves whose future is the most important aspect of all in these matters. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on all those issues.

However, the central question remains unanswered. Why is it that, in the face of long discussions over many months with the apparent openness and willingness of Her Majesty's Government to meet without preconditions, the talks have broken down? Why is progress not being made? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in my meetings with Vice Premier Zhu Rongji and in several discussions with the ambassador of the People's Republic of China in London I have made it clear that we would always support proposals to extend democracy to the people of Hong Kong?

Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that we urged the representatives of the People's Republic of China to return to the negotiating table with counter proposals, if they have any? It is regrettable that they have failed either in private discussions or apparently in public to present any counter proposals as a basis for discussions to resolve this deadlock.

The deadlock is serious for a number of reasons. For example, why are the Chinese now apparently objecting —I say "apparently objecting"—to the involvement of representatives of the people of Hong Kong when those representatives have taken part over many years in discussions about the future of Hong Kong? What has caused that apparent change of mind in Beijing? Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us and the people of Hong Kong that their legitimate right to be represented in any talks about their future will not be given away but will be safeguarded by Her Majesty's Government and the Governor? For example, what is to happen to the very important economic development of the new airport for Hong Kong? How will those proposals be affected by this continuing breakdown in the talks?

Will the right hon. Gentleman make it clear that he will continue, in line with the Governor, to make it clear to the Government of the People's Republic of China that delay cannot be endured indefinitely: that if legislation is to pass through Legco—I say "if legislation is to pass through Legco", because it remains for the members of Legco themselves to decide whether the proposals are acceptable to them, which will be a debate that we shall all watch with interest—that legislation cannot be delayed indefinitely, even though, and I agree with the right hon. Gentleman on this point, he insists that it is not too late for talks on alternative proposals to develop.

May I say to the right hon. Gentleman and, through him, to the people of Hong Kong and, for that matter, to the Governor that proposals to widen and deepen democracy in Hong Kong have had and retain our complete support, without any equivocation at all, but we want to see a resumption of talks between Her Majesty's Government and the Governor and the People's Republic of China in the interests, above all, of the future well-being of the people of Hong Kong.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his support. That is a great help. He questioned me in particular on two points. His first question—why the talks about talks did not succeed—is one which he must address to the Chinese Government. I was reasonably hopeful a week ago, even a shorter time ago, that the different procedural obstacles that had come up were being resolved and that we would be able to start substantial talks. At the end, the difficulty focused on something that I mentioned in my statement. Representatives of the Hong Kong Government have taken part in this kind of discussion often before, without any difficulty. There was a suggestion from the Chinese side that their role and their designation should be, in some way, lessened or degraded. The implications of that are not ones which we could accept. It was really on that point that the talks about talks stalled.

On the right hon. Gentleman's second point, it is agreed between us and the Chinese and virtually everybody in Hong Kong that Hong Kong needs a new airport if it is to remain a first class international trade and financial centre. We went out of our way last year, as the House will recall, to take account of Chinese problems over the financing of these arrangements. The result is the memorandum of understanding which the Prime Minister entered into. I believe that agreement could be reached quickly on these airport matters if the financial issues, in which the Chinese have a legitimate interest, were tackled on their merits. We shall seek to do that.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is not the answer to the question of the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) about why the Chinese are not responding as, I am sure, we would all hope, that the Governor produced his October proposals, which were supposed to be the basis of negotiation, unilaterally? That is what has caused offence in Beijing. Can my right hon. Friend confirm, lest there be any doubt, that the 1984 agreement remains the basis of our policy towards Hong Kong? In order to find a way in which both sides, or all three sides, can get themselves off the hook, would it not at least be worth while contemplating the proposition that an independent panel of lawyers should look at the simple, central question whether the Governor's proposals, made unilaterally last October, did or did not break both the 1984 agreement and, more importantly, the 1990 and 1991 discussions?

Mr. Hurd: I am not sure what my hon. Friend meant when he said that the Governor put forward unilateral proposals. As Governor, it is his duty—a duty that he does not share with anyone else at present—to put forward proposals for the conduct of the legislative elections in Hong Kong in 1995.

On 25 September, some time before the Governor published his proposals, I gave the Chinese Foreign Minister the text of what the Governor proposed to say. At all times, before and after the Governor announced his proposals, he, I and everyone made it clear that they were proposals and that we were perfectly ready to discuss them with the Chinese, just as they are open for discussion in Hong Kong.

As for my hon. Friend's suggestion, it is of course the Chinese who have most strongly opposed any internationalisation of the discussion on these issues. On the legal points, the documents are in the Library and hon. Members can make their own decisions and conclusions, but we are perfectly clear that we are justified in saying, as I did, that the Governor's proposals are entirely compatible with the joint declaration—I confirm that that remains the basis of our policy—and that they are compatible with the Basic Law and with understandings reached in the context of the last Legislative Council elections. We are confident about that, but the talks that we seek should concentrate on the arrangements for the future, and I hope that they can be arranged on that basis.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the Chinese Premier's statement this morning that the Government's proposals appear to be designed to create disorder—if that is the correct translation—in the colony are viewed with total astonishment by members of all parties as it is perfectly obvious that the interest of Britain, as well as that of China and the people of Hong Kong, is to secure a smooth transition in 1997? Will he reaffirm that the Government of China still have some way to go to regain the confidence of the people of Hong Kong, which it lost in the events of two or three years ago?

If China is so convinced that the Governor's proposals in some way as yet unexplained transgress the joint declaration or the Basic Law, will he not rule out the possibility of asking whether it would agree to refer the matter for an advisory opinion to the International Court of Justice?

Mr. Hurd: I think that I have already answered the latter point. It is important to have sensible arrangements for the future which meet the criteria set out in my statement but which could be continued after 1997 in what is called the through-train. That should be the objective, but it has not yet been possible to reach it.

As for what the right hon. Gentleman said about the Chinese Prime Minister's statement this morning, it follows the line that has been taken before. There is nothing especially dramatic or unexpected in it, but it represents the continuation of a stalemate on a matter which it is in the practical interests of Britain, China and Hong Kong for the stalemate to be broken. That is the essence of the matter, and I hope that after gazetting, as before gazetting, it will be possible to start, continue and succeed in a dialogue that reflects those real interests.

Sir Cranley Onslow (Woking): As my right hon. Friend has confirmed, contrary to what my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) suggested, that he gave the Chinese Government advance notice of the Governor's proposals in good time, and as he emphasised the fact that they were consistent with the Basic Law and the joint declaration, will he say whether the Chinese have given any indication of why they appear to want to seek confrontation?

Mr. Hurd: No; the Chinese have not given us any alternatives to the Governor's proposals. They said for a long time that they were not prepared to discuss the matter until the proposals were withdrawn. Recently that has not been their position. That is one reason why, as I told the House a few minutes ago, I was reasonably hopeful until quite recently about managing to get into talks. In the end, for the reasons I have given, that was not possible. My right hon. Friend is right. During the almost six months in which the Chinese Government have had the Governor's proposals, we have had no alternatives to the proposals from the Chinese side.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Is not this deplorable situation the direct consequence of the Government's spinelessness on the whole issue of democracy in Hong Kong? Is not it a fact that the consensus from the Office of the Members of the Legislative and Executive Councils should have been confirmed by the Government long ago? Is not it a fact that the Patten proposals, inadequate and belated though they certainly are, are the minimum that should now be introduced? The Foreign Secretary is now saying that these inadequate and belated proposals, only four years before China takes over in Hong Kong, can be subject to further whittling away and further reduction. What kind of democracy will be handed over to the Chinese in 1997 if the Government do a Munich on Hong Kong?

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is back in his old form. I do not think that he recognises the realities of the situation any more than he did when he was a Front-Bench spokesman. Most right hon. and hon. Members, including the right hon. Gentleman in calmer moments, know that the political demand for democracy in Hong Kong is of reasonably recent date. It is now strong—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh come on!"] That is true. When I first knew Hong Kong many years ago, it would have been hard for anybody to say that there was a demand in Hong Kong for political democracy. It simply was not so. Recent events, which I need not specify, have created that demand out of anxiety. It is now a real demand. It is no longer possible to treat or to handle Hong Kong as if it were simply a commercial city. The political demand is there and the political community is now there. The Governor, the British Government and the Chinese Government must take account of that reality.

We can argue, as the right hon. Gentleman and I did at the time, about the OMELCO consensus, although I do not agree with his conclusion. The conclusion we reached last time was about right and worked. I always said that we would go back to the Chinese to see whether we could improve on it. I was thinking of an increase in the number of directly elected seats. What the Governor has done is not that. He has sought to improve democracy by other means compatible with the Basic Law. The Governor has made a shrewd set of proposals.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the principle of more democracy in Hong Kong is not really at issue? That principle was accepted long ago by the Chinese in the 1984 accord and is enshrined in the basic agreement, in which the Chinese also talked about the need for a high degree of local autonomy. All that the Governor and my right hon. Friend are trying to do now is to bring forward proposals to make a reality of those earlier demands, agreed to by the Chinese, that there should be a high degree of autonomy.

Will my right hon. Friend accept that it is entirely right that we should persist with these modest proposals to make a reality of points to which the Chinese have already agreed? Will my right hon. Friend also bear in mind that the whole of Asia, including Hong Kong, is now in transition and that there is quite a degree of transition in Beijing as well? It may well be right to persist with our line and not to abandon ourselves to passing pressures.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend; he is right. The phrase "two systems in one country" is not a British phrase. It is a Chinese phrase to embody the principles of the 1984 joint declaration. That is right. The principle of two systems in one country after 1997 is the only practical principle under which Hong Kong can be successful after the change of sovereignty. It is, therefore, in the practical interests of Britain, of China and of Hong Kong that that principle should be turned into reality. The Governor's proposals are one way in which to do that.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that, apart from the usual gyrations in the stock exchange casinos, trade and business in Hong Kong with China are proceeding perfectly normally? Will he also confirm that nothing in the constitutional proposals and in the democratic principles underlying them undermines the continued prosperity and expansion of the Hong Kong economy? Will he consider taking the Chancellor of the Exchequer out there for a much-needed holiday to see what an expanding economy really looks like?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that one has to be Chancellor of the Exchequer to derive a certain amount of inspiration from a visit to Hong Kong. It is a remarkably successful economy, precisely because of that combination of British administration and Chinese entrepreneurship. British administration will be replaced in 1997, but it is most important that the other quality—Chinese entrepreneurship—should continue under free institutions.

I can confirm the hon. Gentleman's first point. Opportunities for trade with China are substantial and have been continuing. I hope that that will continue to be the case.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Does my right hon. Friend believe that the current Chinese attitude suggests a certain amount of bad faith on the part of the Chinese? As my right hon. Friend said, they agreed to the principle of two systems, one country, and the second system—democracy—will not be properly developed even under the Governor's proposals.

Mr. Hurd: I do not want to trade accusations of bad faith because co-operation with China between now and 1997 is very much in the interests of the people of Hong Kong, who are our main responsibility and our main interest in this matter. I do not want to engage in that kind of recrimination. It is crucial that the principle, which is a Chinese principle, should be respected. The Governor's proposals are very much in line with that principle and with the joint declaration and are compatible with the Basic Law and with the understandings reached before the last legislative elections.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that lack of democracy in Hong Kong has always been a problem, and that that has not been put right by the Basic Law or by any other accords with the People's Republic of China? Will he now tell us what guarantees he can offer of freedom of speech in Hong Kong and of political asylum for those who have been critical of the People's Republic of China and who may be subject to prison sentences as and when China takes over?

Mr. Hurd: Many of these matters are discussed in the Joint Liaison Group with the Chinese—for example, the question of the convention on human rights. The hon. Gentleman was present when we discussed the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990, which the House agreed and whose provisions have worked well.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): As my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) said, these are days of change in Beijing. The Vice-President of China died over the weekend, and there are likely to be changes of personnel during the present congress in the People's Republic of China. Will my right hon. Friend undertake, in conjunction with the Governor, not to allow the legislative process for putting the Governor's proposals into law to progress too far before those changes become apparent so that any discussions with the People's Republic take place after such changes have occurred?

Mr. Hurd: It would be a little rash to base policy on possible changes in Peking in the next few weeks and months. It is hard to put that on any sure foundation. The Legislative Council in Hong Kong needs to take decisions on the legislation fairly soon—before the end of July, when the Council rises for its recess. That allows plenty of time both for discussion in the Legislative Council and for discussion with the Chinese—if, as I hope, they are ready to undertake such discussion.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Will the Foreign Secretary point out to the Chinese Government in a delicate way that the increased expectations for democracy in Hong Kong have been in part caused by the Chinese Government's own statements? Does my right hon. Friend recall that, after the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs visited Peking in 1989, it reported that the Chinese Government had said that they had no objection to faster progress towards democracy and that the introduction of representative government was a matter for Hong Kong. In its report, written after the Tiananmen square incident, the Committee reported unanimously to the House that we believed that full democracy must be introduced before 1997. That was on the basis of advice that we were given by the Chinese Government in Peking. It would be helpful if my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary would remind them of that.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend; and I recall that report. It is in the interests of China, and is possible for China without sacrificing anything that it regards as essential, to have somewhat more confidence in the process of democracy in Hong Kong. The Chinese are committed to that in the Basic Law, as my right hon. Friend pointed out. What is needed is a little more confidence in that commitment.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Is there not already a very large, enthusiastic and well-educated younger generation in Hong Kong who have every right to take part in the full democratic processes and democratic institutions of their society? Is the Foreign Secretary aware that Mr. Patten's proposals are sensible, cautious and, in my view, the minimum required for democracy? Therefore, they deserve support and not sniping, especially sniping from the powerful business interests in Hong Kong itself. Will the right hon. Gentleman make it clear to those interests that he and the House support the process of democracy that has been proposed?

Mr. Hurd: We certainly do that, and almost the whole House has given its support since the proposals were published. Certainly the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) has given that support. There is now a political city alongside a commercial city in Hong Kong. Both are now part of the reality. That is one reason why, in Hong Kong itself, the Governor's proposals have continued, despite sniping from inside and outside the colony, to receive very strong support.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Would it not have been far more difficult for the Chinese to adopt their present attitude if the reforms in Hong Kong had been implemented much earlier, as advocated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)? Is it not ironic that the obstruction is coming from a Government who have never been genuinely elected by anyone and who, in 1989, were responsible for massacres of students whose only demand was for elementary democratic reform in China itself?

Mr. Hurd: The Government and the House have expressed themselves in respect of what happened in Tiananmen square. One can argue about the right pace of progress towards democracy in Hong Kong. The pace which we, the former Governor and the present Governor have set in hand is about right. The principle is endorsed by the Chinese Government themselves. We are asking them to discuss with us the way in which that principle, which they accept, is put into practice between now and 1997 so that in 1997 the arrangements in place should continue.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): As one who has known Hong Kong for 30 years, may I endorse the view of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary that the pressure for democratic reform in Hong Kong is relatively recent but is now quite strong? Is he aware that the position that he and the Governor have taken on this matter has the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House who believe that the people of Hong Kong are entitled to be represented in any talks that take place and who find it wholly unreasonable that the People's Republic of China should object to talks simply because it cannot dictate who should represent the British side?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Those are exactly the points. I hope that those of us who share those points can, during the next few weeks which may in some respects be difficult, hold to those points and make them clear to Chinese friends with whom we speak and to people in Hong Kong. It is very important that there should be the minimum of misunderstanding and confusion in Hong Kong or Peking about the part of this country and this House. I hope that today's exchanges will make that clear.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): What does the Foreign Secretary make of the Chinese Government's insistence that Governor Patten's proposals are in direct conflict with the Basic Law?

Mr. Hurd: The Governor's proposals are designed to take account of two points of view which the Chinese Government have put to me and to many others with great emphasis. First, they were not prepared to see an increase in the number of directly elected seats beyond 20 as provided for in the Basic Law. The Governor's proposals respect that. Secondly, the Legislative Council should not be changed in nature, and the Governor's proposals respect that. We therefore took into account both the main points that the Chinese had quite legitimately impressed on us as their view. The Governor found a way, while respecting those points, modestly but clearly of advancing democracy. The Chinese should accept the effort that has been made as a basis for discussion—as something that should be discussed. That is what we have proposed, but so far they have not accepted it.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proposals for democracy in Hong Kong up to the year 1997 are in the interests of China because they would underpin inward investment? Will he pass on to the Governor the good wishes of all hon. Members, irrespective of which party they belong to, who are very concerned about the future of the people in Hong Kong?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The Governor has a difficult position. In some ways, it is bound to be a difficult position and, in the present circumstances, more difficult than usual. He will be very grateful for what has been said in the House, and in particular for my hon. Friend's personal good wishes.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Were not Baroness Thatcher's Government taken for a ride when they signed the joint declaration? Are not the Government being naive in thinking that the perpetrators of what happened in Tiananmen square will support democracy in Hong Kong any more than they did in Beijing? As the joint declaration was underwritten by the United Nations, at what point might the Foreign Secretary consider taking the matter back to the United Nations?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman may be mistaken. The best agreements are those that rest on self-interest, and it is in the self-interest of China that it should take over in 1997 and be able to sustain a promising, prosperous city. That depends, in turn, on keeping alive in Hong Kong the entrepreneurial spirit, which rests on a degree of freedom of speech and on the growing institutions of democracy. This is not something theoretical for China: properly considered, it is in its self-interest. We will do what we can —I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman's tactic would be the right one—to bring that point home as often as we can.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Does my right hon. Friend appreciate that many hon. Members in all parts of the House have noticed the contrast between the reasonable tones that are being adopted by himself and his fellow Ministers and those of the Chinese Government, and in particular of its ambassador in London? Such hectoring comments hardly help to achieve the settlement that we all desire.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is essential, at this sensitive time in the history of Hong Kong, that the people of Hong Kong are properly represented in the talks and that deals are not done behind their backs because it is their future that we are talking about?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with my hon. Friend's second point. On his first point, I would not like to point a finger at any individual, but the tactic of attempting to hector or dissuade by argument British individuals or firms from taking a particular line misfires, and I hope that, if it has been practised, it will be discontinued.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Does the Foreign Secretary share my concern that there is a growing coincidence of view between some very rich and powerful business men in Hong Kong and the Chinese communist party on having capitalism but not democracy against which the opposition in Hong Kong seems to be most effectively orchestrated? Is not it time that we said, loudly and clearly, that that coincidence of views is not shared by the British people?

Mr. Hurd: I am impressed by the degree of support which the Governor's proposals have continued to hold in most parts of Hong Kong. That is because sensible, shrewd people in Hong Kong, in the business community and elsewhere, realise that Hong Kong is now a political community as well as a business community—both have to be taken into account.

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and I agree that these moderate proposals are such that we hope that the Chinese authorities will come to the table further to discuss them. Does my right hon. Friend agree that two other elements are part and parcel of bringing those authorities to the table? One is the attitude of Taiwan to their behaviour over the proposals; the second is the attitude of the United States Government to the special trading relationship with China. Will my right hon. Friend explain in a little more detail what he thinks of those two attitudes?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think I want to comment on the Taiwan dimension. Hong Kong is increasingly, as my hon. Friend knows, the funnel through which China's trade passes to the west, to the great benefit of both Hong Kong and China, so it is certainly in the interests of Hong Kong that the most-favoured-nation arrangements should be renewed.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Foreign Secretary admit that it is a bit late in the day to come here with all this diplomatic waffle, given that the decision was made in 1984 by the Tory Government of which he was a member? Why did they not deal with the fine print then instead of allowing matters to reach this stage, when China is holding every ace?

There would perhaps be a little more credibility in the opt-out clause that the right hon. Gentleman is talking about were it not for the fact that those in China may ask who this Tory Government are to be talking about democracy when they do not allow a referendum in Britain.

Mr. Hurd: I think that I have already answered the points in the hon. Gentleman's question——

Mr. Skinner: Not that one.

Mr. Hurd: —those parts of the question that are relevant.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Will my right hon. Friend reassure the Chinese that this House has never urged an increase in democracy in Hong Kong in an irresponsible way? Indeed, the Foreign Affairs Select Committee report specifically rejected the views of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). What the House wants is a sensible, structured approach both to democracy and to judicial matters which will enable this country to maintain its other commitment in the joint declaration—to economic and social stability in Hong Kong. It is therefore in China's interest and in the interests of the people of Hong Kong that we proceed as the Governor has suggested.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. The more people can impress that point in the sort of terms that he has used, the better.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): What plans does the Foreign Secretary have to deal with what seems to be the continuing Chinese intransigence over and opposition to democracy? What steps will he take to get the support of the European Community, the United Nations and other international bodies for democratic change and stability in Hong Kong? Contrary to the weasel words of some Conservative Members, will he make it absolutely clear that there is no question of going back on democracy or on the moves towards it, both for Hong Kong and, in the long term, for China itself?

Mr. Hurd: The views of the House on this matter are fairly clear. It is the responsibility of the British Government, between now and 30 June 1997, to take whatever decisions for the administration of Hong Kong we think are in the interests of Hong Kong. That is laid down in the joint declaration and agreement of 1984, and that agreement we will discharge. We want to do that, to the greatest feasible extent, in co-operation with China —for the reasons that I have stated—but the responsibility until that time is ours.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is in China's interests that the traditional economy and character of Hong Kong be maintained? Does he also agree that if China breaks her word to Hong Kong the whole world will not trust China, and the inward investment for which she yearns will not take place?

Mr. Hurd: There are many considerations in the mind of the Chinese Government. I do not think that we need to make those points to them. They can see the world; they know what is being said and done; they know the realities. I hope that the principal reality will gradually be borne in on them—that it is in their interests, as well as forming part of their commitments, that Hong Kong should make steady progress towards fuller democracy.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The House will accept the laudable objectives that the Government have set with regard to the future organisation of Hong Kong and its relationship with China. Is not the Foreign Secretary sensitive to the Chinese leadership's criticism that Mr. Patten might have gone about those matters in a different way in the autumn of last year? Could he not have been more sensitive in the discussions, and perhaps not have held them in such an open forum—that is to say, in the international press? If he had adopted such a process, might we not have been in a far healthier position in terms of the potential for discussions to resolve the present difficulties?

Mr. Hurd: I do not know how the hon. Member can sustain that. No journalists were present when I gave the plans to the Chinese Foreign Minister on 25 November last year, and I made no statement. I made no effort to score points. I gave the plans to the Chinese in confidence so that they had an opportunity to comment in the weeks that followed, before the Governor announced the proposals. They refused to take that opportunity. I do not think that it would be reasonable to expect that the Governor should hold up publication of the proposals in October or their gazetting on 12 March this year indefinitely or until the Chinese agreed. Those are not reasonable proposals for the House or for Hong Kong.

Before publication of the proposals, we gave the Chinese an opportunity, and we offered them another between publication last October and gazetting in March. Neither of those opportunities was taken. A third opportunity exists now, when the proposals are gazetted. But the Legislative Council has not started discussions, let alone taken any decisions. We are not pillorying anyone.

I have deliberately chosen my words very carefully. We want to enter into discussions, and I hope that the opportunity can now be taken.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. We must now move on.

Points of Order

4.16 pm

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I seek your advice on an important matter for the House. It is certainly a proper point of order, and I shall be brief.

At the weekend the Scottish National party national executive met and passed a vote of confidence in the three Scottish Nationalist Members of Parliament, who are popularly known in Scotland as the "Wee Three". They had to vote for themselves, otherwise the motion of confidence would have been lost. What is really worrying is that three members of the cabinet have resigned over the matter—that is, the cabinet of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). You may not be aware that he has a cabinet, Madam Speaker. The national executive has said that it will seek the development of emergency procedures for "greater consultation" between Members of Parliament and the national executive. Clearly it is intent on influencing, confining and coercing three Members of this House.

"Erskine May", chapter 5, states on page 69, among other things, that "the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its Members."

I believe that the national executive of the SNP is in breach of privilege, and that that is a matter on which I should write to you, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman and the House that, according to our procedures, as that matter concerns other hon. Members, he should have informed them of his concern.

Mr. Hogg: You know me very well, Madam Speaker. You can be assured that I wrote to the parliamentary leader of the Scottish National party——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am not seeking to enter into a debate; I made a comment. I take it that the hon. Member has advised the hon. Members concerned. I remind him——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have not finished; I am on my feet.

As the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) said, it may well be a matter of contempt or privilege, and that being the case the hon. Gentleman should write to me about it.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Madam Speaker: That is the end of the matter. There can be no further points of order on it. I have dealt with it.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Skinner: Yes, it is.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I shall take it.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As you know, Opposition parties get what is colloquially known as Short money. There is a point here that applies to the House as a whole, and in which you are bound to have an interest. Now that this debacle has taken place in the Scottish National party, who will receive the money? We are talking about taxpayers' money. Who will it be handed over to—the executive body or the leader of the SNP?

Madam Speaker: I put the hon. Gentleman on his honour when I asked whether his point of order related to the former point of order. I should have known better.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I put the hon. Gentleman on his honour. He must not usurp the time of the House to ask about a matter that I have already dealt with. He may proceed if it is on a totally different matter.

Mr. Corbyn: It could not be a more different point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sure that you read the newspapers at the weekend, as many of us did, and saw the disturbing reports that the Prime Minister managed to raise £17 million for the Conservative party by holding private dinners at 10 Downing street. By what means can we question the Prime Minister about his use of Downing street as a fund-raising agency for the Conservative party and about what undertakings were given in return for the secret donations made to the Tory party election machine so that we may know how Government policy has been influenced?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman assumes quite a lot. I have much more to do at the weekends than read the national press. The hon. Gentleman should not expect answers on procedural matters of that nature to be given by the Chair across the Floor of the House. We must now move on.

Orders of the Day

Disability (Grants) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.21 pm

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

This is a short Bill for the House to consider, but it is an important one for severely disabled people. Before I deal with the contents of the Bill and the independent living fund in detail, I should like to place the concept of independent living within the wider context of care in the community. As we all know, policy on care in the community developed as a concept in the 1980s. Against the background, the aim was that, wherever feasible and sensible, people should be assisted to live as independently as possible in the community.

The final phase in the implementation of that concept will take place in April, when social security funds—that is to say, income support—hitherto used to pay independent sector home fees will be transferred to local authorities to enable them to purchase care from a range of providers, according to the needs that have been assessed for each individual. The future of the independent living fund, with which the Bill deals, has to be set in that context. The background against which ILF has hitherto been operating will be changed from April and I shall say something about that later.

The Bill fully meets our manifesto commitment to continue to support people with severe disabilities and consolidates the excellent work that the independent living fund has done over the past five years. It is the next step in the development of support to enable disabled people to live independently in the community.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): What would be the position of somebody who was so severely disabled that he could not remain at home, even with the assistance of the council and the fund, admittedly at the large amount of £500? Would such a person have to go into a home?

Mr. Scott: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is talking about the present situation or about what will happen after the Bill has become law and the new funds have been set up. I shall explain in detail how the new arrangements will work for people who need support from both a local authority and the independent living fund and who have exceptionally high costs.

As we all recall, the ILF was announced as an interim measure in 1988, pending the introduction of the community care arrangements along the lines that were recommended by Sir Roy Griffiths. Those arrangements are now in place and will be implemented from 1 April, but as the ILF has been so successful the Government have decided to continue support for the main concepts behind it, which are giving cash to disabled people and recognising that by doing so we give them independence and the power to determine how best to meet their own care needs. I believe that that is right and fitting. It is sensible that this should be carried forward into the new arrangements, where the fund will operate in partnership with local authorities, which will no longer be merely providers of services but facilitators of a wide variety of care provisions. I hope that that will become increasingly true of the role of local authorities in the future.

I suspect that our debate will be mainly about the ILF. The House will have noted, however, that we have also taken the opportunity in the Bill to put the funding for notability on a new statutory basis. I shall return to that towards the end of my remarks.

So we embark on the establishment of two new funds. Before I go any further, I wish to place on record my warmest thanks to the trustees and staff of the existing ILF. I am sure that during the Bill's passage, and especially today on Second Reading, right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House will want to take the opportunity to place on record their gratitude to all those associated with the fund. I know, because of my close contact with them over the years since the fund came into existence, that their work has not always been easy. They have had to develop a new way of working with disabled people under the sometimes critical eyes of the disability lobby and various arms of government. The trustees, under the chairmanship first of Winifred Tumim and then of Trevan Hingston, faced many difficult decisions over the five-year life of the trust.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I am sure that we all want to underline what the Minister has said about thanking the trustees for the work that they have done. As he is complimenting them on the way in which they developed the task that was presented to them by the Government, will he say whether they were all happy about being wound up?

Mr. Scott: I think that the trustees understood that the ILF was, as constituted, an interim measure to see us through the gap before the introduction of care in the community in April this year. I shall come on to that——

Mr. Field rose——

Mr. Scott: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but he might wish to listen to the next few sentences of my speech.

Mr. Field: I shall listen to what the Minister has to say, but I ask him now whether he is not rewriting history. When the fund was established, it had nothing to do with a measure to fill the gap between what then existed and of community care. It was introduced because the Government had introduced income support, under which those who were very disabled would have received less money than previously. They introduced the ILF to ensure that those people were not worse off and we congratulated them on that. The fund developed into a success which the Government did not believe possible. It is rather sad that we are mourning the loss of the ILF while welcoming a rather smaller initiative to follow in its wake.

Mr. Scott: Perhaps it would have been better if the hon. Gentleman had waited to hear what I was about to say about the proper transition from supplementary benefit through to income support, as a result of which we thought it necessary to fill the gap between that change and the move to care in the community, which was already in preparation. It is—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) might like to undermine the tribute that I have been paying to the trustees—well, I know he would not. I shall move on to the new arrangements that are being made. If the hon. Gentleman wants to make a proper intervention in due course I shall be only too happy to gve way to him, as he well knows.

I pay tribute to the two chairmen, Winifred Tumim and Trevan Hingston, who faced many difficult decisions over the lifetime of the trust. No decision was more difficult than that of winding up the trust and bringing about its closure in November 1992—that is to say, its closure to new applications at that juncture.

It has been quite clear for a long time that to make proper provision for the ILF to hand over its caseload to the two new funds that will come into force on 1 April 1993 there would have to come a time when the ILF could not accept new applications. I well understand—it has been impressed on me by a number of the trustees—that there has been some misunderstanding about the discretion of the trustees in whether the fund could have stayed open in the particular circumstances of the delays in dealing with disability living allowance cases. Some people have had to wait several months to have their DLA claims processed.

It has been said, and technically it is correct, that trustees of charitable funds have discretion. However, I have always recognised that the need for an orderly handover prevented the trustees from being able to exercise their discretion in those circumstances. I want to make plain my regrets and apologies if any of the trustees feel that the excellent work that they have done for disabled people over the five-year life of the fund was in any way undermined by that misunderstanding.

Having paid tribute to the two chairmen of the ILF trustees, I want now to pay a particular tribute to the director of the fund, Judith Hoyle. She is on secondment from the Department of Social Security and has been with the fund since its inception five years ago. She has played a major part in its success. Through her, I also pay tribute to all the staff who have worked so conscientiously to ensure the fund's success. I am aware of their immense contribution to its work. With them, I bracket the social workers who have visited the potential beneficiaries of the fund and done great work in assessing their needs and making provision for them.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): The Minister said that he is grateful to the trustees. Will they be able to continue with the successor bodies? If not, is not it strange that he is saying how great they are when, in effect, they are virtually being sacked?

Mr. Scott: I understand the hon. Lady's point. In essence, the two new funds—the independent living (extension) fund and the independent living (1993) fund —will have a wholly different role from that of the ILF over the past five years. The ILF made total provision, on a charitable basis, for a trust where direct application was, in effect, made to the trustees. In the new circumstances——

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Scott: No, not in the middle of a reply to another intervention. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in due course.

The main thrust of new cases being provided for by the 1993 fund will come to the trustees after an application has been made to a local authority and the local authority has begun an assessment of the needs of the disabled person. Then, the 1993 fund will have the job of deciding whether to top up the help that is already being given by the local authority. The work of the new bodies, whether the one that provides for new cases or the one that manages the existing caseload and decides whether cases need to be reviewed because of extra need, will be wholly different from the work of the existing fund.

Mr. Wicks: I apologise to the Minister for having tried to intervene at the wrong time. I am interested in what he has said about there being a wholly new role for the new funds. If that is so, why call them by the same name as the existing fund? Is not that confusing?

Mr. Scott: No—[Laughter.] This is obviously a matter of great humour for the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen, who have little enough to laugh at these days.

It is important to recognise that, although the two new funds have a wholly different role, disabled people whose needs have previously been met by the ILF may feel that the use of the same name gives a sense of continuity. I deliberately decided to incorporate the title of the old fund into the new funds, but with the caveat that one fund deals with new applications and the other deals with the existing caseload.

I acknowledge the important role and contribution of the Disablement Income Group and DIG (Scotland) in launching the fund five years ago. The ILF was established jointly by DIG and the Department and, without the group's support, it would have been difficult to launch the fund in the first instance.

It may be hard to recall what a courageous step that was for the Disablement Income Group at a time when many disability organisations wanted nothing to do with a discretionary fund but wanted a statutory, regulated system continued. To those critical of that decision I would only say—addressing my remarks to DIG and with apologies to Sir Christopher Wren—that if one wants to see the monument to that courageous decision by DIG, one need only look at the lives of the 21,000 people now receiving help from the fund.

Mr. Frank Field: I, too, congratulate DIG on being courageous enough to put its head above the parapet when everyone else, lacking in courage, kept their heads firmly below it—and were most unpleasant to DIG in the process. Is DIG happy with the fund's winding up?

Mr. Scott: I cannot speak for DIG, but no doubt the hon. Gentleman has access to its views. I had an extremely pleasant meeting with the ILF's outgoing trustees. Many of them perhaps felt some disappointment at not being able to contribute to the work, but they all took great pride in their achievements over the fund's lifetime.

Although it may be invidious to mention individual trustees, we owe a particular debt to Peter Large and Pauline Thompson of the DIG. If I may mention two more names without in any way diminishing my respect and praise for others, Jack McGregor of DIG (Scotland) and Eilis Gallacher from County Derry played a major part in ensuring that the needs of Scotland and Northern Ireland were fully met through the fund's operation. I pay particular tribute to them.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): As the Minister if praising DIG so lavishly, and rightly, may I ask whether any DIG representative will be among the five trustees who have yet to be appointed by the Government?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman must control his impatience until he sees the names—but I do not anticipate that DIG will be represented on the new body of trustees. The hon. Gentleman should await the outcome, because final decisions have to be made on the new trust fund's composition.

I will recap—as this was mentioned in an intervention—on why the ILF was first introduced in 1988, at the time that we reformed the supplementary benefit system and introduced income support. Although I was engaged elsewhere during much of the lifetime of the supplementary benefit scheme, we can all, as constituency Members of Parliament, remember many of its complexities. A number of the weekly additions rules were not well targeted and were too complex for many customers to understand.

Local authorities long had responsibility for providing care, but the arrangements made for the disabled had precious little flexibility. The traditional response to the most severely disabled in particular was the offer of a place in a residential or nursing home. Between the abolition of the supplementary benefit additions and the introduction of community care, the ILF was introduced to bridge the gap.

The fund's purpose was to allow those severely disabled people who did not want to go into residential care but who needed substantial levels of care and domiciliary support to remain in their own homes.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): As to the Minister's decision to exclude those over working age, I must inform him of the great disappointment of the Alzheimer's Disease Society, which feels that an element of discrimination is at work—bearing in mind that older people suffer dementia and that those who look after them suffer physical and financial hardship. Will the Minister reconsider that decision? It has been badly received in my constituency and has caused great anguish nationally.

Mr. Scott: I entirely understand the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised, but let me make two more points. He will acknowledge, I hope, that any scheme of this sort must be introduced within the available resources. Substantial extra resources are being provided for independent living as a result of this legislation and I forecast even more expenditure over the years to come.

We must determine the priorities. I thought it right, and the Government feel it right, that the available resources should be concentrated in particular on those who have become disabled earlier in life. They are likely to have substantially higher care costs than older people and they will not have been able to build up savings or acquire pension rights which are frequently available to such people. As was shown by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys report examining the difference in income levels between younger disabled people and able-bodied young people, and between older disabled people and older people who are not disabled, the gap is greater at the younger level than at the older. I therefore think it right to concentrate help on the younger disabled and I am prepared to defend that decision. I understand the feelings that the hon. Gentleman has expressed, but, within the resources available, I believe that it is right to concentrate them in the way that I have suggested.

The ILF had a small beginning, spending only £1 million of the £5 million provided in its first year of existence—1988-89—but since then it has grown to be a respected organisation in the disability world, currently administering a budget of nearly £100 million and making payments to some 21,000 people. One reason for the growth in the caseload is that the fund was more effective in delivering help to where it is really needed than the system that it replaced. It should be borne in mind that that system gave regulated, statutory help with the costs of domestic assistance. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) will recall that there were never more than 6,000 people receiving those supplementary benefit additions and that average individual payments amounted to less than £30 a week. Today, we have some 21,000 cases on the ILF with payments averaging about £114 a week.

I believe that, in a flexible and individually tailored way, the ILF has been a considerable success throughout its lifetime. We all know that by far the most popular aspect of the ILF is the flexibility and freedom of choice that cash payments bring. Dignity and independence are as important to disabled people as they are to everyone else in society. Disabled people have come to value the ability to select and employ their own carers. The new 1993 fund will ensure that disabled people continue to maintain that dignity and independence in two ways. First, it will ensure that the package of care put together for their needs involves a partnership between the disabled person, the professionals from the local authority and the ILF; secondly, it will continue to provide at least an element of cash payments to support the services provided by local authorities.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Unless the deed says so, I do not see any procedure in anything that the Minister has said to enable the people whom the Bill is supposed to serve to have an adverse decision reviewed, either by the local authority or the trustees of the fund. If there is no process of review or appeal, would decisions of that kind be subject to judiciable statements in the courts by way of judicial review?

Mr. Scott: I suppose that almost anything may be subject to judicial review nowadays, but, in essence, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. If someone is dissatisfied with a judgment made about the fund's role in topping up local authority care, the trustees will be able to ask for their case to be reviewed, and, if necessary, two or more trustees will be able to look individually at the provision that has been made. Clearly, in a partnership between local authorities and trustees, there will be some constraints in regard to the exercise of that judgment, but there is nothing to say that, if the trustees feel that a mistake has been made about the assessment of their need in excess of the fund, the position cannot be re-examined—as long as the amount does not exceed the maximum.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Obviously, this is a matter of some concern. The fund is to provide a top-up payment, which may often be quite modest. The majority of help will come in the local authority package. The Minister has talked rather generally about the arrangements being a partnership, and of course we all hope that individuals will be consulted; but will the right hon. Gentleman say a little about the rights of the individual in cases of disagreement between local authority and recipient? If the local authority wishes to make a financial payment, as distinct from providing services, can it do that?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that there is currently no provision for local authorities to provide cash. They can provide services. Whatever may happen in the future, at a time when local authorities are taking on so many extra responsibilities in relation to community care, it is surely a mistake to add to those responsibilities a duty to manage cash. I do not know what the future may hold, but at present authorities have no power to provide cash.

What authorities have, however—under the terms of the introduction of community care—is a responsibility to consult and involve disabled people in the decision-making process about the package of care with which they will be provided. If that exceeds the £200 limit that the authority must provide in terms of services, a social worker from the ILF will become involved in discussions with local authority social workers to decide what extra cash payment may be necessary in the circumstances. Anyone who is dissatisfied at that point can return to the fund's trustees and ask for the matter to be reconsidered—as, indeed, the local authority can be asked at any time to assess whether the package of services should be re-examined. Circumstances may have changed, or it may be felt that the assessment has gone wrong.

Of course, the introduction of community care has taken us into new territory. No doubt we shall have to monitor carefully how it all works in practice and, in particular, the workings of the partnership between local authorities and the new 1993 ILF.

Mr. Dewar: I believe that there are guidelines on the pricing of the local authority contribution, but how exactly will it work in practice? Presumably, the local authority is the only arbiter when £200 worth of services have been offered. After that it will be up to the ILF, but I assume that there will be some disagreement between the fund and the local authority—and, possibly, the recipient—about precisely how the services should be priced and costed.

Mr. Scott: As I said in response to an earlier intervention, I do not suggest for a moment that there will not be a certain amount of constructive discussion about such matters as the system is launched.

Mr. Kirkwood: It is due to start in a fortnight.

Mr. Scott: Applications are already being made to local authorities and they, in a sense, will be the gateway to the cash that the 1993 fund may be able to provide for disabled people. I believe that authorities are approaching the provision of community care positively. I also believe that the trustees of the new fund will approach their role positively. I am not saying that there will not be the odd hiccup, but I, too, have adopted a positive attitude to the partnership that is evolving. I believe that it will meet the needs of disabled people.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire knows how much I respect him and I know that it is the Opposition's job to be critical of anything that Governments do. I do not ask him exactly to rejoice in the current developments, but I ask him at least to be pleased that it is possible to continue providing cash for the most severely disabled people in our society, when that has proved so important to them.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Minister of State is provoking me. He is, of course, dealing with difficult and complex questions. What concerns me is that we have only about a fortnight before the procedure comes into operation. We do not know the names of the trustees and we have not seen the guidelines, the regulations or the statutory instruments, but the Minister expects everything to be sorted out in the wash. The matter is too important to be left to the vagaries of such a timetable.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman may not have caught up with everything that has happened. The staff of the ILF is already preparing for the new fund, two new trustees are in place and operating the system, and others will be appointed in the near future. [Interruption.] All seven trustees will be appointed before the fund comes into existence. They will be in place in the next two weeks. The staff members of the independent living fund are already in discussion with local authorities.

As we launch the new arrangements, the first job is for local authorities to receive applications from the most severely disabled people and from disabled people generally within their curtilage. The authorities will then assess their needs. First, they will assess needs against the level of services that are likely to be needed. Where they feel that the £200 limit will be exceeded they will want to have discussions with the staff and trustees of the independent living (1993) fund. There is nothing very complicated about that, although the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire may feel that there is. Apart from the odd hiccup, the system will operate sensibly and sensitively.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): The Minister does not seem to understand the point. We have been entirely helpful. Given the background of chaos and the problems caused to many people over the DLA, we are trying to help the Minister to avoid another administrative cock-up that will damage his reputation and that of the Government. The people connected to the present independent living fund are extremely concerned that they were not consulted about the new body although they have a wealth of experience. The team for a system that will be operating in two weeks has not been set up. We are genuinely concerned for the recipients and for the Minister's reputation.

Mr. Scott: Before I spoke I was tempted to take a bet on how long it would be before the hon. Gentleman mentioned the disability living allowance. The problems of the DLA were the problems of success. I do not think that there will be problems with the independent living fund. The gate-keepers in the operation of the new ILF will be the local authorities. Sensible discussions are already taking place between local authorities and ILF staff about how matters will be handled.

Local authorities are now in the driving seat for community care for disabled and severely disabled people. They will be the facilitators of care whether it is provided at home or in a residential setting. That is why the time has come to make some changes in the concept of the independent living fund and how it will operate in the future. The aim is to extend the good work of designing and providing packages of care, which may well turn out to be a mix of services and cash for the most severely disabled people.

Mr. Frank Field: The House should not be fooled too much by the Minister's skill in convincing us that all is well. Those of us who think that, where possible, we should give people the money to do their own thing rather than adopt a paternalistic attitude have been defeated. Whatever the Government's reasons for introducing the measure, it is a defeat for that principle. We are moving from extending people's freedom by giving them cash to local authorities being generous gate-keepers, the Minister hopes, for the new benefit.

Mr. Scott: Local authorities have a statutory duty to provide care packages for the elderly, the disabled and other vulnerable people. When the community care arrangements of Sir Roy Griffiths were seen as the most sensible way forward, cash provision was not envisaged. There is now such provision through the continuation of the independent living (1993) fund and that is a great prize for severely disabled people. I note the hon. Gentleman's scepticism. We shall have to see. I shall certainly do my best and I know that the trustees and staff will do their best to continue in the tradition of the foregoing independent living fund in providing sensitive, sensible and generous packages of help for disabled people to enable them to live in their own homes where that is feasible.

Mr. Frank Field: I intervene again on this important issue. I shall not do so at any other stage in the debate. There is all the difference in the world between giving people cash and hoping that local authorities will deliver care packages. Local authorities currently operate under restraints. The packages will be designed largely in line with what local authorities can currently provide using the people that they employ. There is a great difference between a person having the money to design his own package and having discussions with a local authority which then fits that person into the scheme which it thinks that he needs and in line with the number of workers that the authority employs.

Mr. Scott: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. The Government's aim and that of many local authorities is that authorities will not simply provide services using the people that they employ, but will co-operate with voluntary organisations and private sector providers. The local authority will be the facilitator for the care packages which will be delivered by other organisations and individuals. Increasingly, local authorities will take a much more flexible approach to providing or facilitating the necessary care packages. The independent living fund will be an important top-up to those arrangements for the most severely disabled people.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the extra money for local authorities for community care will be ring fenced and that the Government have made it clear that 85 per cent. of those funds are to be spent on private provision of services? Does he agree that one of the arguments for precisely such an arrangement is that it will deal with the anxieties of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) by ensuring that local authorities' care plans are not determined by the services that they themselves provide?

Mr. Scott: My hon. Friend makes the point well. I hope that the arrangements will lead to a great deal more flexibility—[Interruption.] Perhaps the Opposition do not understand these matters. They are so locked into the tramlines of former provision that they do not know the extent of the potential in the new arrangements which my colleagues in the Department of Health and local authorities will be enabled to introduce.

I shall briefly describe the character of the two new funds. The independent living (extension) fund applies to existing cases. The partnership arrangements, with which I shall shortly deal, apply to new cases. Nearly two years ago I first announced that there would be no disruption of the arrangements for existing independent living fund beneficiaries. It would not be fair to individual disabled people to unmake the successful care packages that were devised for them, nor would it have been fair to expect local authorities at a stroke to take on and manage agreements that had been entered into by others.

The independent living (extension) fund has been set up as an independent charitable trust to continue to make payments on the same basis as now to all people who are currently receiving money from the independent living fund or who have temporarily had their payments suspended from 1 April. It would be possible for someone who had entered a short-term care provision and was therefore not receiving a weekly payment from the ILF still to be part of the existing caseload taken on by the extension fund on 1 April.

In practice, the only difference that any recipient of independent living fund support should notice on 1 April is a change of name on the cheque at the time of takeover. The extension fund will continue to have review powers, just as the independent living fund does. Resources for the extension fund in 1993-94 will be of the order of £120 million for the United Kingdom. That is rather more than a 20 per cent. increase on the provision that has been made for this year and should enable adequate provision to be made for any upward reviews, in terms of the care that is needed by disabled people.

I turn now to the independent living (1993) fund. The independent living fund was the pioneer in allowing people with disabilities to take a proactive role in determining how best their care needs could be met. We all welcome that.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): My right hon. Friend has just said that we all welcome the work of the ILF, but is it not a fact that when it was introduced it was attacked by the Labour party and described as an abdication of the Government's responsibilities?

Mr. Scott: I believe that the Opposition have now been convinced and are among the stoutest defenders of the independent living fund. There is joy in heaven on these occasions.

Mr. Frank Field: And there will be again.

Mr. Scott: Yes, but the Opposition will have to go through the whole process all over again.

The ILF was the pioneer in allowing people with disabilities to play that role, with support and professional back-up which is an important element in the package. That is why, in establishing the 1993 fund, we have built on the case work approach. From April this year, the vast majority of disabled people, including the bulk of those who would have looked to the ILF for help in the past, will, in the first instance, look to their local authority. For the most severely disabled people, whose care needs are so great that without additional help they would have to go into residential or nursing care, the 1993 fund will provide an additional option for social workers in planning packages of care with their disabled clients.

We expect that each year around 1,500 people will get a cash payment from the new fund, as well as help from their local authority. The budget for the first year of this fund will be just over £4 million for the United Kingdom. One has to reflect on the fact that the budget for the larger-scale ILF was £5 million in its first year, only £1 million of which was taken up. For a much more restricted caseload, I believe that £4 million is an even more generous provision to meet the demands that are likely to be put upon the fund in its first year.

I have already mentioned that the 1993 fund will work as a partnership between itself—the trustees—and the local authority. All the most severely disabled people who are likely to come within the purview of the fund will already, overwhelmingly, be likely to be in touch with their local authority social services departments because of existing needs. As with the current ILF, the new fund will be restricted to people on low incomes and to those who live alone or with someone who is unable to supply all the care that they need. Eligibility will also be limited, as I think I have already stated, to those of working age—those between 16 and 65.

Where it is clear that the cost of care in the community will be above the national threshold—which, as I have already stated, we have set at £200 a week—the social worker will want to consider whether the client might be eligible for help from the new fund. The fund would then be able to make a topping-up cash payment of up to a further £300, making a total of £500 a week.

I believe, in essence, that the new system will ensure that a significant group of disabled people will be able to look to the primary facilitators of community care, the local authorities, for their community services without losing the extra flexibility of an element of cash payments.

Mr. Dewar: Presumably the qualifying criteria will be a matter for the trustees of the new fund which is to take over new cases. They will, I presume, start on the same higher payment component care, the disability living allowance, basis, but in future they will have to keep within a budget, which will be cash limited. If they cannot do so, the criteria may have to be altered as happened in the past.

Mr. Scott: Manifestly, the new fund, as with the existing fund, will be run on a cash-limited basis. It will be up to the trustees to deploy their resources as necessary. It has been broadly true over the life of the existing independent living fund that there has been an underspend of the cash limit, perhaps because of the trustees' prudence. Nevertheless, we believe that the provision that has been made for both the new fund and the existing cases fund will be adequate to cope with needs for the foreseeable future.

Motability is the organisation that enables people to use the top rate mobility component of their DLA to buy or lease a vehicle specially adapted to their needs.

[Mr. Scott]

Motability was launched by the Labour Government and, I believe, by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). It has always had strong all-party support in the House. Governments of both parties have funded it consistently throughout the years.

I intend to mention three Government grants that are made to support the mobility component and facilitate the purchase or lease of vehicles. The Government pay for the administration of Motability which, in the coming years, will be over £2 million. The equipment fund was set up in 1991. It provided £1 million a year for more sophisticated adaptations to meet the needs of the most severely disabled people. From April this year we are doubling that contribution from £1 million to £2 million. The tenth anniversary trust, which was set up in 1988 with £5 million from the Government and £5 million from the clearing banks, provides extra help for the charitable work of Motability—that is, for those people who cannot afford the full cost of leasing, hiring or adapting a car.

Motability has been an immense success story from its very inception by the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe and others, such as Lord Goodman, who were in at the start and developed the scheme. I am delighted to say that very shortly my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is to present the keys of the 350,000th Motability vehicle which has been provided under the scheme.

In recent years we have seen many improvements in the spread and coverage of help for disabled people. That has happened under Governments of both parties. In the years since I have been Minister for Social Security and Disabled People I have been proud and happy to play my part in that continuing development. I wholeheartedly welcome the community care changes. I am pleased that the system of support that the independent living fund offers to people with disabilities has survived and is to be developed and taken forward, to take advantage of the wider developments in community care that are being put in place.

In my view, the Bill represents a constructive way forward, building on the foundations set by the ILF and the experience gained from the workings of that body. I am happy that the Government are continuing to fund these organisations, which offer flexibility, independence and a sense of dignity and self worth for many disabled people in our society.

The Government have expanded and developed the range and scope of help for people with disabilities. This Bill, in my view, marks another step in the movement towards a more caring society which offers additional opportunities for all its members, not just those who happen, for the time being, to be able bodied. I believe that the whole House should welcome these improvements.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): The Bill is important not only in the most general sense; for thousands of severely disabled persons and their families it is crucial and goes to the very core of their existence. However, the Opposition have serious reservations about it, which I shall explain in due course. The Second Reading of the Bill is not, however, the time or the place for ritualistic parliamentary disagreement. It is a unique opportunity to examine the manner in which we provide services for disabled people in our society towards the end of the 20th century. It is also a convenient time to assess the contribution of the soon to be dismantled independent living fund which the Bill seeks to replace.

The Minister will, I believe, be told by those who sit on this side of the House and by his hon. Friends of serious misgivings, worries and criticisms regarding the new arrangements that are encapsulated in the Bill. I can assure the Minister that we shall be making those points, but constructively and positively.

My task is to examine the extent to which the Bill meets the needs, hopes and aspirations of disabled people and the extent to which it is in tune with the growing desire of disabled people and their families for a sensible system under which they can be in control of their destiny, based in their own homes with as much independence as they wish. The Bill must be judged on the extent to which it empowers and liberates—indeed, satisfies—those whom it is designed to help.

To understand the development of services provided for disabled people, one has to go back at least to Lord Beveridge, the subsequent National Assistance Act 1948 and to the dramatic change in the climate of service provision which emerged with the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). Those Acts have to be judged fairly in the context of their time. They were based not only on the best available expert opinion but on the fullest understanding that existed then of the needs of the people being helped.

Times have changed. The tradition of service incorporated in those Acts tended to have three salient characteristics or features. The first was a strong emphasis on the ethic of professionalism, the view that the care professionals' perceptions of disabled people's needs and of the priorities in allocating resources were paramount and, in any case, should be considered more valid than disabled persons' perceptions of their own needs.

Secondly, there was a mixture of provision by central Government benefits agencies, such as the Department of Social Security, and local authorities through their social services departments. Thirdly, in the case of local authority provision, there was a lack of statutory backing and an emphasis on discretionary provision. It is still the case that the only statutory provision that seems to exist for disabled people is that local authorities should keep a register and give information on available services, although very few authorities fulfil even that minimal task.

The consequences of the approach that I have just described can be summed up by saying that some good work was carried out in those years by statutory agencies and the newly emerging organisations of disabled people, but that, as times changed and demands altered, the deficiencies became increasingly obvious. One expert, Professor Michael Oliver of the University of Greenwich, said:

> "Numerous studies over the years show that clients are very unhappy about the way professional assessments have distorted or denied their needs".

Some care professionals are equally unhappy about a system that has forced them to tailor their needs assessment to available resources and currently available provision. In many cases, that goes against their best professional judgment.

The drawback of such a system was that, too often, disabled people were, and still are, forced into a position of dependency, causing the inevitable feelings of powerlessness, resentment, cynicism and mistrust which a dependency culture entails. In addition, the lack of statutory duties placed on local authorities is mirrored by the lack of statutory rights for disabled people. I shall not unearth the disagreement that I had with the Minister only a couple of Fridays ago about the Disabled Persons (Civil Rights) Bill. Too often, a patchy and inconsistent pattern of provision nationwide results from different local authorities having distinct attitudes to their discretionary powers or distinct levels of resources with which to implement them. Nothing that the Minister has said today fills us with confidence that we are not going back to the bad old days.

Overall, a system of provision did exist—and still exists—which is not only problematic and unsatisfactory in many ways but which many argue is more expensive than the alternatives and, therefore, hardly good value for money. It could be argued that the independent living fund came about partly because of the qualitatively very different attitude towards provision which emerged in the 1970s. We must be clear about where it came from.

I am something of a historian and it is important to get the history as right as we can. The fund clearly stemmed from disabled persons and their families. They were clear about their aspirations: they wanted full integration and participation in the community rather than being left in isolated residential establishments, and they increasingly wanted to control the resources that could make their lives more fulfilled.

Professionals, intellectuals, and even political parties and Governments gradually became aware of, if not fully convinced of, those aspirations. The introduction of care in the community was therefore, in many ways, a missed opportunity to take those aspirations fully on board and to deliver them. It perhaps points in the right direction but is still a missed opportunity.

However, the independent living fund was a successful example of the introduction of a system much in line with the new ideas. Again, the historian in me suspects that, in part, the birth was unexpected and the development uncharted. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) who knows that there was a crisis, that the Government met it and, almost by accident, produced something that grew into a rather nice child from a rather unexpected baby, if I can mix metaphors. The birth was unexpected and the development uncharted, but we would be very foolish to underrate its innovative character and the value of its existence in the past five years. We pay tribute to the Minister for any hand that he had in it. We do not deny its importance, and any hon. Members who believe that good, healthy pragmatism is useful when considering how to solve social problems will join me in that tribute.

Even the Minister would have been surprised to learn what was going to happen to his creation in five years. The fund was very different, set up by the Minister in 1988 in partnership with the Disablement Income Group as a Government-backed independent discretionary trust—I freely admit that we had many apprehensions about that—largely as a result of the gaping hole in the benefit system which resulted from the change from supplementary benefit to income support, with the consequent abolition of the domestic assistance additional requirement.

The new scheme had two purposes. The first was to assist severely disabled people who need paid domestic help or personal care if they are to live in their own homes. The second, as Peter Large said—no one has ever put it better—was to make "the difference between a life in which most of your choices are made by others and a life in which you can mostly choose for oneself".

Those words will come back to haunt the Minister, and I shall explain the fear of many people who work in social provision.

The fund was empowered to make grants of up to £560 a week in London, £520 a week in the south-east and £450 a week elsewhere. As I have said, it was a runaway success. The number of individuals helped with grants has risen from an estimated 850 at the scheme's inception to the figure of 21,000, which the Minister gave. I got the figure of 22,500 from the fund, so we roughly agree. In any case, both figures give the measure of the fund's growth. By the time applications closed in November 1992, it had proved extremely popular and cost effective. Why?

It was so popular because it enabled people to obtain precisely the personal assistance that they needed, which has practical advantages. A private contract allows a disabled person to specify exactly with what his personal assistant is to help, which gives a flexibility that local authority job descriptions may not. For example, district nurses are clearly not supposed to help to clean the floor, but the definition of what they are allowed to do might not fit well with the disabled person's priorities. In any case, district nurses are unlikely to have any say in defining the job description. In addition, there are immense emotional benefits to the disabled. One person who was interviewed said:

"Employing my own personal assistant has given me the freedom to fulfil the type of lifestyle I wish to follow . . . I am in total control of making all the choices in my own life."

Examples of the liberating and empowering effect of the independent living fund abound in all the research.

The Minister will be well aware of the Greenwich survey for which he kindly provided a foreword. The survey shows clear examples of cost-effectiveness. Empowering people saves money; it does not cost more money. Mike Oliver and Garry Zarb surveyed a variety of cases in Greenwich and found that in all the savings were considerable—as much as 50 per cent. The figure given by directors of social services with whom I have talked in the past few days was 20 per cent. to 50 per cent. No one said that the costs were higher; everyone said that the costs were appreciably less.

Oliver and Zarb say:

"Giving disabled people what they say they want is cheaper than giving them what the authorities think they need."

That comment goes to the heart of the matter. Oliver and Zarb also say:

"Our work in Greenwich suggests that providing disabled people with the services they demand may be cheaper than continuing to fund, inflexible dependency-creating ones."

The empowering approach exemplified by the independent living fund is well summed up in recent research by Jenny Morris, who carried out a study for the Rowntree trust entitled "Community Care or Independent Living", which came out a couple of months ago. In tracing the approach to the independent living movement which emerged among organisations representing and controlled by disabled people in the 1970s and the 1980s, she draws a sharp distinction between the conventional view of independence—that people need to be able to do everything for themselves if they are not to be treated as dependent and subordinate—and the more positive and pragmatic view of independence as the ability to achieve goals.

Jenny Morris also sees independent living as a civil liberties issue. People have not only the right to have control over basic living tasks, such as when they get up, when they go to bed, when they go to the toilet and what and when they eat, but the right to have a personal relationship, to seek employment and to engage in leisure and political activities. If those rights are to be more than mere verbiage, measures must be taken to make them effective.

Despite its record of success, the fund is to be abolished. We have given bouquets to the Minister and we have shown a little bit of humility in recognising that we did not understand how good the fund would become. We now come to the hard question. As the fund is so successful, why is it to be wound up and replaced by something far inferior? Despite the fund's record of success, it is to be abolished and its work is to be taken over by two new bodies. The independent living (extension) fund is intended to take over the existing caseload of the independent living fund and the independent living (1993) fund is intended to take on new cases. I was amused when the Minister explained that it was an entirely new body with the same name. I am not sure whether this is a case of changing names to protect the innocent or a case of keeping the same name to protect the guilty. The changes are rather confusing.

There is another confusing point on which I seek to draw the Minister. He paid some nice tributes to the trustees of the fund. He said that the 10 trustees, five of whom were appointed by the Secretary of State and five of whom were from the Disablement Income Group, had done a wonderful job. I hope that the Minister will throw a reception for them and will ask them in to the Department for champagne, or whatever is appropriate. As I understand it, the Minister has not thanked them personally and has not explained to them face to face why good and honest servants who have done a darned good job for five years and who have made the fund the jewel in the crown——

Mr. Scott: I am afraid that we did not run to champagne. However, the trustees have been in for lunch and I have thanked them warmly and personally.

Mr. Sheerman: That must have happened since I talked to the trustees; it was a rapid invitation. I am glad that the Minister has done that.

The trustees with whom I have talked are concerned. They have run the fund extremely successfully for five years. They have a wealth of knowledge that they could impart to the Minister to help the two new bodies, but the Minister has not asked them. Some of them feel frustration and bitterness. They feel that they have done a remarkably successful job, yet their experience is for nothing. Why on earth has the Minister not taken counsel from them and taken their advice in setting up the two new bodies? It is not good enough to say that the new bodies are entirely separate new projects which have little to do with the old one. The trustees have expertise and good will. The Minister has a reputation for listening to and acting on opinions expressed by people who know what they are talking about, but that reputation will suffer. I do not intend to go further on that point.

The funding of the independent living (extension) fund will be limited. I understand that the figure was originally to be £170 million, but that it is now to be £120 million in 1993-94. We are still a bit concerned about that, and I hope that we can talk about that later. The best estimate is that, by the end of March 1993, 22,000 people will have benefited from the fund. From simple sums on the back of an envelope, assuming a minimum average of £110 a week, a total of £124 million is necessary. The figure of £120 million looks close to a shortfall. That is worrying, especially when one considers new needs and the increased needs of some of the people who already draw from the fund. Perhaps the Minister will give us a little more detail on that later. I do not intend to make a great issue of it now, as I am sure that my hon. Friends will say more about it later.

There is a further matter of great importance and great principle. Those over 65 are to be excluded from the new arrangements. In November 1992, 34 per cent. of the independent living fund's caseload comprised people over 65. It is not good enough to say, as the Minister says regularly, that the Government have decided to put the emphasis on people in the younger, working age group, especially as the independent living fund has been enormously successful for people over 65 as well as for those between 16 and 65. To cut off that percentage of the population from a scheme that has been so highly valued seems mean-spirited. We are not talking about a lot of money from the Exchequer. It seems that the change is Exchequer-driven rather than driven by the Minister.

The administrative arrangements for making an application to the independent living (1993) fund are clumsy and complicated. The beauty of the independent living fund has been its simplicity, which disabled people have admired. The Minister made us even more worried when he talked about gateways and gatekeepers, and about local authorities being in the driving seat. Surely we should now put the disabled person in the driving seat. That is what the independent living fund did. We do not want a committee of local authorities and Government Departments having to make decisions for the disabled person.

Mr. Scott: I was at pains on more than one occasion to make it clear that the whole thrust of the care in the community policy was to involve disabled people in the decision-making process about the package of services provided for them. No longer will local authorities tell people what they get. They will ask people what they want and they will seek to provide it.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the attitudes of professionals. I meet many professionals and I believe that their attitudes have changed radically over the past two or three years. They do not simply tell people what they will get. They are moving into a new culture of listening and seeking to provide.

Mr. Sheerman: I am not much mollified by that intervention. The Minister has referred to gateways and gatekeepers, and to local authorities being in the driving seat. If he looks at Hansard tomorrow, he will see that that was the language that he used. The Association of Directors of Social Services, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of County Councils are all worried about the bureaucratic nature of the new arrangements and about the loss of the close direct relationship with the fund that existed under the old ILF arrangements.

Mr. Willetts: I confess that I am becoming increasingly confused as to what the Opposition's policy on provision for severely disabled people is. If the Opposition support the principle of community care, how can they wish to keep the old arrangements for the independent living fund, which are manifestly incompatible with the principle of giving local authorities legal responsibility for community care?

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman is anticipating my remarks somewhat. We strongly believe that policy in these matters should be driven by what disabled people want. Had the hon. Gentleman listened to the earlier part of my speech, he would know that that is exactly what drives the Opposition's policy. I hope to show that it is possible to achieve a proper synthesis between the ILF and care in the community.

Previously, applications could be made directly to the ILF. That was one of its strengths. The new procedures involved what the Minister described in the debate on 25 February as "a tripartite settlement, as it were, between the customer, the local authority social worker and the social worker for the independent living fund."—[Official Report, 25 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 1126.]

What is supposed to happen is that the local authority provides the first £200, then, if it seems appropriate, an application can be made to the fund up to a ceiling of £500 in total. Last week, I telephoned a number of directors of social services. I said earlier that we were concerned about whether the new arrangements—like them or not—would be up and running by 1 April. The Minister must realise that there is an enormous amount of confusion even among people of the professional excellence of directors of social services. Directors place totally different interpretations on the £500 limit. A senior member of the Association of Directors of Social Services believed that if the total sum of an application was more than £500, the person would automatically end up with no independent living fund money and would have to go into residential care. Other directors of social services interpret the £500 ceiling quite differently. Enormous confusion exists among the professionals who, from 1 April—and even now in terms of applications—are supposed to be making the arrangements work.

Moreover, applications are eligible only if the applicant is on the highest level of disability living allowance. Three official bodies—local authority social services departments, the Department of Social Security and the fund—will be involved. That seems unsatisfactory on several counts. First, it involves a clumsy system of divided responsibilities—a recipe for administrative confusion and delay. As I said earlier, the AMA, the ACC and the Association of Directors of Social Services have all picked up on that point and have described the new arrangements as likely to lead to "muddled personal assistance provision for the severely disabled".

That last quotation is from a press release issued by the Spinal Injuries Association.

Secondly, circular LASSL (93) makes it plain that people are supposed to apply for money from the new fund only if they have received at least £200 from the local authority—£210 with the extra £10—and with the approval and assistance of their local authority social services department. The Minister talked about gateways and gatekeepers. What if the local authority department is unsympathetic to the individual? What recourse will there be in such circumstances? What if the authority chooses not to exercise its powers to assist disabled people? We must remember that most of the powers are discretionary rather than statutory. What if the local authority simply does not have the money to supply the first £200? That is possible because, although the £539 million is ring-fenced as a transitional grant for community care in local authority budgets, the money allocated for services to disabled people is not ring-fenced within that ring fence. We know what will happen in some local authorities when that budget is under pressure: the money allocated to services for disabled persons could be diverted.

Mr. Willetts: A moment ago the hon. Gentleman was complaining about excessive bureaucracy in the arrangements. Is he now saying that he wants not just a ring fence in respect of the central Government contribution to community care cases but a ring fence within that ring fence? That would be a nightmare.

Mr. Sheerman: Not at all. There are plenty of examples of money in local authority budgets being ring-fenced for specific purposes. I ask the hon. Gentleman to be a little patient, as I shall return to his question in due course.

The effect of the changes will be to cast doubt on the effectiveness of the new scheme, to introduce a large measure of uncertainty, to disempower disabled people and to move a large measure of control back into the hands of local authority social services departments.

Thirdly, the circular does not make it at all clear what happens if the total application exceeds £500. The phrasing in the explanatory notes to the circular can be interpreted in two ways—either help can be provided up to a ceiling of £500 a week or applications in excess of £500 will simply be ineligible for help. We seek guidance on that, in the interests not of making a paltry point but of trying to help people.

In any case, the £500 limit does not make sense economically as, in many areas, residential care is more expensive than that—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe pointed out the other evening. The Greater London Association for the Disabled did some research on residential care costs and came up with a sample of figures—£510, £605, £800 and £925 a week. Similarly, the British Council of Organisations of Disabled People found that residential charges at the Royal hospital Putney, not far from the Minister's constituency, varied between £605 and £807 a week—again, significantly higher than the £500 ceiling. As a means of saving public money, that ceiling is frankly bizarre and, in our view, will lead to more money being spent rather than less.

Jenny Morris's research for the Rowntree trust highlights another important issue. In many cases, suitable residential care facilities simply do not exist. The alternatives to being empowered to live in one's own home may be a geriatric ward or the nightmare of being forced to remain in an abusive family situation. The Spinal Injuries Association, which has expressed deep and well-argued disquiet over the new proposals, has aptly described the possibilities under the Bill as "imprisonment without crime". The BCODP has made a strong statement to the effect that forced institutionalisation is a breach of human rights, and is prepared to refer the proposals in the Bill to the European Commission on Human Rights in Geneva and the European Court of Human Rights.

In the debate of 25 February 1993, the Minister, referring to the old independent living fund, said:

"a system based upon individual assessment, and on the discretion . . . of individual trustees, has been a considerable success, and has been able to respond much more flexibly to the needs of individual disabled people than any regulated system might have done."—[Official Report, 25 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 1125.]

Well said, sir. The important question is why, having established a proven success in the ILF, the Government now seem determined to move backwards to a far more regulated and less satisfactory system. Is their commitment to individual freedom of choice more apparent than real?

We do not say everything about the independent living fund is sacrosanct and cannot be changed and improved. The Minister is an expert on Puccini, and on his opera "Turandot" in particular. He will remember the princess's lovely line to Calar, "Do not touch me, it is sacrilege". We are not saying that. We are saying that there could be modifications but that the essence of the ILF should be carried on.

The manner in which the changes have been introduced is also disquieting. The old fund closed its list for applications at short notice in November last year leaving existing applicants to rush their applications to completion and causing a hiatus in funding until the new arrangements came into force. I have received many letters from people who missed out because of that and the injustices that occurred.

It is not clear at this late stage who will administer the new arrangements. There seems likely to be little continuity of personnel or expertise. The staff of the Disablement Income Group are extremely demoralised because, despite making approaches to the Government and civil service during the preparation of the Bill, their views were not sought or listened to. Five years of expertise in this difficult and sensitive area have been discarded.

Nor does there seem to have been any real consultation with bodies representing disabled people. The Spinal Injuries Association and others have complained about that. When the ILF is decommissioned on 31 March, it is not clear whether the new arrangements will be set up in time to ensure an orderly continuity to cover existing clients. That is a very real worry. The 21,000 or 22,000 people concerned are very dependent on the effective working of the fund. Although the Minister said that there would just be a different name on the cheque, the important point is whether the cheque arrives in time on the day. That is vital.

The timing is doubly unfortunate. The Government's community care initiative was intended, ostensibly at least, to increase consumer choice. However, just as it is coming into force, the ILF, which has successfully promoted consumer choice for five years for a consumer group whose choices were previously extremely limited, is being quietly strangled. We are not even given the option of leaving the ILF in place in its proven and successful form, at least until community care has bedded down. That would seem to be another enlightened, pragmatic approach in respect of the changeover! Disruption will be piled on disruption and the clients will suffer.

I do not go as far as Professor Oliver, who said:

"So successful has one scheme been in giving users control over their own services that the Government have abolished it. It was called the Independent Living Fund."

That is quite strong language, but very perceptive.

If the abolition of the ILF and its replacement by an alternative and more clumsy scheme makes little sense in terms of service provision, there must be another reason for the change. I suggest that there is a hidden agenda. In a sense, the ILF has been too successful. Its growth from an envisaged total of about 800 clients to some 21,000 or 22,000 has led to a much higher level of expenditure than originally expected, even bearing in mind the lower cost per head. Expenditure rose from £1 million in 1988-89 to £97 million in 1992-93.

If a good grant scheme like the old ILF is available, people tend to use it. That can reveal a higher level of need than was originally anticipated. The Government's response has been to replace a good grant scheme with a bad one. I contend that it is the Treasury's desire to control expenditure that is the real hand behind the present changes, not a desire to improve services. That is the root of the new measures incorporated in the Bill.

The trouble that the Government find with a direct payment scheme is that it tends to make the true level of need very obvious indeed. Under the traditional system of funding services and then setting cash limits on them, that need could be concealed. For example, service constraints could mean that if too many people needed a home help, the home help would come once a fortnight instead of once a week. That disguises the true position. While that may conceal the scale of need, it is totally unacceptable. The proposal amounts to pushing disabled people back into a grey limbo.

In the words of a member of the ILF's trustees, the new arrangements have taken the "spiritual essence of the Fund"

The Opposition believe that the Bill represents a real missed opportunity. I do not say that in a spirit of party debate. I say it in terms of what I have called enlightened pragmatism. The Minister had a great success on his hands. Instead of using it as a springboard and an opportunity to change the lives of disabled people, he has drawn short. He has either gone into reverse or stopped.

As I said earlier, fundamental changes are occurring in our society which the Minister is underrating. Disabled people will no longer accept the definitions of status or situations that were considered appropriate even a few years ago. There is an unstoppable movement for empowerment. In a real sense, the Minister significantly encouraged that movement. He set up the ILF.

The challenge before us today is to listen to the groundswell and the change in ideas and beliefs in the disabled community. We should learn from the experience of the past five years. Those changing ideas were reflected in a report by the Select Committee on Social Services which stated:

"We recommend that the ILF should continue to exist, not only for an interim period, but also after the implementation of community care legislation, and should be provided with sufficient resources to meet the claims of those who meet the present criteria for help from the Fund, and whose needs have not been met through the eventual implementation of community care policy."

Some hon. Members have seen and understood the changes in ideas and know how we must learn from recent experience. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) is not in the Chamber. I believe that he has seen the future and knows that it works. He understands better than most in the House how the empowerment of disabled people comes from giving them resources directly, by giving them the cash and leaving them to make their own decisions.

It may not be too late to improve the Bill or to do something in parallel which could save it. If the ideas of the hon. Member for Mid-Kent were incorporated in the Bill and if local social services departments were able to give direct cash payments to individuals, the result could be a dramatic improvement for disabled people in our society.

The sensible way ahead is always for legislators to listen to the people and to act accordingly. The people affected by the Bill want to be able to empower themselves and the best way to do that is to improve the existing ILF both in statutory rights and in rights of appeal.

The Opposition take no hard ideological line on the question. Sensible people believe in markets and market mechanisms when they work and reject them when they are inappropriate and do not work for people. In this case, we believe that they work. At the end of the day, giving disabled people what they say they want is better and cheaper than giving them what we think they want. We believe that the future priority of all Governments must be to assist the empowerment of disabled people and an early introduction of personal assistance schemes are a right that cannot be resisted much longer.

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): In spite of the very heavy programme in the Chamber involving debate on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, I am pleased that the Government have at last found time for the Second Reading of this important Bill, thus fulfilling the Conservative party manifesto pledge at the last general election.

The final stage of the Government's community care reforms will take effect from 1 April. It is vital that financial support will continue to be given to the most severely disabled people in the community to ensure that they can live in their own homes and exercise the independence which so many of them deeply cherish.

I am sure that I am right in saying that the principles of community care are supported by all parties in the House. The most important aspects of the reforms are choice and the flexibility that the reforms provide for care to be tailored to individual needs and the fact that individuals should be consulted on how their needs should be met.

As president of the Broxbourne organisation for the disabled, which represents disabled people and their carers in my constituency, I have been made well aware of the enormous benefit that disabled people have derived from the independent living fund.

I should like to stress to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott) that, under the new independent living (1993) fund, the fact that disabled people are consulted about their needs must be a key factor in the package of care that is proposed. I accept his assurances that that will be so.

I learned the importance of such co-operation the hard way through personal experience. A couple of years ago, I was challenged by members of the Broxbourne organisation for the disabled to spend a day in a wheelchair. It felt that I should discover for myself that when getting around the constituency grave mobility difficulties must be overcome and that local authorities' good intentions are not enough to encourage disabled people to get out and about and to give them the support and help that they need. I accepted the challenge and realised very quickly that life for those who are wheelchair-bound would have been made much easier if they had had a say in the provision of facilities for disabled people.

My first engagement was to visit a canal barge that I had launched some months before to test the wheelchair lift that was installed to ensure that disabled people, like everybody else, could enjoy the delights of sailing on the River Lee. To reach the barge, my husband, who was acting as my carer, had to push me over a large area of deep cobblestones on the quay. The result was that by the time I reached the barge I felt that I had been given a series of electric shocks. It was the most uncomfortable ride that I have ever undertaken. If only local authorities had thought to consult the users of the facility before designing it.

At the end of my day in the wheelchair I visited the local library, which prided itself on providing good access to the building for wheelchair users. When I arrived, I was advised to attempt to enter the building on my own without my husband's help. I turned the wheels of the chair up the ramp towards the spring doors, only to discover that they opened towards me. As I tried to pull the doors open, my wheelchair started to run backwards down the ramp, much to the amusement of onlookers. Although I have strong arms, it took me about 10 minutes to get inside the library; a weaker person would not have made it. All the good intentions of the architect and local authority were lost because the users of the service had not been consulted first.

I give full credit to Hertfordshire county council, because following this incident it changed the doors to the sliding variety to overcome the problem. There is no doubt that the consultation process is paramount in assessing the needs of disabled people. Their voice should be heard as well as that of their carer, if appropriate.

Severely disabled people value the independence that the independent living fund has given them and I therefore welcome the Bill because it will ensure that that vital support will continue.

The Health Select Committee, of which I am Chairman, is conducting an inquiry into community care. We intend to publish the first part of our report next Thursday. I cannot, of course, reveal our findings or our recommendations, but I have no doubt that hon. Members will find our report extremely helpful and interesting.

5.54 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): The reverse side of this one-page Bill bears the legend:

"Presented by Mr. Secretary Lilley, supported by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Hunt, Mr. Secretary Lang, Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew, Mrs. Secretary Bottomley, Mr. Nicholas Scott . . ."

To be fair to the Secretary of State for Social Security, I prefer to think, for reasons that I shall explain, that the real presenter of this Bill is the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

[Mr. Alfred Morris]

This is in truth a Treasury Bill. The other Ministers named are but camp followers supporting a measure that severely disabled people feel could deprive them of their independence. They fear that sooner or later, unless there is an urgent change of policy, they will be forced into institutions, at far greater cost to the taxpayer than that of enabling the independent living fund to help them.

For severely disabled people, that is what this debate is all about. They see what they regard as their incontestable right to live in their own homes, instead of being shut away in long-stay institutions, being challenged by the new arrangements the right hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott) announced last November.

In my Adjournment debate on the ILF on 25 February, I posed a series of questions about the future of the fund of enormous importance to all severely disabled people. Some were answered by the Minister, others were not. Since then, I have had further answers, but there are still unresolved questions which I want now briefly to raise again. One of them is whether the Minister can give me a categorical assurance that no existing beneficiaries will have to wait for payment after 31 March, when the shutters finally come down on the old ILF.

That question was put to me before my Adjournment debate by Peter Large of the Disablement Income Group, than whom no one knows more about the work and value of the ILF, and he raised it again in a letter I had from him last Friday. His concern is that payment mechanisms—accounts, cheques, authorisation slips and so on—will not be ready in time. Very charitably, he says that the DSS has been "delayed by the Treasury's reluctance to allow a new Fund."

On 25 February, I quoted from Peter Large's earlier letter to me about the fund:

"You can imagine our distress",

he said,

"to see the threat of the ILF being throttled to death".

Recalling that statement, he says in his further letter of 11 March:

"I have to write now to tell you that the ILF as we have known it is dead. The two new funds are but pale ghosts of the original ILF. The assassins from the Treasury have done their work.

From a Fund that will have spent some £117 million helping over 22,000 disabled people last year, we move to a Fund spending in its first year a mere £4 million on an estimated 1,500 people. All pretence of allowing discretion on the part of the Trustees has been ended."

He goes on to say:

"The Trust Deed and the Agreement in respect of both funds effectively stifle all initiative and ensure that all goes according to the demands of the Treasury. Anyone who knows anything about severely disabled people will be horrified to read the four documents."

Thus, Peter Large is in no doubt that this is a Treasury Bill, nor should any of us be in any doubt that, much apart from being a mere supporter of the Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is its real author.

In future, disabled people will have to face questioning by two vetting authorities: the local authority social services department and the assessment officer of the independent living (1993) fund. Both the local authority and the fund will have the power to refuse, reduce or stop help. The disabled person has no right of appeal to anyone. Moreover, an upper cash limit is imposed on payments to keep a severely disabled person out of an institution. Existing beneficiaries and those of the new fund will face intrusive questioning about their private habits and needs.

In regard to the upper limit on payments, the right hon. Gentleman said in reply to my speech on 25 February:

"I do not believe . . . there is anything offensive in our setting an upper limit beyond which it is not unreasonable that people who need help should . . . decide, sometimes reluctantly, that the time has come for them to go into residential care."—[Official Report, 25 February 1993; Vol. 219, c. 1126.]

The Spinal Injuries Association describes this as "a most shocking statement". It asks

"whether £500 is now the going price of freedom in this country?"

The association quotes the case of a severely disabled young doctor, living in the community, who needs more than £500 a week in personal assistance services, and poses the question, "Has his time come?" As my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) recalled, the association sees the upper limit on payments as "imprisonment without crime" and an infringement of that young doctor's civil rights. Whenever before did a Government so explicitly impose a price on personal freedom?

I asked on 25 February for details of the trust deeds for the new funds. Their publication since then confirms the worst fears of the organisations for which I sought my Adjournment debate. As we have heard, Peter Large says that anyone who knows anything about severely disabled people will be "horrified" by the documents the Minister has now published.

There are, however, still two important questions that remain unanswered. The first is what happens to severely disabled people who ask the ILF for help between now and 1 April? The answer, say the organisations that represent them, is that no help is available and that there are even worries about future payments to existing beneficiaries now receiving direct payments from local authorities. The second unanswered question is what happens to existing beneficiaries now receiving direct payments from their local councils? Some councils make direct payments to severely disabled people to enable them to buy in personal help and so remain living in their own homes. Will they be able to continue them?

The independent living (1993) fund has a number of most unsatisfactory features. For example, the upper payment limit includes the local authority contribution in kind of £200. Thus effectively there has been a twofold cut in help: first, more stringent criteria of eligibility have been introduced; and, secondly, the maximum limit for individual payments has been reduced.

As no one will be able to insist that a local authority makes its due contribution, both the council and the trustees of the new fund will have a power of veto. Again, and very unfortunately, the director of the fund's job specification suggests that he "will decide whether its help is the most appropriate".

How will this be decided? Will some existing beneficiaries be referred to their local authorities when they seek more help? The old ILF enjoyed some flexibility in its operation. This has now gone.

The independent living (1993) fund cannot alter the age groups of beneficiaries. The age limits of 16 to 65 are set down in the deed, which also specifies priorities in saying that

"Any applicant who is young and in work should be given priority for receiving financial assistance."

The Minister is aware that, over and above the withering criticisms there have been of the upper limit on payments, there is profound concern about his decision to impose an upper age limit for help. In a statement on its reaction to the Minister's reply to my speech of 25 February, the Alzheimer's Disease Society, of which I am an honorary officer, says:

"We believe the age limit for applications to the successor bodies to the ILF penalises people for being old as well as ill. Such age discrimination is a crude example of a Government minimising public expenditure at the expense of an extremely needful group of people."

Jane Lakey, of the Policy Studies Institute, gave details of an instructive case in an article in The Guardian:

"Mary is 75 and lives with her sister. They manage to stay in their own home with help from the ILF . . . Mary and her sister use their ILF money to employ an assistant to help with shopping, washing and cleaning, which they can no longer manage themselves. Their assistant has become a friend."

Mary is quoted as saying that if they did not have access to the ILF

"They would try to put both of us in a home. And we are happy here, with good neighbours and friends".

I ask the Minister urgently to meet the Alzheimer's Disease Society to hear at first hand about the very disturbing effect of his decision to impose an age limit which, in the case that I have quoted, would most certainly have involved higher public spending and the loss for disabled people of their homes and friends.

The Bill gives powers to make grants to Motability, as the Minister said, as well as to the ILF's successor bodies. As many right hon. and hon. Members will know, I was centrally involved, as the then first-ever Minister for the Disabled in this or any other country, in the creation of Motability; and I have been a patron since its inception 16 years ago. The idea of creating Motability came to me when I was introducing the mobility allowance and we created a wholly unique partnership, one between the Government, voluntary effort, the banks, insurance companies, motor manufacturers and dealers, that has made it possible for hundreds of thousands of disabled people to secure cars. Without it the great majority of beneficiaries would not have a car at all.

Nobody then imagined that Motability would turn out to be such an outstanding success, with a total now of some 350,000 new vehicles supplied since we launched the scheme in the 1970s, If account is taken of the number of people in the families of disabled people who benefit from Motability's work, its beneficiaries must now have reached a total approaching the size of the Chinese army! My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield said that the Minister had a big success on his hands with the old ILF. What kind of success, then, has Motability been?

The success of the contract hire scheme is shown by the fact that well over 85 per cent. of people coming to the end of a three-year agreement choose to have another Motability car. Our promise of financial support for Motability in the original memorandum in 1977 has been honoured by successive Governments over all the years since it was set up; and I am sure that this will continue.

Enormous demands are now being made on Motability's own resources to help where the mobility component of the disability living allowance is insufficient to pay for the car the disabled person needs. The amount spent on grants has risen from £366,000 in 1988-89 to nearly £2,500,000 in 1991-92. These demands make the Government's grant for administrative costs essential. Without it Motability would be unable to continue its work.

I know from my own experience what a huge difference a Motability car can make to many families. Without the scheme often the disabled member would be literally housebound. It was gratifying to learn that Motability's own surveys show that, besides describing the beneficial effects on their own lives, new customers say that for the first time ever they are now able to help others.

I pay warm tribute to the staff of Motability and Motability Finance Ltd., to the enthusiastic co-operation of officials of the Department and to the governors of the charity, who selflessly devote so much time to its work.

Voluntary financial support for Motability will be needed even more in the future; and I am glad it is now undertaking a fundamental review of fund-raising activities. I also note Motability's gratitude to the Department for the creation of the equipment fund, which has made possible grants for the most severely disabled drivers and passengers. At the same time, I am most grateful to the right hon. Member for Chelsea for the tribute he paid in his speech to my part in creating what is a most important organisation for disabled people who are unable to walk.

When the Minister comes to reply, I ask him to do so constructively to the renewed concern I have expressed about the inadequacies of the ILF's successor bodies, to deal with the unanswered questions I have posed, and to offer some hope to the severely disabled people, not least the elderly among them, whose claims I have sought to articulate in this debate.

6.10 pm

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): As we debate this Bill, the centre of our concern should be the scope that it provides for severely disabled people to live independently. I know that is at the heart of the personal concern of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People. He was the father of the independent living fund, just as the Disablement Income Group was the midwife. I pay tribute to them, to the trustees of the independent living fund and to the staff at Nottingham for their achievements since 1988 in making it possible for independent living to become a reality for significant numbers of the most severely disabled people.

We should see support for independent living as, above all, a moral imperative. In a great many cases disability is less a function of physical impairment than a failure by us —family, friends, professionals, society and politicians acting on its behalf—to do as much as we can to enable the physically impaired person to take control of his or her life and to take his or her full place in society.

I was glad, therefore, when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health recently told the House:

"The cornerstone of our community care reforms is the empowerment of the individual."—[Official Report, 26 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 858.]

He was speaking in the spirit of the opening words of the foreword to the White Paper, "Caring for People":

"Helping people to lead, as far as possible, full and independent lives is at the heart of the Government's approach to community care."

Similarly, the social services inspectorate, in its guidance for local authorities on assessment procedures, takes it as a principle that people should

"be in charge of their own lives and make their own decisions, including decisions to take risks."

Those are clarion statements, but I want to be surer than I am that the practicalities of policy remain fully consistent with them. The trust deed that constitutes the independent living (1993) fund contains a provision in section 2, under "Definitions and Interpretations", which states that "pay to" shall include

"apply for the benefit of".

But that is the crucial distinction. To elide it is to travel back to a paternalism and to assumptions about dependence from which it has been the achievement of my right hon. Friend the Minister and of the ILF to carry us forward.

I lay my main emphasis on the desirability of provision to assist disabled people being made in the form of cash payments, enabling them to be in charge of purchasing and organising their own domestic and personal assistance. The Government have no objection to that in principle —that is what the social security system does, what the ILF has done and what the two new funds are to do.

However, the Government raise objections to local authority social services departments making cash payments. They observe that it is contrary to the provisions of the National Assistance Act 1948. In this Bill, we have a legislative opportunity to dispose of that obstacle. The Government raise other objections. They say that there would be problems in defining appropriate eligibility to receive such payments. That problem arises with any benefit and presents no difficulty that cannot be surmounted as a matter of routine. The Government again say that there would be problems of cost control. But the various disciplines on local authority spending are real enough and well known to us all. I see no difficulty in social services departments assessing the value of care that they should provide for a client and paying over the relevant sums, at appropriate intervals, with requirements for clients to account for how the money has been spent, and for a periodic review of assessments. The Government also say that it would be excessively bureaucratic. I would suggest, with respect, that it would be less bureaucratic than the scheme that the Government intend, whereby social services departments will organise, in detail, the provision of the various services required by a client.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health recently acknowledged to the House the extent of support for cash payments. It did not sound like the fiercest opposition when he said that the Government are not ready at this stage to take that on board. I hope that I can assist him to persuade colleagues—whoever they are, whether in the Department of the Environment, or in the Treasury—who need to be persuaded to take that plunge.

Social services departments, of their nature, are unable to provide services to clients with the same sensitivity, flexibility and precision as disabled people themselves. Notwithstanding the personal commitment of local authority staff, bureaucracies are always liable to fit the client to the service, rather than the other way round.

Ann Kestenbaum, in her research for the ILF, and Jenny Morris, for the Rowntree trust, have both documented this in persuasive case histories. Jenny Morris quotes a disabled woman, Elizabeth, who says:

"Yes, sometimes they're very patronising. They're overbearing and they want to do more than I actually need. They want to give help in a . . . this is a hard word for me to say but I'm going to say it . . . custodial sense rather than facilitate. It's a big difference. When you're being custodial you're, well you're dictating aren't you, more or less, you're smothering a person's sense of independence."

That is exactly what we do not want to do. Care in the community must not be institutionalisation in the community.

The simplest way out of that snare is to enable local authorities to pay cash to clients. The psychological and practical value of this to severely disabled people is immense, as the ILF's experience attests. Ann Kestenbaum found:

"When clients and family carers were asked what it was about their care arrangements that they valued most highly, a number of themes repeatedly emerged: choice of care assistant; continuity; flexibility; respite; self-respect; control; and choice of where to live. These benefits were clearly perceived as being directly related to their ability to pay for care."

She cites moving case histories to exemplify those points.

Jane Lakey of the Policy Studies Institute has researched the same issue more recently. I shall quote what some of her interviewees said:

"I know I can feel at ease with people I choose."

"Because they're employed you don't feel embarrassed to ask for too much help."

"I can get the hours that are most helpful to me. Times for lifting and bathing as I wish."

"You can pick who you want. Someone with the same interests"

"You can employ friends. People you know and like and do things you want to do."

"You can tell them more and instruct them and not feel you're begging them to help you."

Other people have commented how important it is to them to be able to give back rather than simply to take.

Only 5 per cent. of the ILF's severely disabled clients have found themselves unable to handle the recruitment and management of their assistants. The new confidence and the enhancement of self-esteeem that the experience provides are restorative and enabling for disabled people. A number of disabled people have used the experience as a springboard to get into work.

Cash payments are, moreover, better value for money. Helpers employed through ILF grants cost less per hour than helpers employed by social services departments and fewer of them are needed as they are more flexible and adaptable in what they will do. Disabled people usually want a streamlined system to minimise the complication in their lives of helpers, equipment and so forth. They have an obvious interest in cost-effective arrangements that enable their incomes to go as far as possible.

Local authorities acknowledge that the money goes further in the hands of clients. At the annual general meeting of the Association of Directors of Social Services last autumn, there was unanimous support for a resolution calling for local authorities to be empowered to make direct payments to disabled people. The association stated:

"The case for direct cash payments, following careful assessment and the application of eligibility criteria, is overwhelming in terms of autonomy, direct management, quality assurance and value for money. In addition such schemes encourage flexibility and creativity beyond that which a local authority may be able to offer."

The Association of County Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities back the directors. I am not aware of any disability organisation that does not agree with them. As it is, however, the Government have not accepted the point and I am apprehensive that the new system to be established by the Bill will produce less satisfactory results than we could achieve. To provide, through different channels, a mix of services and cash will not, I fear, be the best arrangement, in many cases at least.

The Spinal Injuries Association tells us that the average cost of care in its field is £300 per week. There is no way, if the first £200 worth of support has to be provided in the form of local authority services, that the client can, with another £100 from the 1993 fund, design and control his own arrangements for assistance.

It is expected that the new 1993 fund, with £4 million, will support 1,500 new clients in the year. They will receive an average of £50 cash a week compared to the average payment by the ILF of more than twice that. The figure of 1,500 new clients compares with 8,500 new clients for the ILF in 1992. I understand that there is a backlog of 6,500 applicants. It is hard to believe that there will not be some numbers of disappointed disabled people.

The 1993 fund starts with £4 million, which is due to rise to £17 million by 1995-96. It is intended as a fund to top up the provision to be made by local authorities. My right hon. Friend the Minister expressed confidence that it would be sufficient. But it may be as well to remember that the ILF itself was originally conceived as a top-up fund. It started at £5 million in 1988. By 1992, by which time local authorities were contributing in no more than half its cases and numbers were rising towards the present 21,000 clients, its budget was £97 million. I hope that the Government will be alert to recognise any need that emerges to increase the fund beyond present plans. After all, how confident can we be that the extra £26 million made available for local authorities will be applied to benefit the most severely disabled? One local authority has told the Disablement Income Group that it expects to use part of that money for day and respite care for children. The £26 million is not ring fenced for the most severely disabled and it may seep away.

Much depends on whether the money provided for community care generally proves sufficient. None of us yet knows. Local authorities are, however, worried about it and consequently they are worried about the risks that they will take in making assessments of need about the £200 level. The 1993 fund has only £4 million. If the trustees decline to make a grant to a particular client and the local authority has committed itself to an assessment above £200, it will be obliged to meet the full cost. There is, therefore, a pressure on local authorities to minimise their assessments of client needs.

I hope that the £117 million to be provided for the independent living (extension) fund will also be sufficient for its purposes. The fund will inherit 21,000 clients. Latterly, I have been advised—I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will correct me if I am wrong—that it has been paying out grant at the rate of £125 million a year, with administration costs on top of that. Lord Henley has said in another place that all those in receipt of funds from the ILF will be protected under the new arrangements. The very detailed requirements for financial reporting month by month set out in the agreement between the trustees and the Secretary of State mean, at any rate, that the Government will get a prompt alert if that pledge looks like running into difficulties.

I should like to draw my hon. Friend's attention to section 6.1 of the agreement, which adds specificity to section 6.3 of the trust deed by saying:

"the Trustees shall not pay pursuant to the Trusts of the Deed more than £560 per week to or for the benefit of any person."

I may have misunderstood, but it struck me that that might be inconsistent with the statement of my right hon. Friend the Minister of 25 January when he said:

"Subject to its cash limited provision, the successor body will have an unfettered power to review the awards of existing beneficiaries."—[Official Report, 25 January 1993; Vol. 217, c. 587.]

I mention that not in any nitpicking frame of mind, but because it would seem a not insignificant point, as the needs of clients are liable to rise as they grow older and the £560 limit on awards set by the ILF might need to rise over time. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, or my right hon. Friend the Minister, could resolve that difficulty for me.

The Government are setting a limit of £500 on how much can be spent per week to support the needs of a severely disabled person through the local authority and the 1993 fund together. Is it wise, or cost effective, to set this cap? Domiciliary care is pretty well always cheaper than residential. The Spinal Injuries Association has told me of the case of a young man of 28, totally paralysed from the neck downwards as the result of a trampolining accident. After four years in hospital and residential institutions he was able to move into his own flat, thanks to a package of help from the ILF and his local authority worth £650 to £700 per week. If that young man were to have his accident today, he would not apparently be so fortunate. Can it really be the case that the £500 limit would mean his being confined in an institution, which would be more exepensive to the local authority as well as deeply frustrating for him? I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister can confirm that that is not so. If it is, I hope that the trustees and my right hon. and hon. Friends will argue vigorously for an increase in the £500 limit.

By the way, the schedule of meetings set out for the trustees in such detail in the deed will not help them very much in making their case. If they meet only in October to minute the Secretary fo State in November as to their funding requirements for the following year, they will be far too late for the public expenditure survey round. It looks as if the Treasury got at that bit of drafting.

My right hon. Friend said that anticipation of mounting costs is the reason why the Government have set an age limit for new clients of the 1993 fund. I appreciate that my right hon. Friend has positively sought to provide more and better help to younger, severely disabled people who have not had the opportunity to build up savings and pension entitlements. I applaud that, as I am sure we all do, but I am somewhat bothered that section 4 of the first schedule of the 1993 trust deed, as the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) observed, goes so far as to say:

"Any applicant who is young and in work should be given priority for receiving financial assistance."

The annual report of the ILF for 1991-92 shows that 37 per cent. of its clients were aged 60 or over. Already, there is discrimination against people over 65 in respect of disability living allowance. I feel that elderly people have an equal claim on our society for care. Nor need the cost be unmanageable. The Government's own estimate is that it would cost an additional £2 million if the fund were permitted to take on people over retirement age, rising to £9 million by 1995-96. That is not exorbitant.

The trust deed, the agreement and the circular of 4 March between them do not, I think, provide answers to a number of specific, practical questions. Who will apply to the new fund—the local authority or the client? How are joint assessments to be made? How is £200 worth of local authority services to be defined and measured? What £200 buys varies, in any case, significantly in different parts of the country, but that is a different point.

There appears to be scope for confusion and even, I fear, antagonism. Will harmonious co-operation be furthered by the requirement on the trustees in section 8(7) of the deed that, if they are of the opinion that any local authority is not fulfilling its statutory obligations to provide personal care to a client, they should "forthwith report the matter to the Secretary of State"?

Was it necessary to put that in? We do not want disabled people losing out amid disagreement and rows between local authorities and the fund. No doubt rows would be exceptional, but there is a danger that arrangements designed and put together piecemeal will not be efficient.

The relatively complicated processes required are also liable to take a lot of time. If, in order to wind it up, the ILF had to be closed to new applicants four months before care in the community was due to start on its new basis, how much longer will it take for a new, untried and more complicated system to deliver help to severely disabled people? We could have a disturbingly long hiatus.

The new system is due to be operational two-and-a-half weeks from now. After tonight, money can be paid into the two funds by the Department. I understand, however, that much has still to be done to establish the new administrative arrangements. Do the new funds yet have their director? I believe that the ILF staff at Nottingham have had their contracts extended until July, but they have not been encouraged to stay and many of them are leaving. It would surely be preferable to have as much continuity as possible between the ILF and the two new funds. The Department's press notice of 24 November explained that the ILF would be closing the next day "to ensure an orderly handover of cases to the successor bodies".

There is an enormous amount that the successor bodies can learn and inherit from the ILF.

For example, over its five years, the ILF has developed assessment procedures that provide a model which I very much hope will not be discarded in the new system. Will the ILF's admirable social worker's report form be carried forward and used, with appropriate modifications, by the new funds and by local authorities?

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State confirmed, I think, that none of the trustees of the ILF has been appointed to be a trustee of either of the new funds. I understand that there has not even been consultation with them. That seems curious. It is true that the ILF trustees have been rather sturdy people; they have needed to be positioned as they have been between the Treasury and the disablement movement. But I do not think my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Disabled ever minded that.

I recognise, as my right hon. Friend observed, that the new bodies will, in important respects, be different from the ILF. The ILF was a joint charitable undertaking between the Government and the Disablement Income Group. The deeds establishing the new funds preclude independent trustees. The emphasis in the description of the trustees' role is on monitoring and financial oversight. The affairs of the trusts will be run by the director, whose appointment must be specifically approved by the Secretary of State and whose job description is clearly set out in the second schedule. The Government plainly intend to exercise tighter control, as is evidenced by the more detailed criteria for eligibility written into the funds. The emphasis in the documents on management practice, while perfectly proper, does perhaps express a somewhat different ethos.

I do not know whether the outgoing ILF trustees would wish to serve on the new bodies. I hope, however, that they would. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State can appoint another five trustees for each fund. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State did not encourage us to expect this to happen, but I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will, after all, invite some of the former trustees to continue to serve. It would help at a practical level with continuity. I hope especially that, come what may, my right hon. Friend will appoint some trustees who are themselves disabled. That would send a signal to disabled people that their voices are heeded, that their expertise and commitment are valued and that the Government believe it right that disabled people should share ownership of the system which we establish for their support.

I thank my right hon. and hon. Friends for their continuing commitment to the cause of independent living. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister of State and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on their achievement in securing funding for the new trusts. I am sure that they will be vigilant and determined to ensure that funding in the event proves sufficient and that the practical operation of the new trusts, in collaboration with local authorities, fulfils the hopes that the most severely disabled people, and all of us on their behalf, have of them.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), who made a full and, if I may say so, eloquent speech. His interest in the subject is well known. I am sure that his remarks will repay careful study.

I shall begin what I hope will be a brief contribution to the debate with a couple of boring technical points, but I would certainly sleep slightly easier in my bed if I were to receive explanations. First, the Bill is presented under Standing Order No. 48. Surely the Department of Social Security has the power to introduce the grants that we are discussing. If that is so, why is the Bill necessary? Why has Standing Order No. 48 been used to bring the Bill forward? As a fortnight will pass before the new procedure is implemented, perhaps I shall be sent a letter if my questions cannot be answered when the Minister replies.

Secondly, the Bill has the stench of hybridity about it.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is an expert on hybridity.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am receiving some reassuring body language from the Minister. I know that he is a specialist on hybridity as well as crosses from the right wing into the penalty box. That might not be understood by everyone. I wish only to say that the hon. Gentleman is an extremely good inside forward. I have the pleasure of playing in the same parliamentary team. We seem always to get beat.

As I have said, there is an element of potential hybridity. If the Department has considered that, I would welcome some reassurance. It is a peculiar procedure to be giving grants and establishing organisations by means of private deed.

I turn to the substance rather than the technicalities. I feel that the prevailing mood is that the House is rather disappointed that the Government have approached the matter in the way that is set out in the Bill. Hon. Members on both sides of the House, including myself, had misgivings when the independent living fund was set up. We have all come to recognise, however, that it has played a valuable role for a specialist group with extremely severe disabilities. Have we embarked on the best way of making long-term provision for their needs? We have not stepped back to take a longer term view.

There is an argument for continuing with the ILF. I understand, of course, that the position will change after 1 April when community care is introduced, and I welcome that. Community care, in principle, is an extremely good approach. A case could be constructed, however, that people with extremely severe disabilities should be dealt with outwith the provisions of community care.

Perhaps we should start by asking about the entitlement of those with severe disabilities. What should we be offering them? What choices should we be offering them? What do they expect? If we as a community do not help them, they will not be able to help themselves. It is almost a moral question, and it is one which seems not to have been properly addressed. What duty do we as a legislature owe people who have extremely severe disabilities? These questions are not merely administrative or financial. It seems to me that they are much more fundamental than that. I have the feeling that many in the House take the view that the severely disabled deserve better consideration. Our approach should be more thorough and longer term than that which we seem to be debating this evening.

Does the Bill represent everything that people with severe disabilities may look forward to in the longer term? I hope that that is not the position. I understand, of course, that there is a need to make changes because of the consequences of the introduction of community care, but I hope that the Minister will say that a careful review will continue to be undertaken by the Department.

We have had the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys studies and I accept that the Government have done much for the disabled. I do not take the view that was adopted by previous Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. The new management of the official Opposition seems much more reasonable and more sensitive to the real problems. At the same time, the Government must make clear what they believe can be done in future. Surely this is not the end of the story.

Once the new system is up and running we may have time to reflect on what benefits are available, and will continue to be available, as a result of using quasi-independent trustees. I certainly recognise the courage of the Disablement Income Group and others who decided to interpose themselves between the needs of disabled people and the Treasury. It was a brave decision to take and they were vindicated for doing so.

The discretion available to the trustees of the ILF was innovative and the power was used with great skill in sorting out some of the problems and dealing with some of the tight budget constraints that appeared latterly. What experience have we gained from that? Are not we in danger of throwing some of it away in the changes. I hope that the Department will carefully consider the lessons that can be learnt from that combination of independent trustees' discretion and judgment and all the other matters that have formed the system to date. I hope that proper analysis will be carried out so that we can have the benefit of that experience.

I think that the mood of the House reflects my impression that the concept of an independent living fund has been ever so slightly marginalised—indeed, not ever so slightly; it has been marginalised—in the changes, which is a matter of some regret.

A number of administrative questions need to be answered. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon touched on many of them, so I shall not reiterate them. Cash in hand is absolutely crucial. The Government's position in constraining the assistance able to be deployed by the new funds to those of working age is a bit mean-minded. The parliamentary questions to which the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon referred struck me as being good value for money—£2 million, rising to £5 million or £6 million over a number of years. The Government have not yet explained adequately why they have rejected that.

What discussions have there been with local authorities? There was some banter earlier when that point was raised. The Minister plays an old and mean hand at the Dispatch Box and tries to soothe our worries. However, there are real concerns about the consultations that have been undertaken and those that have still to be undertaken, as well as about the shortness of time in which to get the system properly up and running by the date set by the Government.

In an intervention I asked the Minister about the process of reviews and appeals. It is my belief that the Government will end up in court in a short time because some of the elements of discretion that will be exercised by local authorities will put them at the wrong end of judicial reviews in high courts throughout the land. That does not make for good law. We, as legislators, should be absolutely certain that we do not leave the courts to take in our dirty washing because we are not doing our job properly.

Other hon. Members have already called for an assurance that payments will not be delayed by the changeover in the system. We do not want any of the chaos that occurred with the disability living allowance and disability working allowance for all the reasons that the Government have given. We must not put people through that again.

When will we know the identity of the trustees who will share the burden of such a heavy responsibility? I can think of no reason why those who have gained experience with the independent living fund should not be invited to serve on the new bodies.

Who will have access to the trust deeds for the new bodies? They were published on 25 February, but I have not yet studied them to the extent that they have been studied by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon. I assume that they are generally available to Members of Parliament, but will they be made readily accessible to those outside this place so that they can study them and ask questions about them?

When will the regulations—if there are to be any—be introduced? Perhaps the trust deeds will stand by themselves, which would be a strange parliamentary procedure. The guidelines and implementation of the funds would be described, constrained and set out in trust deeds rather than in statutory instruments. If there are to be statutory instruments, will they be subject to the negative or the affirmative procedure? Will they deal with the procedures for review or repeal?

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon dealt adequately with the point about payment in cash directly to the recipient.

I welcome the Motability scheme as a beneficial scheme for those with access to it. However, I am puzzled why the administrative expenses should be so high. If my researchers are right, the scheme cost £1·8 million in administration in 1992-93 for an equipment fund of only £1 million. I accept that increases have been admitted during the course of the changes, and the Minister referred to them in passing—£2 million administration costs for a £2 million equipment fund. Nevertheless, I do not understand why it should cost that amount to administer what I accept is a beneficial scheme but which involves a relatively small amount of money.

What estimates have been made of attrition rates? The Government are being a little optimistic about new people gaining access to what is, in effect, a cash-limited fund. What has been the experience with the rate of deaths among those who have benefited from the fund? It is important to know what provision has been made for increased access by new applicants.

The question of ring fencing has a particular application north of the border. Although there was ring fencing in the community care budget south of the border in England and Wales, the community care budget for Scotland has not been ring fenced. I want an assurance that the Bill and the provisions of the community care budget will not have a knock-on application in Scotland after 1 April.

I want to raise a point about resources and the £500 ceiling. I understand that there are two component parts to that. I cannot think of any way to index that figure. I may be wrong because I have not studied the trust deeds to the same extent as the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon. However, it is an important question and we need to know how the Government intend to achieve some level of indexation for the middle to long term.

The sum of £4 million that has been set for the extension fund is not enough. I need to be convinced that it is anything like enough money to meet the demands on the fund. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon and I referred earlier to an extension to those aged over 65. That matter should be reviewed.

The measures contained in the Bill should have been brought to the House a long time ago. The process of consideration has not been properly thought through. The consultation, such as there has been, with interested parties has been inadequate. The level of resources provided in the Bill appears to be inadequate for the tasks set out. If the needs of those with severe disabilities are to be properly catered for, I fear that the House will need to return to these matters before very long.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): I welcome being able to participate in a debate on legislation in which a clear manifesto pledge is implemented so effectively. The Bill implements this pledge in the Conservative party manifesto:

"The Independent Living Fund has proved a great success in giving severely disabled people an opportunity to live in the community. We are committed to maintaining a fund which supports the most severely disabled people."

The Bill is a distinctive and subtle mixture of continuity and change, which is just what one would expect of the Government. In particular, the continuity comes from the name of the new fund.

An enormous amount of help is now provided to disabled people. The total benefits budget is approximately £15 billion—an increase three times the rate of inflation since 1979. One difficulty in debating that budget and its enormous increase is that many people outside the House think all that expenditure goes on the severely disabled. They do not appreciate that under some of the definitions of disability with which we now work—for example, in the recent work of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys—people with relatively modest impairments to movement count as disabled. There are 6 million disabled people in this country and I am sure that there are right hon. and hon. Members who would count as disabled under some definitions now in use.

None of the uncertainties about what exactly constitutes a disability affects the Bill, because it undoubtedly deals with the severely disabled—those whose disabilities are much more severe than those suffered by people on, for example, invalidity benefit.

The Bill can be traced back to the social security benefit review of the mid1980s and the enormous pressure under which the Government found themselves to simplify the then supplementary benefit rules. I vividly remember the then Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), coming to a meeting bearing two volumes of supplementary benefit regulations and saying that the system was collapsing under the weight of its own complexity. He argued that it was impossible to expect social security office staff to administer a system that had become so intricate.

The pressure therefore was for simplification, so the Government simplified the system to create income support, which is in many ways superior to the scheme that it replaced. But the Government found that many of the specific areas of help provided under supplementary benefit could not be ignored. The domestic care addition, then paid to 6,000 severely disabled people, was a classic example. While moving from a complicated system to a much simpler one, the Government found themselves having to introduce a new element of discretionary help for the severely disabled to replace the old domestic care addition. Hence, the independent living fund was born.

There has been almost universal praise for the discretionary ILF in today's debate, but it struck me that no one referred to the social fund. The social fund was a parallel initiative in providing discretionary help for people in particular need. It had the same origins—it, too, was an attempt to keep the new income support system simpler than the previous supplementary benefit system. I hope that hon. Members who praised discretion today will not, next time that the House debates the social fund, give sermons on how the discretionary distribution of public money somehow contradicts a fundamental principle of the British constitution.

Mr. Frank Field: We have been intervening because we are burying the independent living fund in all but name. Is the hon. Gentleman proposing that there should be a Bill to do the same to the social fund?

Mr. Willetts: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I support the principle of the social fund. With the establishment of the two new funds under the Bill—the extension fund to cover people receiving payments under the old arrangements and the 1993 fund—there will still be an element of discretion in the system. I respect the hon. Gentleman's comment, but it does not address the fundamental point—if discretion is acceptable in respect of the severely disabled, why is it not acceptable elsewhere in the system? The arrangements make a reasonable attempt at providing a framework of general rules by which public money is distributed and for a reasonable element of discretion.

There is a second paradox in some of the arguments made today, particularly by Opposition Members. A perennial dilemma in public policy is the way in which central Government should handle their relationship with local government. We are used to hearing the criticism that ours is a centralising Government taking discretion away from local authorities and denying them the freedom that they need. Yet hon. Members who happily make that criticism are also among those who plead most vigorously for severe limits on local authority discretion when it comes to the new community care proposals that are to be implemented in April.

The hon. Members who argue that ours is a centralising Government are the ones who are the most vociferous in pressing for ring-fenced grants and specific central Government limits on the action that local authorities may take. When it comes to practical implementation, those hon. Members' commitment to local authority discretion seems rather wanting.

We heard today from members of Labour's Front Bench the ultimate logical absurdity, by way of a demand for a ring fence within a ring fence. Labour is not happy with the overall ring fencing of £565 million for central Government grants to local authorities to spend on community care, but wants ring fences within that—for specific assistance previously covered by the ILF. The only business that would thrive under that system would be fence making.

There must come a point at which, if we are serious about giving a role to local authorities, they must have the discretion to exercise their judgment in distributing the enormous sum of public resources available to them.

Mr. Dewar: Does the hon. Gentleman object to the concept of extending local authority power by allowing authorities the discretion to make cash grants in the circumstances of particularly difficult cases? The Minister seemed to be saying—I hope that I am not misrepresenting him—that local authorities are too busy and that administrative difficulties might be created. He gave that as the reason for not allowing such discretion. I hope that the principle of such an extension might appeal to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Willetts: I will refer to that aspect later. The hon. Gentleman's instincts are good in respect of policies that particularly tempt me.

Like many hon. Members who spoke today, I have been much influenced by the work of Jenny Morris of the Rowntree trust, who has undertaken valuable and practical research into the assistance that disabled people particularly want. We all know the buzz words of independence and flexibility. While many working in social service departments recite those words as mantras, research by Jenny Morris and others show that independence and flexibility are still not necessarily the experience of the severely disabled.

I would like to set out some of the lessons of the research about what flexibility and independence really mean. One thing that we have learnt is that receiving domiciliary care in one's own house is not always the best route to flexibility and independence. I fear that we may be going from one extreme to another. Everyone is now supposed to be against institutional care in favour of care that enables people to live in their own homes, but one's own home should not become a prison. People should not be given care only if they stay within those four walls; it should be possible to provide a care package that allows people the freedom to leave their own home from time to time. One of the strong messages of the research is that domiciliary care must not become a sophisticated and up-market form of imprisonment.

It is also important that people requiring care should be able to exercise the maximum choice in the care they receive. One of the anxieties that many Conservative Members have had over the past few months—as Ministers know—is that some local authorities will succumb to what must be a conflict of interests. They are the purchasers of care, yet many are also providers of care. They will be strongly tempted to push as much as possible of their budget in the direction of their own employees. That is why I welcome the 85 per cent. rule, which will require local authorities to spend a very high proportion of the extra grant that they will receive from Government on private providers. There is no reason why services for groups such as the severely disabled should be provided by public sector employees.

Mr. Frank Field: For the first time that I have heard him speak in the House, the hon. Gentleman seems to be caught in a time warp. It is perfectly proper for him and his hon. Friends to point out that it is wrong for Opposition Members to be committed to the idea that public provision must be better than private provision. Is he not making a similar error by saying that the Bill marks an advance because it will tie local authorities to providing 85 per cent. of care through the private sector? Is not the big divide one of freedom? The Bill marks a failure in our attempts to protect and extend the freedom of the individual. It marks an increase in paternalism: no matter what skills the hon. Gentleman deploys in presenting his case, that is what is happening. Whether it is local authority or private provision is a secondary issue; it is less important than allowing people to choose for themselves.

Mr. Willetts: The fundamental dilemma presented by the Bill is whether we believe in community care. Despite the attempts of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), I was not persuaded of the possibility of combining the previous arrangements for the independent living fund with the principles of community care, which give local authorities the lead responsibility for the assessment of the needs and means of people who come within the categories laid down by community care policy. The ILF was established before the implementation of community care policy. It strikes me as unfair on local authorities—and, indeed, inconsistent—to say, "We back community care and believe in this discretion for local authorities, but we are not prepared to give them such a role in regard to severely disabled people." That is the dilemma on which the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and the Opposition Front Bench seem to be impaled.

Mr. Field: It is a simple point. I believe that the lead authority should, wherever possible, be the individual; the hon. Gentleman clearly does not.

Mr. Willetts: I entirely accept that and I was about to deal with it in my speech. The individual—a person requiring care—should be empowered by the policies, if I may use an expression that originated with the new right in America and has now been picked up by the Labour Front Bench. I do not believe that community care makes such empowerment impossible.

Mr. Sheerman: Let me add my voice to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). The empowerment of the individual is what is important. Community care is not such an ideologically iron construct that we cannot build into it the idea on which it was originally based. Originally, it was seen by both sides of the political spectrum as the ability to enhance the development of individual potential. We should subscribe to that concept, but we should apply a criterion—does community care achieve what it was originally intended to achieve? Sometimes it does, in the Government's terms; sometimes it does not. In the present instance, Labour is saying that it does not.

Mr. Willetts: Two different points are being made and Opposition Members are in danger of confusing them. I accept that community care reforms must be implemented in such a way as to give maximum choice and power of decision to those receiving care. That is fundamental and I will come to it later in my speech. I do not think, however, that it follows that community care can be provided only for certain groups and that the ILF must be kept on its old basis for severely disabled people.

It seems to me that the sensible approach is to ask how the new community care reforms can be introduced in a way that maximises power of the individual. We cannot say that the community care policy applies to some groups, while the old ILF structure applies to other groups.

Mr. Sheerman: What would the hon. Gentleman say to the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), who would agree with him about empowerment through community care, but says that that can be facilitated by giving local authority social services departments the ability to pay cash to individual disabled people?

Mr. Willetts: I have already been pressed about that and I shall return to it in a moment. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) has been sadly absent this evening, given the contributions on the subject that he has made in the past.

I accept that our objective is to maximise the independence of the recipient of community care. We should draw on the research that has been done and on our own conversations with severerly disabled people.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I hesitate to intervene when all the experts on compassion are gathered together, but I am rather puzzled. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and one or two others have suggested that the Bill is Treasury driven. I am present only because I do not see why the severely disabled should be subject to a flint-hearted Treasury if that can possibly be avoided. How what money there is should be distributed, whether it should be cash limited and whether local authorities should do this, that or the other is a matter for the hon. Members who have appointed themselves as experts.

Is this a Treasury-dominated Bill? Is it an attempt to save money, or is it an attempt to launch a better and more organised system, whereby the severely disabled 'are treated in the way in which human beings should treat them?

Mr. Willetts: I must confess that, when I hear that the Bill is supposedly Treasury driven, I experience a mixture of emotions, having been a Treasury official for six years. I am not sure whether a Treasury driven Bill is necessarily as terrible as some hon. Members clearly assume it to be. If "Treasury driven" means that a Bill applies sensible criteria to the spending of taxpayers' money—even in regard to social security and benefits for disabled people —I very much hope that this Bill is Treasury driven. I also believe, however, that, within the community care arrangements it is perfectly possible to pursue the crucial objective shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House—that the recipients of care have the maximum power and ability to decide when it comes to the pattern of care that they receive.

There are clear lessons to be learnt from the work of researchers such as Jenny Morris and from our own practical experience of the right and wrong ways of delivering care to those who need it. One of the obvious practical messages is that recipients of care do not like their living rooms becoming like Victoria station. They do not like a host of public employees employed by different services thinking that they have a God-given right to knock on the front door, come in and check on the occupants or deliver some distinct service. It is important to have a limited range of contacts, with one or two people providing a variety of services. For example, I regret the tendency for home helps to be called home carers and to cease to provide the range of services that they provided when they were home helps. That is a perennial complaint by recipients of care services. There is no party element in that comment; the observation could be made by any hon. Member. There is no reason why the proposed community care changes should not help us to address that problem.

Another important matter is the power of disabled people to employ the care that they choose. That has been touched upon in the comments about cash. I am struck by the conversion of Opposition Members to the cause of private employment contracts and the cash nexus. I was brought up when the ultimate hero of the welfare state among Opposition Members was Richard Titmuss, who wrote about the gift relationship in blood transfusions and who thought that bringing the cash nexus of private contractual arrangements into the provision of welfare was corrupting and somehow removed the overriding ethical purpose of the welfare state. Several Opposition Members called for the direct payment of cash, the direct employment of providers and clear contractual arrangements. That represents an extraordinary transformation of thinking about the welfare state. Conservative Members greatly welcome that.

Mr. Sheerman: I was taught by Richard Titmuss at one time. If anything, he was almost the ultimate pragmatist. He said that if a concept worked for the individual and delivered the service it was ideologically sound. If it did not work and did not deliver, another way should be found. To tar Richard Titmuss with a narrow-sighted ideological view of the world is a Treasury reaction and it is not right.

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman, who sat at the feet of Titmuss, will agree, I hope, that Titmuss's definition of the core of the welfare state, its ethical function, was incompatible with private contractual arrangements. There has now been a plea for such arrangements. I shall now discharge my earlier promise to address the issue of whether local authorities should be allowed to give cash to people who need care.

I understand that for local authorities suddenly to become issuers of large numbers of giro cheques would represent a dramatic change in their functions. In effect, they would become branches of the Department of Social Security and instead of changing the way in which care was allocated the Department would be reinvented. However, two arrangements are widely used to avoid the legal obstacle to local authorities giving out cash and they achieve the flexibility that we should like to see. One such arrangement is for local authorities to give money to charities which would then pass it on to people who are in need of care. The other arrangement is for trusts to be established specifically for the purpose of helping severely disabled people. Perhaps the Minister can explain the Government's view of such arrangements, which seem to enable crucial flexibility to be maintained without breaking the requirement that local authorities do not simply hand £10 notes over the counter.

I have spoken about the background to the measure and about the need for independence and flexibility and what those great terms mean in practice. Finally, let me set out two grounds for optimism about the policy on disabled people. We often address the difficulties, but we do not always remind ourselves of fundamental changes that seem to bring great hope to disabled people. The first such change is technological advance. Severely disabled people have benefited greatly from rapid technological change since the war. That has made it possible for them to receive much more assistance and to enjoy much more mobility and flexibility in meeting their personal needs. Of course, it also makes it possible for increasing numbers of disabled people, even those who are severely disabled, to hold down jobs. Advances in computer processes have enabled people with little control over their limbs to carry out remunerative employment. Therefore, I especially welcome the disability working allowance, which is an attempt to encourage the future employment of disabled people. I hope that it will grow from its rather modest beginnings as more and more disabled people hold down paying jobs.

The other cause for optimism is the changing pattern of wealth and income in our society. One of the fundamental changes is that older people are becoming richer. That change is no surprise because in a successful free market economy people acquire assets during their working lives and run them down in retirement. A high proportion of disabled people are older citizens: many of them are over 60.

We speak about disabled people and about the extraordinary transformation in the financial circumstances of retired people, but rarely do we bring the two together and recognise that some retired disabled people hold assets and enjoy the ownership of their home, a telephone, television set and central heating—the sort of benefits that everyone now expects. That increase in wealth and income which is a feature of today's retired population has improved the prospects of many disabled people because they are disproportionately represented in the retired population.

I welcome the Bill and the Government's extraordinary record in trebling the amount spent on disability benefits. Their record surpasses that of any Government this century. I hope that the Minister will address the specific issues that I have raised.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) will forgive me if I do not follow closely on what he said. He made an interesting speech and even had the audacity to quote from the Conservative party manifesto. Anyone who does that is bound to cheer up our proceedings.

I pay tribute to the work of the independent living fund during its five years of existence. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that providing the support necessary to enable disabled people to live in their own homes rather than in residential care is a worthwhile aim. The ILF has carried out its function with great success. The fund has been administered with great skill by the trustees and has become an invaluable source of help for disabled people. About 21,000 or 22,000 disabled people receive help from the fund, and I and many of my hon. Friends wish that the Government had had the wisdom to keep the fund functioning instead of winding it up in this manner.

It has also been a good deal for the taxpayer, a point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). Residential care is very expensive. The small amount of taxpayers' money used for grants from the independent living fund has saved the Exchequer money in the long run. The average ILF grant is about £106 a week. I cannot think of a residential home that could provide care for that sum of money.

Before I discuss the new arrangements, I must say a word about the manner in which the ILF was closed to new applicants. The use of a parliamentary answer on 24 November to announce the closure of the fund at midnight the very next day left many disabled people in the lurch. How could anyone be expected to find out about the closure of the fund and organise the submission of an application within 24 hours? Such a deadline might have been more acceptable had it been announced well in advance, but that was not the case. There was no consultation whatsoever with organisations representing the disabled and no warning was given that the door would slam shut in this manner.

The plight of those trying to submit new applications was made worse by the fiasco over the disability living allowance. The condition that applicants had to be in receipt of the higher rate of attendance allowance or the care component of DLA caused great difficulties for potential applicants because of the mess over the administration of those benefits. I am sure that all hon. Members have received as many letters about this as I have.

Since 25 November, disabled people who would have applied to the ILF have had nowhere to turn. Given the success of the ILF, acknowledged by the Government in the need for the successor arrangements dealt with by the Bill, what justification can the Minister have for cutting off all help between the end of November and April? Was this not a callous act where the money saved was far outweighed by the hardship caused to disabled people?

The new arrangements themselves give great cause for concern. The Government have cut the scope of the new independent living (1993) fund. The new fund is intended to deal with only 1,500 applications per annum and it is being restricted to people of working age. Common sense tells us that the age restriction is a major cut in provision, as the elderly disabled relied heavily on the ILF; 34 per cent. of the ILF's caseload were over the age of 65.

The Minister said in reply to a parliamentary question tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) that the cost of extending the new fund to cover people over retirement age would be only £2 million next year. Will the Minister reconsider this restriction, given the small amount of money saved by it? Again it seems as though the Government are set to cause great distress to the elderly disabled in order to save a very small amount of money. In my view, it is simply not worth it. I hope that the Government will think again.

The Minister made great play of his view that most of the sort of help provided by the ILF will be provided by local authorities, following the introduction of the new community care arrangements. The Secretary of State for Health did indeed announce extra funds for local authorities for this purpose, totalling £26 million next year. However, the fact is that, although overall local authority budgets for community care are ring fenced in England and Wales, the extra money announced by the Secretary of State for ILF purposes is not. Is there not a great danger, given the pressures that local authorities are already under over community care, that this money will be swallowed up in the general community care pot?

It is not only the total amount of money available that causes concern; the restrictions upon its use also cause concern. As I understand it, the criteria for help from the new ILF are that, where the costs of independent living for a disabled person exceed the costs of residential care, he or she will be able to apply for help from the fund. That will happen only after the local authority has assessed the needs of the person concerned. It would therefore appear that independent application to the new ILF is excluded. Instead, everyone will have to go through the local authority.

In addition, the help provided by councils will have to be in kind—I think that it was described by the right hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott) as services. They will not be allowed to give cash grants in the way that the ILF did. The only group who will now get cash grants will be those for whom the costs of living in their own home exceed those of residential care. That is, surely, a retrograde step which will deprive many disabled people of the freedom of choice that they were able to exert under the ILF.

Disabled persons who received help from the ILF could, under the old arrangements, use a cash grant from the ILF to organise their care in the manner best suited to them. How can that be the case under the new arrangements, when most people will not receive help in the form of cash grants? Help in kind is inevitably less flexible than help with cash, over which the recipient has control. I do not understand the Government's thinking, since they constantly claim that choice is a hallmark of their administration.

Are the Government saying that disabled people are unfit to exert free choice? Can they not be trusted to obtain the best help, with the resources available to them? I am confident that local authorities will do their best to administer the new arrangements with the greatest sensitivity, but it is difficult to see how they can match the freedom conferred by the cash grants allocated under the old ILF.

All these new arrangements will need to be carefully monitored. I hope that they live up to the claims that the Minister and others have made for them. I have made it clear that I should have preferred the ILF to continue. Given the Government's determination to end it, I hope that the new arrangements can at least be amended. The least that should happen is that the exclusion of those over retirement age should be rescinded and that help from the new fund should be extended to them.

The Government should also think again about the funding arrangements. I realise that there are pressures upon public spending, but it will be a dark day indeed when we have to start economising on help for the most vulnerable people in society. I hope that the Minister will address some of these points when he replies to the debate.

Mr. Sheerman: As I understand it—perhaps the Minister will confirm this when he winds up the debate —the law in Scotland on cash payments is different. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who is now leaving the Chamber and who intervened several times during my speech, should appreciate that, as I understand it, the law in Scotland is different and that cash payments by local authority social services departments to adults are permissible. Can my hon. Friend and the Minister clarify why that should be so? It means that some bold and interesting experiments that could not be carried out in England could be carried out in Scotland.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. He is right to say that the situation in Scotland is different. We would argue, of course, that in Scotland we do it better. Therefore, we are always willing to give advice on these matters. If, therefore, the Minister wishes to contact me about them, I shall gladly give him advice.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to participate in this excellent debate. I apologise for being unable to attend all of the debate because of developments in Bolton where, tragically, a doctor died from AIDS but did not disclose his condition while treating patients. His name had not been revealed by the health authority, and I have been pressing all day for it to be revealed so that my constituents can at least allay their anxieties on that score. The development of AIDS is another matter for which there may be a need for more care in the community.

I especially enjoyed the opening speech by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People. I should like to place on record how excellent his personal contribution has been. It is fair to say that the independent living fund was his creature. From small beginnings with a £1 million budget, the fund expanded to a budget of more than £100 million and is a good example of how there is nothing so permanent as that which is regarded as a temporary arrangement. I believe that the arrangements now being discussed will prove to be just as important as my right hon. Friend's 1988 initiative.

In 1988, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) condemned the fund by saying that it would be seen as an abdication of the Government's responsibility. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) said, one of the remarkable features of the debate is the coming together of thinking among the parties. The Labour party is now endorsing the thoughts of Conservative Members, which goes to show that the original thinking behind care in the community is now being done by Conservative Members as much as it ever was by Labour Members.

Mr. Sheerman: I know that the hon. Gentleman is an entrepreneur. We know each other in a different guise as co-trustees of the National Children's Centre, which is based in my constituency. It was not the Government who were the driving force behind the independent living fund but the disabled people themselves and what they wanted. If the hon. Gentleman saw a going concern, which was enormously successful and had been running with great acclaim from the consumers for five years, would he, as an entrepreneur, wind it up and start something completely different?

Mr. Thurnham: Firstly, on 1 April new arrangements for community care will come into force. They did not exist when the ILF was set up. Secondly, we have set up two funds which will continue to provide for existing recipients of the benefit and for the topping-up of additional requirements. I am sorry that I was unable to hear the hon. Gentleman's speech, but perhaps he could explain what he is driving at.

Mr. Sheerman: I gave full weight to the Minister's contribution in setting up the ILF, although I also said that it went far beyond his expectations. It was set up because of pressure to fill a void or gap in social security provisions because of changes in the over-arching laws on social security. We were arguing that, these days, such provision should be driven by what the disability lobby and disabled people want. The matter should not be put into the hands of social services departments or other people who will act as a barrier between those who know what they want and a decent independent living fund, which can respond quickly and without intermediaries to existing need.

Mr. Thurnham: The hon. Gentleman has not enlightened me. I should have thought that he would favour the new arrangements for community care, the responsibilities that have been given to local authorities and, now, the top-up. I think that he will agree that, when one is dealing with the most disabled people, one source should not be regarded as the sole provider of all care. It is a matter of partnership and if additional people can be involved, so much the better. I intend later to cite the cases of one or two constituents who feel that the partnership still needs developing because the carers are contributing the most.

We are setting up the independent living fund anew, with two new arrangements. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that as an additional provision to those of the local authorities'.

Mr. Sheerman: We shall have a system which will be less well funded. To get help, a disabled person will now have to go through what the Minister called "gatekeepers". The hon. Gentleman was here for the Minister's speech although he did not hear mine so he will have heard that the gatekeepers will be the local authorities and the new independent living fund, which will send their own social workers to make an assessment. The DSS will also have a role. There will be a new bureaucracy instead of the direct relationship which, knowing the hon. Gentleman, I should have expected him to applaud. There will no longer be a direct relationship between the disabled person and the independent living fund. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands that the Bill will put three intermediaries or gatekeepers into that relationship. Why on earth should disabled people want gatekeepers between them and their express needs and desires?

Mr. Thurnham: The hon. Gentleman begs the question of how well local authorities will carry out their duties. Under care in the community, it is clear that their duty is to assess what the needs are and then establish how they are to be met. If there is to be an additional provision, I welcome it. I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman suggests that one should ignore local authorities' responsibilities. They are important responsibilities and cause me great concern in case they are not exercised correctly.

In the past few days I received a letter from a family in Bolton. It runs to nine pages so I shall not read it all. It is from Mr. and Mrs. Whiteley who describe eight years of the most intolerable incompetence by the local authority, as a result of which Mr. Whiteley lost his job and the family lost their house while the council said first one thing and then another about help in caring for their son Andrew. He is now nine years old and suffers from spina bifida. Caring for him is more than Mrs. Whiteley can manage on her own. The local authority has messed this family about so much that Mr. Whiteley had to give up his job, and the family have lost their house, because of the administrative confusion.

It is most important that local authorities carry out their responsibilities properly. In that respect, the Government should be congratulated on the provisions that they have made. There has been a substantial increase in financial provision, with a trebling of the money for care, which has increased from £5 million to £15 million in real terms over the past 14 years. There has also been a substantial increase in the number of people provided with care. When the Labour party was in power only 360,000 people received help with the cost of care or mobility. Now, 2 million people receive such help.

Although there have been criticisms of the way in which the benefit agencies introduced the new allowances, substantial numbers of people have benefited and in a shorter time scale than when the Opposition introduced the mobility allowance and took four years to deal with far fewer people.

I have just received a letter from Mr. and Mrs. MacDonald—Iain and Wendy—of 25 Rose Lea, Harwood. They say that the new arrangements are working well. Mr. MacDonald wrote to appeal about one matter relating to the disability living allowance but says:

"I am, however, completely satisfied with everything else. Thanks to your intervention my case has been handled personally by Mrs. Pauline Padley, Customer Service Section, Invalid Care Allowance Unit, D.S.S. Palatine House, Lancaster Rd., Preston. I cannot stress too highly the sympathy, help and understanding she has given to myself and my wife. She is a credit to herself and her Department . . . if the time could be found . . . to thank her I know how much it would be appreciated. It is the only gesture I can think of that would be in keeping with her continuing efforts on our behalf."

I quote that letter as an example of how well the Government are making the new arrangements work. In this case, the invalid care allowance is the important benefit which the MacDonalds are receiving.

The calls for additional top-up funds through the new independent living funds will become greater. Just as the original fund grew from £1 million to £100 million—this is the point made by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman)—the demand on the new funds will be substantial and will grow.

I refer to a letter that I have received from Mrs. Cummings of 280, Hough Fold Way, in my constituency. She cares for her adult son David who is severely handicapped and she points out that the funds that she gets at present from the independent living fund are supposed to be sufficient for 21 hours of care per week. She finds that the costs are greater than the amount that is being provided by the ILF, leaving her out of pocket. Each month, the ILF provides her with £322, but each month she actually pays out more than that and receives less care than the 21 hours that she is supposed to be able to receive. She would like the ILF to have greater funds for her requirements. She would also like additional funds to cover respite care so that she and her husband could have a holiday. The funds that they have at present are not sufficient to provide for that.

Mrs. Cummings gives the example of how Crossroads care committee in Bolton has arranged to fund one family with £8·50 a week to buy in care at the weekends. However, Crossroads charges £8·90 per hour at weekends. So the amount provided is not enough for one hour's care. She also refers to other recipients of care from the Crossroads fund who do not receive enough to meet requirements. She gives the example of a family who are allowed £200 a month by the ILF, although the amount required for the number of hours of care specified would come to at least £240 on current costing. Again, she presses for further help in that respect.

Mrs. Cummings then points to the extra costs that arise when people suffer from incontinence. I should like the Government to consider the better provision of incontinence aids because the costs of such aids can lead to substantial extra charges for individual carers who find that the supply of aids as arranged at the moment is insufficient for their needs.

I am delighted to say that a new respite care centre is being set up in Bolton through the voluntary arrangements worked out with the Bolton Handicapped Action Group. I commend its work to the Minister and I hope that he will have an opportunity to come to see its work. The group has set up in partnership with the health authority and now, I believe, with the local authority to provide a package of care. It will manage the new respite care centre which, I am delighted to say, will be called Grosvenor House, thanks to the support of the Duke of Westminster who was happy to lend his name to the initiative.

I confirm that the way in which the Government have provided additional funds will give the flexibility that is so important with care and especially for those who are the most severely disabled. At present many people's care packages cost less than £500 a week because of the uncosted input of the individual carers. There is anxiety about the possibility that if carers cannot contribute fully and if care has to be bought in, sufficient care could not be provided for £500 a week. That raises the threat of the person who is disabled being moved into a home against the family's wishes. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would consider that aspect and if he would give assurances that the future level of care limits will be reviewed so that people need not fear that the one for whom they care so lovingly may be moved into a home that is not of his or her choice when the family would prefer that person to be able to live at home if funds were available.

I commend the Bill to the House and I congratulate the Government on their record of care for the disabled. I look forward to a continuing growth of the funds for people with disabilities. Although the Opposition have had thoughts on these issues, when in power they failed to fund the requirements of the social services budgets. Only this Government have been able to find the money to provide for such a substantial increase as we have seen to date and which, I am sure, will continue.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): As we near the end of the debate, it is important to recognise that we have heard many good speeches and two very brave speeches. As has been said, one such speech was made by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts). He quoted from the Conservative party manifesto and thus nailed once and for all the vicious rumour among the Opposition that all the copies had been collected up, ring fenced and burnt. It is unfortunate that he did not have time to quote other pledges in the manifesto so that we could debate them, too.

The other brave speech was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). Waxing strongly—rightly so—about Motability, he compared the numbers benefiting from Motability with the size of the Chinese army. To have made that comparison on the day that the Foreign Secretary made a statement about Hong Kong was brave. Motability may soon have its finest hour. The hidden message in my right hon. Friend's speech will not be lost on military strategists in Beijing.

The key words today have been cash, care and choice. We are at the interesting stage of looking more rigorously at the association and interface between care and cash and, therefore, at the interface between two Government Departments—the Department of Health and the Department of Social Security. As a new Member of Parliament, I am struck by the fact that one cannot ask parliamentary questions about how one Department co-ordinates with another, yet in many respects today we have been discussing that very theme. Increasingly in social policy we are dealing with matters that cut across departmental boundaries and we need to get the discussions right in this area.

We are also approaching 1 April when principles, policies and philosophies about community care will be tested by realities and by practice. The timing of this debate is good. There is widespread agreement that the goals of community care are right and that they are goals that we all want to be implemented. The White Paper "Caring for People" said that the components of community care included

"services that respond flexibly and sensitively to the needs of individuals and their carers; services that allow a range of options for consumers . . . services that concentrate on those with the greatest needs."

In discussing the ILF, we are often talking about those with the very greatest needs.

All the objectives are excellent, but we must now ask tough questions about the practice. I hope that we shall do that during the rest of today's debate and in Committee. There is a sense in which, as we approach 1 April, the waters of community care are becoming murkier. As we move towards the end of March, there is a sense that we are moving towards, not greater clarity, but greater confusion. In certain letters that have been leaked, although not always published, we are hearing more about costs and less about choice. I worry about that.

This is an appropriate opportunity to ask Ministers some clear questions. Is there now a limit on what social services authorities can spend on those with disabilities? Is the £200 limit now a clear limit?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt) indicated dissent.

Mr. Wicks: The Minister shakes his head, and I am pleased about that. I should like clarification of that point. In the social work press and more widely, there is concern that Government officials and the social services inspectorate are now warning local authorities that they should not offer too much to clients. The Minister may want to correct this. A headline in The Independent—which never tells a lie—on 12 March read:

"Councils told to 'hide' care services shortfall".

The article said:

"The Department of Health has advised social services directors to keep secret the services they lack after community care comes into force next month.

In a letter, an official says that they should not give people a list of nursing and community care services which they ideally need, in case the council is sued for maladministration if it cannot afford to provide the service."

Given that we are all agreed on the objective of openness and the need to bring carers and the cared for into the discussion about care packages, how can such secrecy be part of the deal? The Minister may want to shake his head again. I hope that, in conjunction with his colleagues from another Department, he will be able to tell us that social service authorities are not being cash-limited in that way. If they are, there can be no effective and honest partnership between those needing care and the care providers, which means that the objectives will not be fulfilled in practice.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed concern about the £500 limit. If we are to judge community care partly by the extent of its impact on people in the greatest need, the question of the £500 cash limit, which will inhibit proper community care, is crucial. I hope that the Minister will say something clear and reassuring about his willingness to consider amendments in Committee. I understand that, at present, fewer than 1 per cent. of those benefiting from ILF money will be affected. I take that point. Nevertheless, that represents a significant number of individuals.

Moreover, I think—and I shall be happy to be corrected—that, in practice, the £500 is a larger sum than is implied because, under the old ILF scheme, one could also get support from social services. If that is now being costed at up to £200, more than 1 per cent. may be caught by the care trap. I seek clarification on that.

Whether we are talking about one or two people or several dozens or more, the crucial question must be what will happen in practice. What happens if the care package that is devised costs £600 or £700, as it may well do in the most extreme cases? Will that person have to go into institutional care? Some say that they will have to be dragged screaming and kicking if that is the case. Again, the Minister shakes his head.

What happens if the social services department cannot afford to spend any more under the cash limit, given that the ILF regulations specify that the figure must be no more than £500? I am told that we are talking here about some of the most serious cases of paralysis—people who have broken their neck in a road accident and those suffering from multiple sclerosis or are in the more advanced stages of motor neurone disease.

To those listening to the debate, £500 may seem a great deal of money—and it is a great deal of money—but a great deal of money is needed if someone who requires round-the-clock care is to be cared for in the community rather than in residential care, which is the principle to which we all aspire.

As has been said, there is, in any case, no sense in asking a person to move into residential care if that will cost more than a package that could be devised. The individuals affected may be few: it would be nice to have some estimates. In any case, what happens to them will be a key test of the Bill, and we need to consider that both today and in Committee.

I am worried that what should be a new dawn for community care is fast becoming a debate about residential care not only as regards the ILF and its cash limit per person but in different ways. Certainly, all the initial controversy following all fools' day will be about residential care—about whether people are having their costs paid and about the concerns of home owners.

I have another fear. As a result of the Government's ideology and dogmatism, social service authorities will have to spend 85 per cent. of the new money on the so-called independent sector, which is predominantly, although not exclusively, the private sector. The private sector is mainly—again, not exclusively—in the business of institutional care, so that will pull the money towards institutional rather than community care. If, as we have said today, the £500 limit stays and we cannot shift the Government on it—I hope that we can—some critical cases, who, despite terrible disabilities, live in the community and often thrive in and contribute to it, may be moved into institutional care.

Moreover, there must surely still be many people suffering from terrible conditions who are in institutional care but who, in the right circumstances and given the right opportunities, cash and care—and, of course, the choice—could come back into the community and live more fully than they do at present. Let us not forget that group. We need to think how we can enable them to come back into the community if they want to. Can they do that with a package of care costing £500? Some will need more, and that is an important point.

The theme of cash or care and the association between the two Government Departments may be a more fundamental theme for the future than this small but important measure concerning the ILF suggests. Our society is faced with important questions about the costs of disability and aging. We know that the Bill does not cater for those over 65, but we have to consider the costs of disability and aging and who should meet them.

In future, in some of our mainstream debates about social security, and not least about pensions, we should ask about both the private sector—occupational pension schemes—and the public sector—the national insurance fund—and determine whether the risks against which we should insure ourselves include the risk of the need for intensive care as well as pensions. If we discuss pensions on one day and community care on another, we start to make great mistakes about the risks facing us in our later life and the different ways in which we should insure against them.

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I am glad that the Government have found time for it in their programme. At a time when many of our attentions seem to be diverted overseas, it is nice to find time to consider matters rather closer to home which have a direct bearing on many of our constituents' daily lives.

The Government's priorities for disabled people can be categorised in three ways: first, a desire to enable people to live as independently as possible; secondly, a commitment to target more resources on people who are disabled in a way that recognises their particular needs; and, thirdly, a commitment to look at their wider entitlement and interests to enable them to play as full a role as possible in society. The Bill addresses all three.

Hon. Members have referred to a number of the ways in which the independent living fund has grown over the years. It has grown from £1 million in 1989 to £100 million today and is now helping 21,000 people, or more—this is one of the rare occasions when the Labour party is saying that we are helping more people than we say we are helping. The Opposition's support and encouragement on that are welcome. The House should be reminded that the introduction of the ILF was criticised and questioned by the Labour party. In listening to the Opposition's concerns today, we should bear in mind the fact that they have not always been fulsome in their support.

We should also bear in mind the fact that the fund has helped far more people than were being helped under the old supplementary benefit system. Before 1988, 6,000 people were being helped to the tune of some £30 per week. Today, 21,000 are being helped with a weekly average of over £110 per week. That shows clearly the Government's ongoing commitment.

That takes us to where we should go next. There can be no doubt about the success and popularity of the ILF. We must accept, however, that the benefit was introduced initially to help the most severely disabled people. All of us have had constituents come to us and say, "My friend down the road has been given support from the independent living fund. Why can't I, since my condition is similar?"

Inevitably in such cases, the boundaries become frayed and, in time, they are enlarged and more people benefit. It is very good that we can claim to be supporting more people than we ever envisaged supporting. However, we must also remember that the intention is to help the most severely disabled. The proposals will enable that intention to be maintained.

We must also consider areas where there is clear consistency, not just in name, but in the way in which the fund will operate in future. Through care in the community, it is the intention that care should be tailored to meet the individual needs of disabled people and that the structure of the support should be flexible to allow that to happen.

Also, and this is paramount, individual disabled people must be involved in determining how best their care needs can be met. We must stress, and the Government have made it clear, that the needs and wishes of disabled people should come first.

Mr. Bradley: If the package designed by the local authority conflicts with the wishes of the individual, would the hon. Gentleman support the right of an appeal system within the proposals?

Mr. Hendry: Any new system develops over time. We do not set a principle in cast iron and then, 20, 30 or 40 years later, say that it should not be changed. We must consider how the system operates and identify the difficulties. If flexibility or alterations are required in time, that can be achieved. To suggest that we are simply casting something in stone does not reflect historical precedents accurately.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): In the care in the community programme, we are dealing with local authorites which are ultimately governed by elected councillors and subject to the pressures of the normal lobbying process, not least the letter to the Member of Parliament asking him to intervene on behalf of the client concerned. Does my hon. Friend agree that the idea that we are creating a system in which there is no appeal procedure, redress or comeback is entirely false?

Mr. Hendry: I agree with my hon. Friend. Many of us have received letters from our constituents about the independent living fund. We have raised cases on their behalf and have been able to ensure that those cases were reviewed properly and effectively. Members of Parliament can and do properly play that role.

I would also like to consider the fact that we recognise a need for change, but are also trying to establish a principle on a secure and long-term footing. On several occasions in my constituency, parents who are inevitably getting older have expressed their fears about their severely disabled children who may now be in their teens or twenties. They want to know how their children will be supported when they have died. That is an immensely responsible attitude.

From the conversations that I have had with such parents, and having seen their sincerity, I have no doubt that they would like their disabled children to be looked after as much as possible in the home where they were brought up within the community. Parents recognise that in familiar surroundings it will be easier for their children to face the pressures.

Several comments have been made about the role of the disability living allowance. Introducing something as large as that in one go has caused teething problems. I commend the Government for being willing to introduce something on a scale which will help more than 250,000 people. I commend them for introducing it in one go instead of phasing it in over four years, as the Labour Government did with mobility allowance; that helped only about 5,000 people. The Government took a brave and important step.

There will inevitably be a rush of cases and a huge administrative caseload to be handled. However, I congratulate the Government on the way in which they have reacted to that and I congratulate the people working in the benefits offices on the way that they have dealt with those problems. As a result of their efforts, 60 per cent. of claims are cleared within a month and older people are being targeted as priorities.

I am aware of cases in my constituency where people have felt that their cases have been delayed unduly. However, in relation to the vast number of cases that have already been handled, I have no doubt that the majority are being handled efficiently and effectively. There is now a system in place which is trying to push matters forward.

Mr. Bradley: What does the hon. Gentleman think about a situation in which the application of one of his constituents may have been delayed and missed the cut-off point? That person may have been awarded DLA, but would not have been able to apply to the ILF. Should such a person be compensated because he or she was unable to receive help from the ILF?

Mr. Hendry: One of the difficulties in implementing change is that there must be a cut-off date. We cannot get away from that. If after the cut-off date we say that anyone close to the cut-off date will receive special remedial treatment to ensure that that person does not receive less money than he might otherwise have received, we completely undermine the principle of change. If we are to make changes and tough and sometimes brave decisions, we must accept that there will be difficulties.

It is easy for the Opposition. They are not trying to raise taxes to pay for the support. They are not responsible for Government decisions. It is easy for Opposition Members to say time after time, "Let's throw more money at it." As it is not the Opposition's money, they can spend it as if it is going out of fashion. That has always been the Opposition's tendency. However, if the Opposition ever want to be taken seriously as credible politicians, they must accept some of the financial facts of life.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend has just referred to the Labour party as the "Opposition". In a number of town halls around the country, the Labour party is charged with and is responsible for the delivery of services. From my experience and from the reports from constituents, I have noticed that many restrictions are placed on home helps —or, as they are now called, home carers—which include trade union restrictions and limits on whether they can work at weekends. I have heard that carers have been told that they must not work at weekends and they have had to do that work in secret. Opposition Members have said that they want more openness when such extraordinary arrangements are taking place. Does not that show that, when the Labour party is in power locally, things are very far from perfect?

Mr. Hendry: As is so often the case, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. I would like to pay tribute to the incredible amount of work that he has carried out on behalf of disabled people through his involvement in charitable work and in pushing their case in the House.

I need no lectures or advice from my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) about the difficulties involved in living with a Labour local authority. My constituency is in Derbyshire and we have one or two problems with our county council, not least in that area. It consistently refuses to charge for home helps. To suggest to people who, in many cases, have significant resources and would be happy and keen to pay towards the costs of home helps that they may not do that is absurd. Ultimately fewer people will receive home helps because there is no way of getting the additional resources from the people who would be happy and willing to pay towards that provision.

Mr. Jenkin: It is important that we do not tar all Labour councils with the same brush. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to Strathclyde regional council, with which I became familiar when I contested a Labour stronghold in Glasgow, Central in the 1987 general election. That council made a very bold move, probably unconsciously, realising that it was privatising its social services, when it made its social workers self employed. The council employed people on piece-work contracts which effectively made the work force much more flexible so that they could provide a much more flexible service to clients. I would not always criticise Labour local authorities in the way that my hon. Friend has just done, although there is always justification for doing that in certain cases.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The debate is now ranging rather widely. If hon. Members will keep their comments within the boundaries of the debate, we shall be able to discuss the Bill thoroughly.

Mr. Hendry: I am grateful for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall come directly to another aspect of the Bill that is worth our attention—Motability. All hon. Members will welcome the enormous growth in the provision of cars for disabled people under the Motability scheme. Since 1977, Motability has had a tremendous record for supplying cars. It hardly seems possible that in November 1991 Her Majesty the Queen presented the 250,000th car, yet less than two years later the Prime Minister will be handing over the keys for the 350,000th car. If we look at the number of cars that were provided last year, it presents an astonishingly good picture of an organisation that works effectively. In 1992, there were 75,195 applications for a car under the scheme, of which 63,745 were granted. That is an amazingly high figure and is a testimony to the way in which the Government have backed Motability by contributing to not only its running costs but its capital costs. The Government have worked in conjunction with the private sector, car manufacturers and those who convert cars to provide a real benefit to many members of the community.

[Mr. Hendry]

I became aware recently of the case of a multiple sclerosis sufferer whose family had not taken a holiday together because of his inability to travel around the country. With little support from me, Motability moved fast to provide and convert a car, and as a result he and his young family enjoyed a holiday. I pay tribute to its work and the way in which it has helped countless thousands of others. More than 140,000 people have cars under the Motability scheme.

We should be grateful for the increased quality of cars. Not many years ago, we lived in mortal fear not of the quality of driving but of the fact that dangerous little three-wheelers were scurrying around the streets, posing a threat to many others. Disabled people can now have not only the dignity but the comfort of a standard car under the scheme, which is a tribute to the scheme and what it has been able to achieve.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): I hope that my hon. Friend will give credit to car manufacturers and banks for the help that they give to the scheme. Many hon. Members often attack the clearing banks for their behaviour in some sectors, but this is one area where they are contributing much to helping disabled people.

Mr. Hendry: I willingly do so. I paid tribute to the way in which car manufacturers have helped. I extend the warmth of my congratulations to the banks.

The significant increase in resources allocated to the independent living fund has demonstrated the Government's record of support for disabled people. When the Government took office in 1979, 360,000 disabled people were receiving help with the costs of their care and mobility but the figure has now increased to 2 million, which shows how vastly increased our commitment to disabled people has been in the past 14 years.

This year, £14·9 billion will be spent on the long-term sick and disabled, which represents an increase of £9·9 billion in the past 14 years. Any Conservative Member who suggests that the Government lack commitment in looking after the needs of disabled people need only look at those figures to realise how substantial our record of support has been.

The Bill deals with disabled people as whole; real people rather than simply statistics and numbers. I will not rehearse a range of arguments across education, transport and other matters but will consider a couple of aspects, the first of which is the right of disabled people to employment. I was very pleased and honoured recently to open a conference in my constituency on behalf of the placing, assessment and counselling team in Derbyshire, which considers how employers can better take account of disabled people.

One of the things that struck me most during that seminar was the way in which the scales fell from the eyes of local employers who believed that there may be problems in hiring disabled people but who gradually realised that they should look beyond the disability at disabled people as whole people and hire them on the basis of their strengths and skills. One small element in that concept was the way in which the Government changed the title of my right hon. Friend from the Minister for the Disabled to the Minister for Disabled People. The Government recognised that they are disabled people and not an analogous lump. The more that employers do so, the better it will be not only for disabled people but for companies and employers.

I pay tribute to companies in my constituency that have gone way beyond their quota in hiring people who have disabilities. One firm, Otter Controls in Buxton, has made it a policy to take on people with disabilities. Despite the difficulties of the recession, from which it is now recovering, it has done all that it can to ensure that it continues to be a major employer of disabled people.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The hon. Member referred to the right of disabled people to employment. He will know that there is very strong feeling in all the organisations of and for disabled people in Derbyshire, in particular, about the importance of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill. May I take it that the Bill has his support? I know of the hon. Gentleman's interest in this field. He will know how strongly the Bill is supported by the organisations of and for disabled people in Derbyshire.

Mr. Hendry: I have told the organisations in Derbyshire that have made representations to me that I feel that the position taken by my right hon. Friend the Minister is correct. The Government wish to proceed through voluntary measures, and if that does not prove sufficient my right hon. Friend will reconsider legislation. I am instinctively opposed to unnecessary legislation. The rights of disabled people are immensely important, but it is much better to use voluntary procedures than to introduce legislation and the difficulties that go with it. As the legislation on equal opportunities for women and race relations have shown, there are inevitably difficulties when enshrining sufficient rights in law.

The final matter that I wish to consider is access for disabled people. I commend a young lady in my constituency who is significantly disabled and who recently was pushed around the town of Buxton in her wheelchair by a disabled colleague. She took her video camera to try to highlight for the benefit of people such as myself who are blessed in not suffering from the disabilities that she has the day-to-day problems that disabled people experience in trying to live their lives as normal people. A lot of Buxton was designed by the Georgians, who believed in pillars and lots of steps, so it is not easy for a disabled person to move around in a wheelchair. The town was built on many slopes and hills, which makes life more difficult. My constituent's work has done much to bring to the attention of the county council and myself the difficulties that disabled people face.

The Bill gives us the opportunity to look more generally at the needs of disabled people but particularly at the way in which we look after and service the needs of the most severely disabled people in our society. I commend the Bill and recommend that the House gives it a Second Reading.

8.18 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): My hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) has given us an able assessment of the benefits of the Bill. Indeed, throughout the debate hon. Members have successfully explored its benefits for severely disabled people. I should like to comment on the contribution by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) before he leaves the Chamber, and in due course on the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts).

In a debate on a motion relating to the Bill of the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe——

Mr. Alfred Morris: The Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful. In that debate I thought that we explored extremely well the subject of disabled people and civil rights. It opened my eyes to some of the disadvantages of the current set-up.

I remain unconvinced, however, that civil rights legislation in this area would solve the problem that it seeks to solve. There has been a gradual increase in the number of disabled people in employment and the disabled working allowance is proving of benefit, providing encouragement and incentive, not compulsion. That seems a better course.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the debate in the House on my Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill on 26 February. He will know that the issue was debated for five hours on that day and that the motion was carried by the House after the Minister had spoken. I hope that he shares my pleasure in that decision by the House of Commons on that day. It is certainly shared by all the organisations of and for disabled people.

Mr. Jenkin: I certainly take note of the House's decision that day, although of course there was not a large number of hon. Members present to vote. I take note of the view expressed by the House in the early-day motion on the subject. I pay tribute to the right hon. Gentleman for the campaign that he has waged—no one in the House has contributed as much to the debate on disabled people. I am sure that that debate will continue and that we will all continue to listen to the points that the right hon. Gentleman makes. The debate is by no means over.

I want to concentrate, first, on the purpose of the Bill; secondly, on the funding provided to enable it to be put into effect; and, thirdly, and perhaps most importantly, on the principles of assessment that will be used to apply the benefits of the Bill. I should begin, however, by discussing the background and the financial restrictions under which the Government are working.

We have a huge budget deficit. I am impressed that this debate should be taking place not to moan about the quantities of funding available, but, in a constructive spirit, to discuss how best the limited funds available should be allocated. That is a tribute to both sides of the House.

This Bill, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant pointed out, fulfils a manifesto pledge that we made at the general election. Its purpose is to help with financial support for the most severely disabled people. It unashamedly builds on the success of the independent living fund. I do not regard it as a step backwards from that fund; I regard it as an extension of the work of the fund, although we are delegating much of the responsibility for that to local authorities.

The Bill establishes the extension fund, supplementing the independent living fund, and the 1993 fund for new applicants, but it is the partnership with local councils that will represent an advance in the provision of care for the disabled—it is not a step backwards.

Secondly, the funding provided for the implementation of community care includes £26 million in the ring-fenced total of £565 million. The £26 million is for the severely disabled and that represents an overall improvement. Overall funding of community care has been generously increased for the forthcoming year. I refer to what was said by the incoming president of the Association of Directors of Social Services, quoted in The Independent on 3 October 1992:

> "We recognised that the public spending round would be difficult and we think that in the context of the present economic climate Mrs. Bottomley has done well to get this money and to give us specific funds for the second and third year of implementation."

That is not a cheapskate formula; the overall provision for the disabled, within overall community care budgets, is generous indeed. If we remember that the total provided for the disabled from the DSS budget is about £15 billion —a threefold real terms increase—it can hardly be accused of being cheapskate. The Government have clearly demonstrated their continuing commitment to the disabled.

My third point concerns the principle of assessment and the interesting discussion that we seem to be having about cash payments as opposed to direct provision. I have great sympathy with the points made by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) in this regard. It is important to understand, however, how the local authority will fulfil the role of care adviser in the provision of care for the disabled under the care in the community proposals. First, the local authority will identify people who appear to be in need of care services; then it will assess what support or help they need. It will then share those assessments with the people concerned—the most important aspect of this method of empowerment. It is important to involve the client in decisions about the type of provision, and that is expressly provided for under the care in the community proposals. Clients' wishes and preferences must be discussed with them so that their needs are reflected from a material point of view and so that they are involved in decisions about their care.

Finally, the local authority will decide what services should be arranged in response to the assessment. Such services may be provided by the local authority, but increasingly a greater proportion will be purchased under contract from organisations in the independent—the non-local authority—sector. That, too, is important, because there is a danger in the arrangements for community care that the services will be producer dominated. By specifying a limit on the quantity of services that can be directly provided by the local authority, a separation between purchaser and provider is created, and that will improve the authority's advocacy on behalf of the people who require the care.

[Mr. Jenkin]

If someone appears to need health services or help with housing, the authority has a duty to get in touch with the relevant people. This system will replace the system of special higher rate income support payments, currently available to the less well off people who enter residential and nursing homes, to help meet the costs of their care. The current system has a bias in favour of residential care, regardless of what is best for the people concerned. The reforms remove that bias, offering users genuine flexibility and choice in how they are looked after.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant drew our attention to the excellent work done by the Rowntree trust. I wish to draw attention to the developing ideas that we have for care advocacy and further separation of the role of the client and the care advocate, and that of the financier and provider. In particular, I draw attention to a case that I share with my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale). It involves a family whose child is mentally handicapped and which recently lost control of the child. The simple reason is the easily imagined one. When a severely handicapped child is born, the parents naturally say that they will look after the child, but things become more difficult as the child gets older. Looking after a severely mentally handicapped teenager is a demanding operation.

In that case, the strain on the marriage and on family life and finances proved too much for the parents, and they finally accepted that the child would have to enter an institution. Imagine their shock when they realised how much that would cost. Let me emphasise that the health services had offered the child high-quality care, but it was institutional care, not family care or care in the home. For the lack of anything between £2,000 or £8,000 for the additional help that they needed in the home to enable them to continue looking after their child, the health service is now picking up a bill for about £35,000 a year.

That is where the argument for service advocacy or brokerage comes into play. We could not only make resources stretch much further, but involve the families of disabled or mentally handicapped people or the clients themselves where they are capable of making the decision. The money could be allocated to them, instead of to the health authority or the local authority to invest in plant —that is, a residential home or residential care of one sort or another.

The Rowntree trust draws attention to stories involving people in the work that it does. For example, Patrick, who had spent almost all his life in residential care until he moved into a home of his own at the age of 27, said, "It means exercising choice and control and having the right to choose who gets me up and who puts me to bed." In another case, 40-year-old Maria explained: "It means I can get up in the morning when I want to, I can go to bed in the evening when I want to, go out when I want to."

Extremely good though institutions may be, the present arrangements of institutionalised care often fail to enable disadvantaged people to lead their own lives, or to lead their lives with their families.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend quoted what seems a high figure for the cost of the care of a constituent's child, at I think £37,000 a year. Does he agree that there are differences in how well organisations can manage their budgets? Voluntary organisations can also call on charitable causes for their capital costs if not for a contribution to their running costs.

My son is now at an establishment called Brookvale, near the constituency of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary—in Bury, South—where costs for care are only £15,000 a year, but the standard of care is very high. That compares to the cost of £30,000 a year for neighbourhood network homes in my constituency, run by the local authority, where I do not believe that, in all cases, the care is as good as it is at Brookvale.

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend highlights the point that I am making, which is that different types of provision, provided at different standards, are available. We want the client and the families of the client to be involved in the choice of the provision. A purchaser-provider approach often means that the price of such provision is not as expensive as it is when it is provided by a top-down approach.

As we are debating service brokerage and carer advocacy, I shall say something about the ambiguity in the attitude of the Opposition. What we have successfully achieved in the independent living fund seems to have converted a substantial part of the Opposition to the idea of service brokerage. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant pointed out, that does not seem to extend to the social fund. I feel that it should extend to general practitioner fund holding because that is a form of service brokerage where the purchasing power is put in the hands of a care adviser—a general practitioner. He or she then decides, on behalf of the client, how best to allocate resources on behalf of the patient. It means that the community care proposals that are to be implemented at the beginning of April are an interim step on the long road to more responsive care in the community, in its generic meaning, of all kinds. It is artificial to have a care advisory or brokerage system simply for the disabled and not involve the health services and all the other relevant services.

The ultimate social services system of the future must ensure that, where moneys for health and social services for those acute cases are all held under one fund, and a single broker advises the client or the client's family on the services that are required, they are purchased from the local authority, the private sector providers, the health service and all the other institutions, bodies and charities that are involved in acute care. That interesting and exciting challenge lies before us as we develop social services and health care in the 1990s. I commend the Bill to the House.

8.37 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): It is a tribute to the House that, for the second time in a little over a fortnight, we have been afforded an opportunity to have a serious debate about the needs of disabled people. It has been a privilege to hear some of the speeches made on both sides of the House on that important matter.

I was, however, a little disappointed at the ribaldry among Opposition Members when my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) praised the hard work done by the civil servants in the disability living allowance unit and elsewhere to assist disabled people. I pay tribute to those officials, with whom my constituency office works closely to achieve satisfactory outcomes.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend spoke of Opposition Members. Is it not right to point out that, during almost all the debate, there have been twice as many hon. Members on the Government Benches as there have been on the Opposition Benches? Even now, there are 10 Members on these Benches and only five on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Luff: My hon. Friend makes his own point, which will be noted by everyone outside the House.

I hope that it will be in order, when paying tribute to those staff, also to pay tribute to the House of Commons staff who work closely with them to achieve satisfactory outcomes for disabled people in our constituencies. The Benefits Agency staff and the DLA staff are always anxious to do all that they can to promote the needs and interests of those in genuine need. In particular, I should like to praise the staff of the Benefits Agency office in Worcester, who work so hard and consistently for disabled people.

The original independent living fund was a bold partnership. It was not without controversy when it was introduced but it has become a central part of the Government's commitment to disabled people. Perhaps it is not surprising that within two years of the fund's introduction the Select Committee on Social Services was writing:

"On 9 February 1990 the Minister for Disabled People issued a press release headed: 'Independence is the key to better lives for Disabled People'. The help provided by the Independent Living Fund cannot be appropriate for all disabled people. We believe however that the Independent Living Fund has given meaning to the Minister's phrase for many disabled people. Our concern is that the Government has not fully appreciated the innovatory nature of the ILF in giving some disabled people and their families the resources to build up their own packages of care. We recommend that the ILF should continue to exist not only for an interim period, but also after the implementation of community care legislation, and should be provided with sufficient resources to meet the claims of those who meet the present criteria to help from the Fund, and whose needs have not been met through the eventual implementation of community care policy."

I was delighted to find that the Conservative party's manifesto, to which I still attach great importance, contained a strong commitment to maintaining a fund to support the most severely disabled people.

Slightly more than two weeks ago we debated the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House accept that there is no more fundamental civil right for a disabled person than the opportunity to decide how he or she will live his or her own life. In that context, the ability of the individual to remain in his own home is of central importance. It is important also to emphasise the mobility aspects of this civil right and to welcome especially the features of the Bill that relate to Motability.

The Bill widens the legislative powers that govern the Government grant that is paid to Motability. It will enable the Government to ensure that they can continue to fund the organisation in future. I am glad to say that Motability commands genuine cross-party support in the House. It helps disabled people to obtain a car or a powered wheelchair on favourable terms, thus increasing their independence.

The people most often helped by the charity are the severely disabled, who are unable, or virtually unable, to walk. They include people with cerebral palsy, spina bifida, muscular atrophy and many other crippling conditions. We have heard unusual tributes from hon. Members to the role of the clearing banks in helping to fund Motability, and it should be recognised that it is a partnership. It is a registered charity that is assisted by the Department of Social Security, clearing banks, motor manufacturers and dealers and insurance companies. I am sure that we all have constituents who benefit from the operation of the scheme.

The Government pay significant sums to Motability and about 140,000 people are now being helped. Since the scheme's inception, about 330,000 vehicles have been supplied. It is worth bearing in mind that the scheme has helped the environment, apart from the disabled, through its pioneering role in pushing the case for lead-free petrol.

Reference to the mobility features of the Bill enable me to correct an omission from my speech——

Mr. Alfred Morris: The hon. Gentleman has referred to motor manufacturers and dealers, clearing banks, insurance companies and other interests that were brought together to create Motability. Speaking as a patron of Motability, may I say that I hope that he will appreciate that it has always relied as well on a great deal of voluntary effort. Many people give of their time to ensure the success of this very important organisation, and have done so continuously since it was started by the memorandum of 1977.

Mr. Luff: The right hon. Gentleman's intervention is a timely one. I intended to move on to emphasise that aspect of Motability's work and to link it with the work of another scheme for disabled people, shop mobility, which makes an enormous contribution to the mobility of disabled people. It enables them to make their purchases in ordinary shops in shopping centres, for example. I was privileged to see in great detail the work of shop mobility at Worcester when I drew its Christmas raffle some months ago. The role of the voluntary sector—individuals—in helping the disabled to achieve independence in their lifestyle must never be overlooked.

The Government should be proud of their record in responding to the needs of disabled people. The increase in spending has been phenomenal, and that is spending of which the ILF is a part. Spending has trebled in real terms since 1978-79, and is now £14·9 billion. We have seen the introduction of the disability living allowance. It has not been without its problems, but already there have been nearly a third of a million successful claims. I especially welcome the disability working allowance, which provides a top-up for the earnings of disabled people.

I attach enormous importance to giving independence to disabled people and their ability to choose their own lifestyle in the context of the role of carers. Expenditure on the invalid care allowance has increased significantly from only £4 million when the Government came to power to about £366 million today. The number of beneficiaries has increased from 5,000 to 195,000.

It is entirely appropriate that one of the key objectives to the Government's proposals for community care is to ensure that service providers give practicial support for carers a higher priority. That is recognised in the Government's White Paper, "Caring for People". There is clear recognition in that document that helping carers to maintain their valuable contribution is right and a sound investment. Local authorities and health authorities will be expected to continue to develop services for carers in advance of the introduction of assessments in April.

It is not going too far to say that carers are perhaps the most long-established voluntary sector that looks after the disabled. I am concerned that their work should not be over-professionalised. It is work that often goes unsung, and even more often it is unnoticed. I am sure that the entire House would wish to offer thanks and gratitude to those who are doing so much to promote the interests of disabled people.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: My hon. Friend is far too young to remember that the process started with the work of the Council for the Single Woman and her Dependants. It has continued for many years since then.

Mr. Luff: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Many of us are accustomed to seeing carers in that context. There are so many relationships that relieve the state of a financial burden and enhance the quality of life of the individuals who receive care.

I welcome the role of local authorities. The Government are often criticised for diminishing their role, but that is not our objective. It is often our objective to take powers to others, and I have in mind grant-maintained schools. They represent an attempt to give power to parents, not to take power from local authorities.

The Bill will do exactly the opposite of what our critics sometimes accuse us of doing because it will significantly enhance the role of local authorities. The ILF and its successors provide help on the basis of a care plan that is agreed between the fund, the disabled person and the local authority. As a result of assessment, the authority will provide a specified level of service, which the fund will then supplement by a cash payment to the client.

If the system is to work properly, it is essential that local authorities have full confidence in their ability to live with their side of the care-in-the-community bargain. I know that a year or so ago, when care in the community had still not been fully implemented, nursing homes in my constituency and in the area covered by the county council were worried that they would not be in a position to take on that responsibility. I made vigorous representations to the Government, as a result of which, I believe, the Government have responded appropriately to ensure that local authorities can play their full role in delivering care in the community. I welcome particularly the generous funding that the Government have made available to local authorities to enable them to do that. If there were not the confidence that the necessary funding was in place, I do not think that there would be the same confidence in the value of the ILF and its successors.

Local authorities have been allocated significant additional funds to support their new responsibilities for community care. The ring-fenced grant of £565 million for England, specifically and exclusively for community care next year, is very welcome. That sum includes some £399 million that would otherwise have been spent through the DSS; £140 million to facilitate the introduction of the changes; and £26 million to help meet the needs of severely disabled people.

It is important that we remember that that ring-fenced money is in addition to the general increase for social services spending next year. Taking both of those into account, councils in England will receive a massive 15 per cent. increase in their personal social services standard spending assessment next year, to a total of £5·6 billion. It is an important development if the needs of disabled people are to be properly protected by local authorities.

I take particular comfort from the £26 million to which I referred, which is being provided in recognition of the additional costs that will fall to local authorities as a result of the closure of the independent living fund to new clients and the establishment of the 1993 fund. That sum is budgeted to rise to £53 million in the following financial year and to £100 million in the year after that. By any standards, that is a significant sum of money.

In that context, it is little wonder that my county council, Herefore and Worcester, has given a warm welcome to the Government's approach to care in the community in general, and to the two new funds in particular. However, the council does have two difficulties, which are not unique to Hereford and Worcester. The first difficulty is that in delivering care in the community, whether for disabled or able people, the council has to deal with a large number of authorities. The second difficulty is the large number of elderly people retiring to the area, many of whom have significant disabilities.

On the council's first difficulty, it has to deal with three health districts—North Worcestershire, Worcester and District, and Hereford—as well as nine district councils. It also has to deal with the various voluntary bodies, housing associations and other organisations. It has to liaise with all of them to deliver the service effectively. There is a continuing, strong and powerful case for further rationalisation of the administrative boundaries of government to enable the effective delivery of Government policies.

On the council's second difficulty about the pressure of numbers, anything that the Bill does to relieve the pressure for residential accommodation in Hereford and Worcester will be welcomed.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the great benefits of the ILF is that it has been able to meet a huge increase in numbers—from 6,000 to 21,000—very effectively? Is not that something to be welcomed?

Mr. Luff: That is right. There has been a dramatic increase in the numbers being helped across the whole range of Government assistance to the disabled. When we hear criticisms about, for example, the disability living allowance, it is important to remember the very sharp increase in numbers helped. It is a great tribute to those involved in the delivery of the various help available to disabled people.

My county council expects the Bill to be of particular value in the rural areas, where it is especially beneficial to be able to keep disabled people in their own homes rather than force them into residential accommodation, often against their will. If that provision is to be delivered effectively, it will mean a close working relationship with a large number of bodies, such as housing associations.

It is important to remember that one reason why such a large number of elderly, often disabled, people are attracted to my area is that the county council has followed Government policy and encouraged the provision of private sector care. It has not resisted that, as some Labour-controlled county councils have done. However, the council is concerned that, because it has encouraged that provision and worked closely with the private sector in providing care for the elderly and the disabled, it will be penalised under the funding arrangements for care in the community.

I very much welcome the way in which the Government have approached the special transitional grants, which have significantly reduced my council's fears. The geographical patterns of DSS spending on residential care are very different from the patterns for standard spending assessments. Inevitably, DSS expenditure is linked to the areas where the homes are located. Because of the often different political perspective on how such care should be provided, the homes operate with very different rates in different parts of the country.

I understand that it is the Government's intention that, in the long run, all funds for community care should be distributed through the revenue grant, on the basis of standard spending assessments. However, the Government recognise that a precipitate rush to that mechanism would imply a significant and rapid shift of resource, which might lead to severe problems for the elderly and the disabled in specific council areas. Therefore, I welcome the transitional arrangements. It is all part of the confidence building that enables me to have confidence that the successors to the ILF will deliver the necessary care to disabled people. I hope that the Government will keep a careful eye on the transitional arrangements to ensure that there are adequate funds for county councils such as mine.

I understand that the entire caseload of the ILF will be transferred to the extension fund. I have been told that people will "in the main" be unaware of any changes to the fund other than the change of name. The term "in the main" causes me some alarm. We know that many of those who benefit from the fund are people in great personal need. We also know the very real distress that any change —or even the threat or rumour of change—in their financial arrangements would cause. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will assure me that the term "in the main" will be struck out and that individuals will, in fact, be unaware of any changes to the fund. It is important that that fear or threat is removed.

There is some controversy about the reduction to 65 in the upper age limit under the new fund. I know the reasons that the Government have given for that, and I respect them. In current circumstances, it would be irresponsible to argue for any increase in the upper age limit. However, I hope that the Government will carefully monitor the way that the funds operate and that if they think it appropriate at some stage to increase the upper age limit they will do so.

I especially welcome the way that the Bill has built on the Government's determination to break down the barriers between the public and the private sectors and to build on the work of the voluntary sector. I am constantly impressed by the extraordinary efforts of the voluntary sector in my constituency. Indeed, I am often moved by the efforts of individuals to assist less fortunate members of our society. It has always seemed to me to be a tragedy that, previously, there was a view that care was provided either privately or publicly. Now, we are moving towards a spectrum of provision. That is a healthy development in the way that we provide for the care of less fortunate members of our society.

The fund was an interim measure, but expenditure rose from £1 million on its inception to £100 million today. The Bill provides conclusive evidence of the Government's commitment to the disabled, but that commitment must not blind us to the excellent work of many local authorities, individual carers and the plethora of voluntary bodies to which I referred earlier. The Bill is more than anything else about providing disabled people with choice and dignity, and in that spirit I commend it to the House.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): The debate has been interesting and wide-ranging and we commend those hon. Members who made practical contributions, as well as those who expressed philosophical views about the future needs of the disabled. I commend in particular the opening speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and the excellent contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris).

It would be remiss not to point out that, although much of tonight's debate centred on the independent living fund and its successor, notable plaudits were handed out for the work of Motability. We pay particular tribute to my right hon. Friend for his work in establishing that scheme. It is no exaggeration to say that the continuation of Motability, which has been a worldwide success, is greatly to be welcomed. It gives me particular pleasure to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend as a fellow Manchester Member of Parliament.

We heard excellent contributions also on the practical details from the hon. Members for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and from my hon. Friend the Member for Cumberanuld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg). Interesting philosophical contributions were made by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks).

I cannot say that all the contributions were of the same significance and it was a cheap jibe on the part of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) to comment on the number of hon. Members on his side of the House as compared with this side of the House and then for the hon. Gentleman to disappear to the Tea Room. As the hon. Gentleman flitted in and out of the Chamber tonight, perhaps he should have been present to hear the concluding speeches.

The independent living fund was introduced to deal with the urgent need to repair the gap created by the withdrawal of special allowances for the disabled available under the old supplementary benefit scheme. I pay tribute to the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People for identifying that gap and introducing the fund quickly. However, under the old system the disabled had statutory rights to help but the ILF was a discretionary fund. It was successful because its trustees, director and staff recognised that they would have to fight all the way to win acknowledgement for the needs of the disabled, ensure the availability of funds, and use discretion in ensuring the continuity of payments.

It was said that the discretionary ILF, which we praised, should be compared with the social fund. Our criticism of the social fund does not relate to the payments made in terms of community care grants but loans. It was never a feature of the ILF that the disabled were expected to pay for the services that they received or to repay cash payments made to them. There is a fundamental difference between the two funds.

At the centre of the thinking of the fund's trustees, director and staff, and of the Minister, was the rights of disabled people. I do not believe that the Bill is particularly supported by the Minister because the rationale behind the successor fund is clearly Treasury-led and is about money and not the needs of the disabled.

No right hon. or hon. Member expected the ILF to go on for ever. The Government announced as long ago as January 1990 that it would be replaced when the community care legislation came into effect. However, nobody could have foreseen the suddenness with which the fund would be wound up, in the form of a short statement from the trustees—who were placed in an invidious position—and a brief DSS press release dated 24 November 1992, informing potential claimants that they had one day to finalise their ILF applications. Nobody expected that the new fund would be so limited in its terms of reference in respect of new claimants.

The Government have announced two successor funds, the ILF extension fund—which is to take over the current caseload of 22,000 people—and the new ILF 1993 fund for new claimants. What is so unacceptable is the position of people who failed to apply to the old fund, along with the limitation in the scope of the new fund. I shall return to those points later.

Tonight's debate has highlighted key elements which I am sure the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will want to consider further. It has underlined the uncertain future of disabled people—first, in regard to the way in which the two successor trusts have been set up. It is strange that we should debate this Bill on 15 March, given that it will, in practice, come into effect in barely two weeks' time; moreover, only two trustees have been appointed. Indeed, I understand that they were appointed solely to ensure that a bank account could be set up to ensure the continuation of some payments from 1 April. It is scandalous that the other five trustees have not yet been appointed—if they have been appointed, their appointment has certainly not been announced to the House tonight.

It is disgraceful that, although the Minister paid fulsome tribute to the work of the previous trustees, staff and director, none of those people has been considered for appointment to the new fund. I am not arguing their case in particular; I am saying that their expertise, the importance that they have attached to the needs of disabled people and the continuity that they have provided are being lost through the Government's decision not to allow them to continue. I gather that, although they had been told that they were no longer required, they offered to stay in post for a further 15 months for the sake of continuity, to ensure that there would be no hiccups in the changeover and to prevent disabled people from being disadvantaged. Sadly, the Government rejected their offer.

I looked up the details of many of the trustees in "Who's Who". I find it incredible that someone with the expertise of Mr. Lyon—who was an ILF treasurer, has an impeccable record of service and was once president of the Institute of Actuaries—was told that he was no longer required to help to organise the successor fund. The Government should seriously reconsider the nature of trustees. The rejection of any representatives of the Disablement Income Group—or, it would appear, of the disability world in general—is to be particularly deprecated. I hope that, in considering the appointment of the other five trustees, the Government will take into account the expertise of people from the world of disability to ensure that the interests of disabled people are properly represented.

I am also anxious about the amount of money that will be available, first, for the extension fund. We have been told that £117 million, in round terms, will be available, in 1993-94; that £119 million will be available in 1994-95; and that £121 million will be available in 1995-96. It is not clear, however, whether those amounts will be sufficient to cover in full any increase in the care costs of those already receiving support from the ILF. Mention has been made of people dropping out of the fund for various reasons, but a good deal of concern is felt nevertheless. The Government recently confirmed that,

"subject to its cash limited provision, the successor body will have ... power to review the awards of existing beneficiaries."—[Official Report, 25 January 1993; Vol. 217; c. 587.]

The worry is that if budgetary pressures develop there will be nothing to stop the new trustees of the extension fund reducing the payment or making less favourable the terms for payment. That pressure was put on the old ILF and the trustees had to make adjustments, if only in terms of who was eligible. I hope that the Minister will allay the worry that if budgetary pressure is put on the extension fund people who already receive help from it will not have the amount that is available to them reduced.

I reiterate what hon. Members have said about thousand of people being left out of the 1993 fund. The new fund will exclude thousands of people with severe disabilities. The restrictions proposed on access to cash from the ILF's successor are far greater than those which applied to the ILF, even though that has become increasingly restricted since its introduction in 1988.

The Official Report of 15 December 1992, c. 153-55, shows that the Government estimate that approximately 10,000 severely disabled people who might have looked to the ILF for cash help will not be eligible for such help from the new fund. A total of no more than 1,500 people a year are expected to receive help, compared with roughly 8,500 who were taken on by the ILF in the last financial year. That is a severe restriction on the number of people who will receive direct help from the 1993 ILF fund. Many of those people, if not the overwhelming majority of them, will be over 65 years of age. That is a major concern. More than one person in three, 34 per cent., who received help from the independent living fund in November 1992 was over the age of 65. The Government estimate that it will cost an additional £2 million in 1993-94 if eligibility is extended to include people over retirement age. That will rise to a mere £9 million in 1995-96.

In the context of overall Government expenditure, it is difficult to accept that such a relatively small amount could justify the exclusion of this age group from access to the new fund. Projecting as far forward as 1995-96 a mere £9 million could be allocated to the fund to allow the extension of eligibility to those who are over the age of 65. I urge the Government to think again and to ensure that those people are not excluded.

The organisations representing that age group are extremely concerned. We have heard the view of the Alzheimers Association and I shall reinforce that view by repeating it. It stated:

"95 per cent. of people with dementia are over working age."

Those people will be excluded from the fund. Age Concern wrote to me today and said:

"Discrimination against older people, in the form of denying them access to disability benefits, is unacceptable. Such discrimination implies that disability is considered normal in later life. Most older people live full and healthy lives into their 70s and beyond. The minority who do become disabled should not be denied extra help with the financial costs of disability."

Those comments should ring loudly in the ears of Ministers and I hope that they will be further considered. If they are not considered, people with no opportunity to apply for help from the independent living fund may be forced into residential care.

Eligibility is further restricted because not only do people have to be between the ages of 16 and 65 but they have to be in receipt of the highest rate of the care component of the disability living allowance. After paying care costs with help from the fund such people would have to be left with income at or about the level of income support and would otherwise have gone into residential care. That creates a care equation on which local authorities will make their assessment for help from the new fund.

Under the care in the community provisions, local authorities will be required to assess the needs of people with disabilities, for the purpose of agreeing a care package, but when considering an application for a grant from the new fund on behalf of a person who meets the eligibility requirements the local authority will have to work out the total cost of that individual's community care package. The local authority will be expected to provide services that are equivalent to agreed thresholds, based on the average care costs to local authorities of a place in residential or nursing care.

This assessment rests entirely upon the local authority. What we see straight away is the lack of the right of the individual to be properly consulted. Mention has already been made of the need to reconsider whether the service element should be translated into a cash payment. We have heard many times tonight that one of the great successes of the old fund was that individuals had the right to be a party to deciding their care needs, to purchasing their care needs and to ensuring that their care needs met their individual requirements. However good local authorities will be in making those assessments, because of the general constraints placed upon them and their need to maximise what we do not believe will be a sufficient allocation of money for care in the community, they will be unable to meet sensitively the individual needs of disabled people. We want to protect those rights.

We are worried by the guidelines that have been issued. One section of the guidelines stresses that there should be a partnership with the local authorities. It says that the fund will provide help only on the basis of a care plan agreed between the fund, the disabled person and the local authority, whereby the authority will provide a specific level of service which the fund will supplement with a cash payment to the individual client. The guidelines refer to an agreed care plan. If, therefore, the local authority or the fund do not agree the plan, the individual is caught in the middle and does not obtain access to the help that he or she so desperately needs. That problem could be overcome if the care package were funded by means of a cash payment and if the individual were allowed to spend that money on meeting his or her individual needs.

We are worried about the cost calculations, a point that has been made strongly in the debate, and the ring fencing of the £26 million that is to be handed over to local authorities. I am not, in many ways, a keen advocate of ring fencing, particularly at a time when we should give to local authorities freedom to get on with the job of assessing care packages in general for care in the community, not the particular needs of disabled people. However, because of the community care pressures on local authority budgets, it is inevitable that local authorities will look at the total money available and see how best it can be stretched to meet the needs not only of the severely disabled but of the disabled, the elderly and other groups for which they are responsible.

The great worry is that the £26 million will not meet the needs of the disabled people for whom that money is intended. When the Government look at the way in which the fund works in practice and at the way in which local authorities in practice draw up their plans, I hope that they will ensure that the £26 million meets the target for disabled people. As the system settles down, I hope that ring fencing will not be required. The Government have justified ring fencing of the community care budget in general, so they should specifically ensure that the £26 million for disabled people is ring fenced.

There is immense concern that the amount of money in the independent living (1993) fund will be insufficient to meet the needs of the people who will apply to the fund. In 1993-94, the new fund will have a budget of a mere £4 million, a tiny amount compared with the independent living fund's latest annual budget of £97 million. I know that they are not directly comparable, but, having restricted the number of people eligible and cut out the over-65s, the Government are allowing fewer people to get help by allocating a small budget which, on their own admission, will serve only 1,500 people. The Minister shakes his head. Does he seriously believe that only 1,500 people need help from the ILF 1993 successor fund? I look forward to the first reviews of that fund when we shall find out how many people have been left out of the system.

Many people were denied the right to apply to the old fund because of the bureaucratic delays and administrative chaos caused by the introduction of the disability living allowance. Many people have commended the Minister for not phasing in the DLA, but the people who applied to the DLA agency say that it has been phased in. They have had to wait months and months for their entitlement.

I am glad that the Minister has clarified the trustees' role. He passed the buck to them for denying to people who had suffered administrative delays the right to apply to the old fund. In answer to a question from me, the Minister said:

"It would have been open to the trustees of the independent living fund, before deciding to cease taking claims with a view to having an orderly hand-over of cases to the new trust in April, to deem someone who had applied for disability living allowance to have been in receipt of it and, therefore, to be eligible for help through the independent living fund."—[Official Report, 10 February 1993; Vol. 218, c. 1081.]

The trustees were outraged by that statement because they had given a commitment to the Minister that, at the end of the financial year, they would not pass on any commitments which could not be filled from the old fund. It was an outrage that they were told that they had the discretion to keep the fund open longer, not knowing how many people could be deemed to be in receipt, and then not being able to fulfil the financial requirements.

The Minister has tried to rectify the situation. I do not believe that he was responsible for that statement; I think that he was trying to cover up for Lord Henley in another place. I am glad that he has put the record straight because it was a scar on the integrity of the trustees. They were trying to do the best that they could in difficult circumstances with the cash available. It was never on offer to them to keep the fund open beyond the cut-off date.

Thousands of people who may have been eligible to apply to the ILF have been denied the right to do so because of the administrative chaos in processing their applications. In addition, if they had had their applications processed, that access may have been a passport to other benefits sooner. I believe that the Minister should reconsider the case of people who had made their applications before the cut-off date, who were subsequently found to be eligible for the DLA and who could have applied to the old ILF. Some compensation should be given to ensure that they have not been doubly disadvantaged by administrative delays and the lack of opportunity to get funds from the old ILF.

We have always been worried about the lack of consultation and continuity—the old fund will end before the new system, which is to come into operation properly on 1 April, has been set up. We are worried that, by 15 March, the Bill has still not completed all its stages and needs to go to another place for consideration. Many people involved in disability issues are concerned to ensure that there is no delay in payment to people already in receipt of money from the ILF. We want that assurance, but we also want the assurance that, despite the complexities that will clearly arise when the 1993 fund is in motion from 1 April, the relationship between the fund and the local authority will have been properly worked out and established.

I have no confidence from the documents that I have seen that there has been proper dialogue. As two of the trustees were appointed only a couple of weeks ago, there has clearly been no dialogue between the trustees and the local authorities about how the system will work in practice. We must ensure that the arrangements are in place and that there is no delay for the limited number of people who will seek care through the local authority and the independent living fund jointly. We must ensure that there is continuity and that there is not the administrative chaos that has been the hallmark of the disability living allowance.

Under the new system, the stated hallmark of most Government policies—choice for the individual—will be even more curtailed than it is now. People will no longer be able to choose their own carers as they would have been able to under the old independent living fund. The recent guidelines state:

"the 1993 fund will not consider applications direct from an individual who has not first been in contact with his or her local authority social services department".

What is of great concern is the difficulties that individuals may have when the new system comes into effect on 1 April as a result of the massive job that local authorities will have to do in assessing a range of people who will come under their jurisdiction. People with the greatest needs may be put into a queue because they cannot make direct representations to the new fund, as they could to the old fund, for someone to come to see what their situation is. They will have to rely on the local authorities.

There is massive concern that the resources in the coming months will be limited. Naturally, priorities will be set by the local authorities about where they start the whole process. As the independent living fund element has been so delayed—I stress that we are debating it only a couple of weeks before it will come into practice—there will be further considerable delays which will hit the most severely disabled people. I hope that the Minister can give us assurances tonight that there will be no delay or, if there is likely to be delay, what contingency plans he will prepare to ensure that the needs of disabled people who will apply first are met.

Many disabled people have been in limbo since the old fund was abolished on 25 November. They have been asked to wait and there have been assurances that the new fund will be there to meet their needs. Those assurances can be met only if the administrative arrangements are clearly in place and if a proper relationship is established between the local authorities and the new funds. If not, disabled people will again be caught in the middle—caught in the care trap. They may be less able to suffer such delay than people with less severe disabilities are. It will be seen as a scandal by all; it will certainly be seen as a scandal by people with severe disabilities.

This has been a wide-ranging debate. The Opposition will not vote against the Bill tonight because we do not want to deny disabled people access to funds. When the Bill goes into Committee, we shall press the Government on crucial points. I hope that as a result of the contributions of my hon. Friends and myself tonight the Minister will give special consideration to the role of the trustees and their relationship with the disabled community, special consideration to the needs of the over-65s and special consideration to whether there will be a ceiling on the contributions of the local authority and of the independent living (1933) fund. If applications are not made to the independent living fund, local authorities will be free to extend their contribution. If an application is made to the independent living fund, there will be a ceiling of £510. We seek assurances on that and, equally, that the figure will not be set in concrete as the one that will be around for years to come, but will be annually reviewed in reports to the House to ensure that the sums available through the local authorities' service contribution and the independent living fund meet the needs of disabled people. That issue and many others will be discussed in Committee.

We welcome the opportunity to discuss the practical and philosophical issues affecting disabled people. I hope that the Minister will be able not only to allay the Opposition's many fears but to address the anger that has been expressed by people who work with disabled people and by disabled people themselves, who do not believe that their needs will be properly met by the two successor funds.

9.29 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): I thank the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) for putting the case with his customary clarity. I shall endeavour to answer his questions.

We have had a good and wide-ranging debate—much of it, I feel, conducted on the false premise that the change in the nature of the independent living fund somehow does away with a category of care for a whole group of people. That is not the case; it is a false belief, arrived at by those who have considered the Bill out of the context of community care as a whole. I hope to show that the worries expressed by Opposition Members are not founded.

As always in disability debates, a high degree of knowledge and care has been brought to bear by hon. Members on both sides of the House. We have heard a variety of extremely good speeches. I commend the opening speech made by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People—a man who understands disabled people very well—who put the Government's case extremely well. My right hon. Friend was answered in a number of good speeches by Opposition Members. I commend in particular the comments by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris)—a friend of long standing—who speaks with great knowledge on these matters.

The kindest part of the speech of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) was the reference to my footballing prowess. Whatever deals may or may not be negotiated in the next few weeks, I shall certainly remember those remarks.

I was grateful also to the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks), whose experience in social policy matters is a great asset to the House, as are the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who brings a degree of intellectual rigour to these matters of which we shall all live in dread for many years to come. His was another excellent speech.

Some hon. Members, including my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), brought to our attention down-to-earth concerns about the problems of disability in their own constituencies. Others spoke more widely about the Government's record on disability and carers. My hon. Friends the Members for Worcester (Mr. Luff) and for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) made significant contributions in that regard. We had a wide variety of different speeches, all of them made with clarity and care, and I shall do my best to answer in the most logical and straightforward way, bearing in mind the constraints of time.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire asked why we needed to proceed under Standing Order No. 48 and referred to problems of hybridity. The Bill has been introduced because it was found that payments to the independent living fund and Motability were not properly covered by section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968. Under the Public Accounts Committee concordat, it is not appropriate to rely on the annual appropriation Act alone to sanction outgoing payments. The Bill is introduced under Standing Order No. 48 because its main object is to create a charge on public funds. Questions of hybridity are for Madam Speaker to rule on rather than for the Government to determine. I understand that those matters have been examined and that there is no problem of hybridity in this case.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire also wanted to know whether regulations will be introduced. The schemes are discretionary schemes set up by trust deeds. Accordingly, there is no need for Government statutory instruments or directions. The trust deeds and the conditions of grants set out the parameters within which the trustees can exercise their discretion. In a sense, that forms the regulatory framework that secondary legislation and regulations would have formed had there been an Act and statutory procedure.

If that were the case, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire also wanted to know, quite rightly, who would have access to the trust deeds. The trusts are private trusts and the deeds are not necessarily available to the public generally. However, the founding trustees have agreed that the deeds should be made available in the Library and I am sure that they would be willing for the deeds to be made more widely available. I am sure that we all hope that that is the case. There is no reason why the deeds should not be made available to the agencies which expect to make most use of the funds. I cannot see a particular problem in relation to that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) made a significant contribution which was full of detail and obvious knowledge of the subject. I pay tribute to that. He questioned whether the trust deed was over-restrictive. The trust deeds and conditions of grant set out the parameters within which the trustees are able to exercise their discretion. The two new trusts will derive the whole of their resources from the Government. It is therefore perfectly proper for the Government to set down clearly the conditions under which the money is granted.

The trusts are not controlled by regulations. Therefore, all the controls on a very significant amount of money must be set down in the key trust documents. Accordingly, they are set down in detail. The conditions may appear pernickety, but they amount to no more than good accounting practice. It is better to be as clear as possible about the requirements in advance than for the Government to seek additional information later.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon raised a point, which was also raised by several Opposition Members, about the continuity of trustees. My right hon. Friend has already expressed his gratitude to the trustees, as I do, of the current independent living fund. The current fund was set up as an interim measure jointly by the Department of Social Security and the Disablement Income Group. The trustees have done a splendid job, but the new 1993 fund will operate in new ways in partnership with local authorities.

It is of course our intention that at least one of the trustees should be disabled. However, I do not believe that there is a need for continuity of trustees. There will be continuity of the staff at Nottingham, but I believe that the time has come for a new group of trustees to carry the work forward following the introduction of community care. Notwithstanding the excellence of previous trustees, it cannot be the case that new trustees are not available who would also show similar expertise, care and attention to the matters in hand.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon also suggested that the director and staff had not been encouraged to stay. That is not so. The director of the ILF had been on secondment from the Department for five years—an unusually long secondment. The creation of the new funds provided a suitable opportunity for a change and we have recruited a new director.

As for the staff, it is not true to say that they have been encouraged to leave. Far from it. The Department has encouraged the existing staff to stay. Indeed, the contracts of the directly employed staff have been extended in advance of 1 April to provide reassurance for the staff.

Mr. Dewar: I would not normally press the Minister on this, but as he has said that a director has been appointed, I do not think that we know who that is. Can he possibly tell us who it is?

Mr. Burt: Yes. A new director has been appointed. Her name is Margaret Baldwin. She is expected to take up her post in mid-April.

Two trustees have been appointed—Robin Wendt, the secretary of the Association of County Councils and member of the Social Security Advisory Committee, and John Shepherd, a retired finance director of Remploy. The two men will bring excellent care to the new body of trustees and plans are in hand to recruit the remaining five trustees. Three more will be appointed shortly and the rest in the near future. I am quite sure that the new trustees will exhibit the same degree of quality and care as that exhibited by the trustees of the previous funds.

Hon. Members mentioned the closure of the independent living fund, and I am anxious to answer their questions. The fund was not forced to close because of deficiencies in its funding. The timing of the closure to new applications was a matter for the fund's trustees. It was always intended that, in its present form, the fund would cease to operate in April 1993, although payments would continue to those who were receiving money from it as of 31 March. The trustees promised that they would ensure that all applications for help were processed by 31 March. They took the decision to close to new applications with effect from 25 November 1992 to process the applications already in hand.

One or two hon. Members asked why more time was not allowed. People were aware that the fund was due to close in April 1993 and therefore more applications were being made in anticipation. I am sure that hon. Members will understand that if a closing date had been set at some stage in advance, it would only have encouraged a last-minute sale, which would have made it impossible for the fund to continue.

The trustees took the decision to close with great reluctance but recognised that the fund had become a victim of its own success. By last November, there was a backlog of 6,500 outstanding applications, which the trustees had a legal obligation to clear before the planned and final closure of the fund on 31 March. I know that staff have worked hard to clear the backlog, assess applications and process cases.

Mr. Dewar: Before the Minister concludes—we have left him a full half hour—will he deal with the small but important point about people who might have been eligible to apply before the closing date but were not in a position to do so because of delays in processing DLA claims? How does he propose to ensure that they are not prejudiced? If it is clear that several months of support have been lost, some form of backdating should be considered.

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman anticipates my next point and I am happy to deal with it. I appreciate that some people who were awaiting a decision on a DLA claim before applying to the independent living fund were unable to apply before 25 November. I regret that, but payments from the ILF are charitable and discretionary, so there is no question of an automatic entitlement or of backdating. I was grateful for the comments of the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) because it certainly was not the intention of Ministers to suggest that the trustees could have kept the fund open for such cases. That would have been impossible for the trustees and would have negated the point of the closure, which was to allow time to process the cases in hand.

The trustees have worked tirelessly for the independence of disabled people. I should not like a misunderstanding of the problems of processing DLA to cast doubt on the high regard with which Ministers hold them. Payments from the fund are not social security benefit payments, so there is no entitlement to them.

Mr. Bradley: The Minister is not accurately reflecting my comments. I said that it appeared that the Government were blaming the trustees for the problem, which clearly was so in the other place but now has been clarified. Although the fund is a charitable trust and there is no right to the money, if some individuals' applications for DLA had been processed they might have been eligible for payment under the fund. They have been denied the opportunity to have their applications assessed. The Government have a duty to compensate those people for the administrative chaos that the Government have caused.

Mr. Burt: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's point, but I am happy that he has cleared up the position in relation to trustees.

The closure of the independent living fund did not leave those disabled people without redress or support. As always, the local authority maintains its overriding responsibility for disabled people. The independent living fund was set up to supplement existing care. Despite its closure, people could still go back to their local authority, and those who qualified are able to apply to the new fund. There is no possibility of any form of compensation or backdating for a fund whose payments are discretionary.

Mr. Dewar: The Minister will recognise that his statement will cause widespread disappointment and some anger—I certainly feel some anger. Surely, if someone is disqualified from applying for ILF help because the shutter comes down on 25 November, and at that stage his DLA application is caught in the logjam, and if he subsequently applies and receives help three or four months later, there would seem to be a prima facie case for saying that he has been deprived of ILF during that period by the logjam and by the administrative inefficiency with which cases were processed. Surely that adds up to some claim for compensation under any form of common law.

Mr. Burt: No, I do not think it does. The fund always had to set eligibility limits depending on the pressure on it. The reason for the closure was the build-up in the backlog of cases—it could not possibly have processed any more of them. I repeat: I am not aware of any mechanism to allow compensation to be claimed for a discretionary fund.

I should like now to deal with the meat of the argument—whether setting up the new fund and the extension of the old fund in any way limits the opportunities for severely disabled people. I found extraordinary the degree of suspicion expressed by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and other Opposition Members—suspicion of the expertise of those in local authorities charged with putting community care into effect. The whole idea of community care has been to carry forward the ideas of greater empowerment for all people who might need some form of assistance—hence the idea of care packages. The forces embodied in the success of the ILF—the tailoring of need and response to that need—are the very forces that have already shaped and will continue to shape community care for all. That is why the Bill cannot be seen in isolation from the community care package around it, and it is why the premise of the hon. Member for Huddersfield and others was wrong.

Mr. Sheerman: When I made that point I quoted bodies that were of that mind, including the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of Directors of Social Services. If they do not know their onions, I suspect that the Minister does not know his.

Mr. Burt: Bearing in mind that this debate started with an admission by the Opposition of how wrong they got the original ILF, I suggest that they are wrong again. As they have spent most of the time apologising for being wrong about the first case I am not prepared to take lessons from them about this one. I have put the matter straight, and I shall deal with it again when we come to the facts and figures.

Opposition Members have displayed a fundamental misconception about how community care and the independent living fund fit together.

Mr. Jenkin: Does my hon. Friend agree that if we were to take the Labour party seriously on issues of empowerment, discretionary funding and discretionary care, its members would have to start by supporting fund holding for general practitioners—a good example—and continue by supporting the social fund?

Mr. Burt: My hon. Friend makes his own point. We have heard a number of references to the Conservative party manifesto—often light-hearted references from Opposition Members. We have not heard many references to Labour's manifesto because the Opposition have already torn it up. We remain, as always, interested in further policy developments. The Opposition seem to get closer and closer, week by week, to policies espoused and put into practice by the Conservative party.

To return to the central point—the relationship of the independent living funds and the community care proposals, we must put the Bill's proposals in the context of other developments in the cash provision for disabled people. In January 1990 the then Secretary of State for Social Security, my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton), published "The Way Ahead: Benefits for Disabled People". He announced that the Government saw three main strategic strands in policy on benefits for disabled people. The first was to improve the balance of benefits available to people unable to work, and in particular to do more for those disabled from birth or from early in life. The second was to help those disabled people who could and wished to work by making it easier for them to take up and keep jobs. The third was to improve for those of working age and below the coverage of help with the extra cost associated with disability.

We have demonstrated that the independent living fund was set up to provide a supplement to the existing care provision. We all knew that care provision was moving on, in ways in which many hon. Members, implicitly and explicitly, have approved. That means the creation of a better relationship between the individual looking for care and assistance and those who are pledged to provide it. We have moved some way from the old ideas of the recipient of care being simply that—a non-participant of whatever was given.

Mr. Dewar: We are going back to that.

Mr. Burt: I do not believe that we are and I hope to be able to deal with that as I go on.

Mr. Dewar: I accept that things have moved on and that the new ILF will be a top-up provision to help people with a certain level of disability to stay in the community and not move from their homes. However, it has not been properly explained why that top up should not be available to the over-65s.

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman anticipates me again. I shall come to that point.

It has been suggested that, in some way, local authority services take away choice from the individual. That suggestion negates the concept behind community care. Local authorities and those who provide the services have also moved on. They are providing people who will look at those in need of care as individuals and set up the right sort of package for them. One example used is that of an individual who had an independent living fund grant and who was able to ask a carer to do particular tasks. The individual was not bound by a local authority job specification but could work at the behest and need of those in receipt of the independent living fund grant.

That is community care that is intended to work for the individual, who, being assessed to stay at home, if that is the best provision for him, will find himself able to have exactly that. So much of what used to be provided through the independent living fund for a section of the population is now provided for by community care. That is why the independent living fund can be reduced to provide only for the categories of people whom we have mentioned. Community care does the job for others. To see the independent living fund outside the context of community care, as so many Opposition Members have done tonight, is not right. That is why they have been fundamentally misled.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burt: I should like to make some further progress, because I have a number of questions to answer.

[Mr. Burt]

The right hon. Member for Wythenshawe spoke of the worry about sheer practicalities. He asked why, when up to now disabled people have been dealing with only one agency, they should have to deal with the local authority as well. The premise was not based on fact. The majority of disabled people getting help from the independent living fund were also receiving support services from their local authority, and so have always been in contact with two sets of social workers. Therefore, it is much better for the entire package of care to be discussed between the parties concerned. The disabled person will benefit from having a complete personalised package of care.

The 1993 fund will work, as the circular to local authorities explains, by ensuring that all the eligible clients will be people already in touch with their local authority. The social worker assessing the person's needs will say, "You are in the right age group—16 to 65—you are getting the top rate of DLA care component, your income is insufficient to meet your care needs, you need help which will be assessed at roughly, say, £400 a week. That means that you might be eligible for help from the 1993 fund. Do you want to make an application?" The social worker and client will then apply to the fund. The fund's social worker and the local authority social worker will make a joint visit to the client. All three will then agree what package of care is to be provided.

It has been suggested that there may be great disagreement but there is no reason why that should be the case. People are now working to see that the individual needs of those in need of care are provided for. That is in the great spirit of co-operation, about which we hear so much from the Opposition when they are in the business of defending local authorities. They say often that local authorities can do the job. In relation to the disabled, they will be able to do that, and we shall back them.

The right hon. Member for Wythenshawe also asked what would happen about appeals and complaints. That is a fair question. Since April 1991, local authorities have been required to operate complaints procedures in relation to their social services functions. If an individual is dissatisfied with the outcome of the local authority assessment, he can make use of that procedure, which includes referral of the complaint to a panel with independent members if necessary.

Should cash payments be provided? We feel that the partnership arrangement between the individual, the fund and the local authority means that the individual has more not less choice as a total package of care is agreed, rather than some random services being provided by the local authority with a cash top-up from the fund. We do not believe that it is appropriate that the local authority should be able to make cash payments to individuals. There are difficulties in determining which clients would be eligible and in controlling costs. The need to develop funding and monitoring mechanisms is likely to lead to a bureaucratic and inflexible system.

The Government have given careful consideration to local authority payments and we have decided that at this stage it would not be wise to introduce such a provision. However, I see no reason for that to be an irreversible decision. I think I shall be responding to the mood of the House by keeping a close and careful eye on this issue for the future.

Mr. Sheerman: Unless the Minister was asleep when I made my speech, as he obviously is in his own, he should surely respond to those who have asked, including the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), why such a scheme can be permissible in Scotland but not in England. He should explain why we in England and Wales cannot have cash payments. Why is such a system bureaucratic and cumbersome?

Mr. Burt: I have given the hon. Gentleman an assurance that I shall examine extremely carefully the possibility of introducing cash payments in future. At the moment, we are not convinced that it is the right thing to do. Some local authorities find ways of making small cash payments, and that may be the position in Scotland. It is for local authorities to ensure that they keep such payments within bounds.

Some hon. Members have asked whether moneys could be given to charities or trusts to enable them to do the work. When the full flexibility of community care is understood, some of the concerns expressed by Opposition Members will disappear. The objective of community care, and the way in which it can work with the ILF, is to enable local authorities to provide services up to a cost of £200 a week, with £300 available as extra top-up, but they need not be provided by the local authority. A local authority must simply ensure that £200-worth of services are provided, but that could be done through an independent provider. Indeed, the one provider could supply the £500-worth of services. The degree of individualisation and flexibility was not previously understood.

Opposition Members seem to be confused about the responsibilities of the 1993 fund and those of local authorities. The ILF did not remove any responsibilities from local authorities and nor does the1993 fund. The 1993 fund simply provides an additional option for a particular client group—those aged between 16 and 65 years with care needs amounting to between £200 and £500 a week. People who do not fall into that group—that is those over 65 or those with needs that amount to less than £200 or more than £500 a week—will remain the responsibility of the local authority. For the majority of the severely disabled who do not fall into the special group for whom the 1993 fund was intended, the local authority will consider with the client what is the best way of providing or buying in care services. It is untrue to suggest that authorities will opt to pay £800 or £1,000 to place somebody in residential care when such expenditure, or less, could support that individual in the community.

In gist, if somebody is over 65 or is looking for care that will cost more than £500 a week, the local authority will be able to provide the individual care package that the ILF used to be able to supplement when community care did not exist. Opposition Members seem beset with the idea that our proposals should be considered outwith community care. They should understand that the community care individualisation package does the job for the vast majority of people who used to benefit from the ILF. That is why the concerns of Opposition Members are out of place.

In setting up the ILF extension and the 1993 fund, the Government are anxious to reassure those who are now on the ILF that they will be able to receive their new payments —the point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester—and notice nothing different—no change—except the name on the cheque. For the rest, the new fund will deal with a much smaller group of people, perhaps only 10 per authority, so the degree of bureaucratic difficulty will not be as great as Opposition Members suggest.

There have been dealings with local authorities. I am convinced that the system will be a great success. I am convinced that, just as Opposition Members have now admitted that they made an error in denying the success of the original ILF, in years to come they will recognise that they have made an error tonight and will acknowledge that this is a good Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

DISABILITY (GRANTS) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That for the purpose of any Act resulting from the Disability (Grants) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of grants to—

(a) the Independent Living (Extension) Fund established by a deed dated 25th February 1993 and made between the Secretary of State for Social Security of the one part and Robin Glover Wendt and John Fletcher Shepherd of the other part,

(b) the Independent Living (1993) Fund established by a deed of the same date made between the same parties, and

(c) Motability.—[Mr. Wood.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.) and Order [26 February],

Highland and Islands Shipping Services

That the draft Undertaking by the Secretary of State for Scotland with the consent of Her Majesty's Treasury and of Orcargo Limited, which was laid before this House on 18th February, be approved.—[Mr. Wood.]

National Health Service (Charges)

10.1 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I understand that motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 are to be taken simultaneously. They have not yet been considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. You will appreciate that the timetabling of these statutory instruments for today is an imposition by the Government, not a request of the Opposition. It is quite unfair of the Government to impose them before the Select Committee set up by the House to examine statutory instruments and report back on any defects has had an opportunity to do its work. I hope that you, Madam Speaker, like me, will deprecate the Government's attitude in what is, in my view, a misuse of time and for denying the Committee the opportunity to do its work.

Madam Speaker: I have noted what the hon. Gentleman has said, but he will appreciate that the motions are in order—otherwise, they would not have appeared on the Order Paper for debate today.

10.2 pm

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the National Health Service (Optical Charges and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 418), dated 2nd March 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 2nd March, be annulled

I understand that it will be convenient also to consider motion No. 6—

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the National Health Service (Dental Charges) Amendment Regulations 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 419), dated 2nd March 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 2nd March, be annulled and motion No. 7—

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the National Health Service (Charges for Drugs and Appliances) Amendment Regulations 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 420), dated 2nd March 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 2nd March, be annulled.

I remind the House of the words you used, Madam Speaker, when you ruled on the manner in which the increases in charges had been announced to the world. You deprecated the way in which the Government had used the procedures of the House to make the announcement, without the opportunity to question Ministers on the regulations. Tonight, I deprecate the fact that the Secretary of State is not here, willing to answer for the Government questions about the increases.

We deprecate the substance of the announcement—the shameful and disgraceful increases in prescription charges, in charges for eye tests and spectacles, and in dental charges. The idea of charging the sick more in order to protect the rich more is a disgraceful act by a Government who have no morality. The increases hit at the most vulnerable people in the country—those who fall just above the income exemption levels or just outside the specific exemption levels. They and others would wish us tonight to question the Secretary of State if she were here, if she had bothered to turn up to defend Government policy, if she were not like Mary Poppins, leaving it to the No. 2 to answer for Government policy and if she were not ducking out of answering for what is a disgraceful act by a Government who know no shame. The Government are prepared, through increased prescriptions, to charge those suffering from cystic fibrosis, arachnoiditis, or chronic asthma or who—week in, week out—must take medication for blood pressure.

When that matter was raised with the Minister of State on a recent edition of BBC's "Question Time", he had the temerity to mislead the studio audience and viewers about whether cystic fibrosis was exempt from charging policy. Only last week I received a letter from a Mr. Brian Mott, who wrote to the Minister asking him to put the record straight. I ask the Minister to do so tonight.

Those young adults—and thankfully there are more of them—who reach the age when they qualify for prescription charges, and who previously would have died but for medical science, are compelled, if they have any income over and above the stringent exemption limits, to pay charges. Is it not time that people suffering from debilitating and life-threatening diseases were exempt from paying? Is it not time that the Government had the courage to admit that they were wrong and to widen the exemption limits? Will the Government allay tonight the fear that, far from increasing the number of prescriptions on the exemption list, they have every intention, either in tomorrow's Budget or in the autumn Budget, of reducing the number? Will the Minister of State make it clear tonight that those rumours are incorrect and that the Government will not tax even more of those who are sick or in need of support or help or of remedial action in order to protect the rich? That is what it amounts to.

One remains untouched by the regulations if one has a good job, good income, good health, good sight and good teeth—and one is lucky enough to have a family and friends who are also blessed in equal proportion in those respects. However, if one is in need of regular prescriptions or medication, one will be dealt with quite differently. Instead of the £14,000 a year gain that those earning more than £70,000 a year enjoy under Conservative tax changes, those most in need are taxed because they happen to be sick.

Raising prescription charges by eight times the rate of inflation—2,100 per cent. since 1979—in the course of 15 changes was done after a promise by the former Prime Minister, the guru of the new right, who on 18 April 1979 said:

"We have no intention to raise prescription charges."

Pardon my bad English, but those were the words of the former Prime Minister. In the same speech she said:

"Let me make it clear that the Conservative party has no plans for new NHS charges."

Will the Minister of State repeat the former Prime Minister's promise?

We are mindful tonight that the Government are on the point of breaking a second promise. Having broken their promise not to increase prescription charges from 20p, they are undoubtedly looking—and have already made it clear from the Treasury—to increase charges so that those receiving NHS treatment will pay for the service rather than taxpayers as a whole.

Why is the Secretary of State not prepared to respond tonight? The answer is simple. Just over 20 years ago, in "Poverty Pamphlet No. 8", she made her position clear. She spelt out why it was that people could not afford the 20p that they were then asked to pay towards their prescriptions. She quoted one mother as saying:

"It's a waste of his time and mine".

She was referring to visiting the doctor, because the family could not afford it. The pamphlet went on to say:

"one harassed mother said 'Eight mothers said that they could not afford the twenty pence prescription charge, and were shopping around the market for home-made cures for minor ailments.'"

Those are not my words; they are the words of the Secretary of State, who is so timorous—so unusually timorous; so remarkably timorous—that she will not stand up and answer those questions at the end of my speech. I am delighted that the Secretary of State has turned up, albeit late—less like Mary Poppins than like Cinderella at the ball.

Millions of people are concerned about the changes that we are discussing tonight, and about the way in which they are expected to pay the price of the Conservative Government's failure to deal with the economy. The Government have had to raise charges rather than taxes; they are unwilling to fund from general taxation what should rightly be a benefit for those who need medication most. Not only have they failed to keep promises and to protect people who need the occasional prescription; they have failed to protect those who need multiple regular prescriptions, week in, week out. That is why we are praying against the regulations.

A 50p increase per prescription may seem very little to people who earn vast sums out of the hard work of others. It may seem very little to Conservative Members. For many people, however, it will represent a major burden on their income. Three or four prescriptions will constitute a large imposition on those who are struggling just above income support levels, with just enough income to keep their families together. Such people are often on part-time earnings.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Health (Mr. Tim Yeo): What about the poll tax in Sheffield?

Mr. Blunkett: All that we get from Conservative Members are cheap remarks about people paying their poll tax. The poll tax and the prescription charge have one thing in common: they do not take from the rich, but they load disadvantages on to the poor. They are an alternative form of taxation. The most regressive taxation taxes those in specific need of medication while alleviating the position of those who could well afford to pay for that medication.

It is worse than that, however. It is nonsensical in itself for someone receiving one form of exemption to be exempt from everything, and for those who are not exempt to have to pay everything. Why should people suffering from cystic fibrosis not be exempt, while those suffering from ailments that are already exempt find that everything else falls into place?

Only this morning, I received a letter from a Mrs. Forbes of Aberdeen. Her son, aged 28, has cystic fibrosis, and is struggling for life. She is fortunate, because he is exempt—not because of the major life-threatening ailment from which he suffers, but because of a related problem that enables him to receive prescriptions. It is nonsensical; everyone knows that. The system needs to be changed, and the amounts that people are paying need to be frozen. Tonight, however, we are debating a 50p increase, and the draconian weighting of that increase on those who can least afford it.

Why are we debating the issue on the eve of the Budget? The answer is simple: the Government are not prepared —as they were not when they made the announcement —to stand up in the light of day and the public arena, knowing that they will be reported, and argue their case. They know that that case is wrong; they know that the charge should not be levied, and that they are being unfair to those who are least able to defend themselves.

The Minister for Health (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): From 1 April the National Health Service (Charges for Drugs and Appliances) Amendment Regulations 1993, the National Health Service (Dental Charges) Amendment Regulations 1993 and their Scottish equivalents introduce responsible increases in NHS prescription charges and in the maximum and proportional charges for dental treatment. Those charges will be paid only by people who can afford to contribute to the cost of their treatment and medication.

The existing wide-ranging exemptions and remission for people who cannot afford prescription charges are unchanged. No child, no expectant or nursing mother, no state retirement pensioner and no one on income support or family credit pays a charge. They and the people who get free prescriptions because they are exempt on medical grounds or are on a low income are unaffected by the 50p increase.

I shall set the regulations in context. NHS spending is at an all-time high. The gross provision for 1993-94 is over £37 billion, a real terms increase over this year and up by 61 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79. To put it another way, we are spending just over £100 million a day on the national health service. That amounts to £649 for every man, woman and child compared in equivalent constant prices with £417 when the last Labour Government left office.

In 1992-93, £19 of every £20 spent on the NHS will be met from taxes and national insurance contributions. It is estimated that less than 4 per cent. will be met from all the charges in the NHS put together. Nevertheless, that 4 per cent. is not insignificant in terms of better patient care. From 1 April the proposed increase in prescription charges from £3·75 to £4·25 will raise about £278 million a year for the NHS in England alone. Opposition Members may be interested to know that that would fund the building of about seven 300-bed district general hospitals and their running costs, or over 70,000 hip replacement operations or more than 45,000 coronary artery bypass grafts.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Not long ago I wrote to the Minister about a constituent with a chronic disease. The reply that I got only a week or so ago was basically that if the Government gave her an exemption they would need to exempt people with cancer, with dialysis problems, with diabetes—the lot. Does not the Minister realise that our hospital bill will increase if people cannot afford the medicine that will keep them out of hospital? An increase of 50p will deny proper medicine to people on low wages and they will end up in hospital costing £600 to £2,000 a week. Is that the way that the Minister want to go?

Dr. Mawhinney: Of course, there must be some truth in the hon. Gentleman's general proposition, but he was not listening to me. I said that those on low income were exempt from charges. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's point is not valid.

On average, people who pay prescription charges receive six items a year on prescription. The new prescription charge, which is still much less than the average total cost of a prescribed item to the NHS, will cost such people £3 a year more than they are paying this year. For the minority who pay charges and who are heavier than average users of prescribed items, the prescription prepayment certificates offer real savings. The new proposed cost of four-monthly and annual prescription prepayment certificates will be £22 and £60 respectively. As hon. Members know, other charges will be increased by a percentage similar to the rise in prescription charges.

Perhaps Opposition Members would like to suggest which of our planned improvements in NHS services next year they would like to cut to make up the shortfall. Such cuts would take place without providing any benefit for the least-well-off because they do not pay prescription charges. The charging structure recognises people's differing ability to pay. Four out of every five prescribed items are now dispensed free—more than at any time since the Labour Government reintroduced prescription charges in 1968. When Labour last left power in 1979, only three out of five prescriptions were dispensed free.

We propose to increase the maximum charge for a course of dental treatment which starts on or after 1 April this year from £225 to £250. I noticed that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) did not mention dental charges, so I am grateful to him for his support on this aspect of the regulations. That increase will affect less than 1 per cent. of adult courses of treatment. At the same time, the proportion that a patient contributes to the cost of a course of dental treatment will increase from 75 to 80 per cent. Increases in the proportional and maximum charges for dental treatment will raise an estimated £17 million for the national health service in England in 1993-94 and about £25 million in a full year. And £25 million is equivalent to the annual cost of about 250 general dental practitioners.

As with prescription charges, only those who can afford to do so are asked to contribute towards the cost of their dental treatment. All treatment to those under 18 years of age is free and some 21 per cent. of adult courses of treatment are free. Many others on low incomes get treatment at reduced rates. We are seeking to encourage a positive attitude and changed habits to dental care through the provision of free dental treatment for children and the continuing care which the new contract for dentists introduced for all adults.

Since the introduction of the new contract, more people are coming forward for dental treatment and registering with a dentist. Adult registrations at 31 January were more than 21 million, an increase of 3·3 per cent. since 1 July 1992. More courses of treatment are being undertaken on these people. That does not sound to me like a system under which people are so scared of charges that they put off going to the dentist.

Finally, the National Health Service (Optical Charges and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1993, together with their Scottish equivalents, increase the value of optical vouchers by an average of 2·75 per cent. Once again this increase is in excess of the current rate of inflation and should preserve the real terms value of the vouchers. About 34 per cent. of the population are entitled to optical vouchers, including children under 16, students under 19, people on income support or family credit, others on low incomes and people who need certain complex lenses. Expenditure on the optical voucher scheme costs the NHS about £100 million a year.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): Will the Minister be kind enough to explain to the House what he means by "low income" before people have to pay?

Dr. Mawhinney: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows the answer to that question. It relates to qualification for existing social security benefits.

Last year, from 1 April, we carried out a wholesale redefinition of voucher bands. This increased the value of voucher A, the most common voucher, by over 20 per cent. and the majority of customers are considerably better off.

The hon. Member for Brightside set out the Opposition's current position on prescription charges. Year by year during the 1980s the Opposition attacked the Government for asking the limited number of people who actually pay prescription charges to contribute more. Year by year, the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) attempted to convince the world that he was outraged. Year by year he won his sound bite on the evening news, so when the time came to write the election manifestos, Conservative Members rushed to have a look at what the Opposition would say and see how they would use this opportunity to put their principles into practice. We looked for their pledge to reverse the rises in prescription charges which they had so vehemently opposed. We looked in vain. Labour devoted two pages of its manifesto to health, but, in all that space, it had precisely nothing to say about prescription charges. The hon. Member for Brightside had nothing to say about them this evening. He was but a poor, pale imitation of the hon. Member for Livingston—and we know where he progressed to.

Of course, in their manifesto, the Opposition were willing to remove £500 million from patient care to fund the minimum wage proposals, so beloved of their union sponsors, but even they baulked at having to remove another £240 million by scrapping prescription charges. Unless the hon. Member for Brightside is able to do better than he has this evening, the pages of his speech and all the words that he will pour forth in sound bites tomorrow and in the weeks to come will wind up in the same paper shredder as the words of the hon. Member for Livingston. The hon. Member for Brightside is trying to have it both ways—outrage but no guts to make a commitment that he would reverse the changes that we are announcing tonight.

All Governments have to make choices. We are committed to increasing spending on the NHS and our record is significantly better that than of the Opposition. However, we also have to balance the needs of the service against finite resources. Available resources should be directed at the greater need. The charges for dental treatment and prescriptions, which will apply from 1 April, are a small but nevertheless important contribution towards the funding of the NHS and will continue to be paid only by those who can afford that contribution.

The public understand the usefulness of a limited additional contribution to the NHS from those who can afford it. Their concern is not to engage in party political point scoring, especially of the spurious type so beloved of Labour politicians, but to have the best possible national health service. Those who share the public concern should vote against the motions.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I welcome the chance to debate the issues, but not the increases in prescription or dental charges. I welcome the increase in the value of the voucher, although it does not go far enough.

This is the 15th rise in prescription charges since 1979. There has been a horrendous increase of 2,000 per cent., a 13 per cent. increase on current levels and, at the same time, an increase of only 1 per cent. in real terms in the whole national health service budget. How can the Government justify a 13 per cent. increase in prescription charges but a real terms increase of only 1 per cent. in the NHS budget? So much for the NHS being free at the point of delivery.

How many more people will be put off going to their general practitioner for a prescription? The pharmaceutical industry has said that increases could be dangerous because many patients will have to choose between which prescription they collect. I know of people in my constituency who have already had to choose between painkillers and antibiotics. Of course, they opt for the painkillers because they want to kill the pain, but they are storing up problems for the future. If they do not take the antibiotics, they will cause long-term problems which will cost the health service more. The Government's attitude is, therefore, very short-sighted.

The Minister has just said that those who cannot afford to pay will not pay, but I disagree. Many people on very low incomes will not be able to afford to pay. They will not be included in the exemptions and they are not included at the moment. For example, students who receive loans are not exempt. Many students do not get free prescriptions, free eye tests or any of the other free services that they used to get. Certain people on invalidity benefit, for example, will not get free prescriptions.

The citizens advice bureaux brought the case of a constituent to my attention. He has to have medication to thin his blood and he cannot get that medication free. The medical exemptions were probably good enough when they were drawn up in 1968, but they must now be changed. I urge the Government to look at the matter seriously and to extend the list of medical exemptions to cover the advances in medicine in the past few years. My constituent might then be included in such a list of exemptions.

I know that the drugs bill is large—nobody disputes that. I know that the Government have said that we cannot afford the present drugs bill. Perhaps we should consider other areas, such as over-prescribing. I know that the Minister has done some work on that, which I welcome. Some general practitioners over-prescribe and issue repeat prescriptions far too often. GPs should also consider referring people for alternative medicine instead of putting them on to particular drugs. I understand that GPs can already do that under extra-contractual referrals, but I believe that many GPs are not aware that they can do that and I should like the Government to make GPs more aware that alternative medicine is available. That could mean that a patient could be referred for chiropractic, for example, instead of being given drugs.

Dental charges are up by 6·7 per cent. I know that that increase is not as great as the increase in prescription charges and I suppose that we should be grateful for small mercies; personally, I do not think that we should be. The patient's contribution is up from 75 per cent. to 80 per cent. As the Minister said, the maximum payable has increased from £225 to £250. In the past few years, NHS dentistry has been damaged beyond repair. Some dentists already refuse to take NHS patients. The regulations will make it even more difficult for patients to get treatment.

I have heard of a child in my constituency—I am looking into the case at the moment, so I do not know how true it is—who has been refused NHS treatment for a brace. She is a fairly young child and her father has brought the case to my attention. These regulations will not help patients to go to the dentist. Many people refuse to go to the dentist now for check-ups because they cannot afford it.

Then we turn to vouchers for glasses. The Federation of Ophthalmic and Dispensing Opticians, in a survey in 1992, found that the cheapest spectacles were £38·55 inclusive of VAT. The voucher was £23·70 and has gone up to £24·40. Where is the £14·15 to come from for those who need glasses and who are supposed to be getting them free? The voucher does not cover the cost of the spectacles.

A mother in my constituency has talked for the past few years to me and to anyone who will listen about her daughter, who keeps falling and breaking her glasses. She can get them repaired, but the voucher does not cover the cost completely. Each time her daughter falls and breaks her spectacles, she has to go to the optician and top up the money over and above the voucher. That is not good enough.

Dr. Mawhinney: May I point out to the hon. Lady that the most recent survey of spectacle retailers showed that 50 per cent. of retailers were able to offer spectacles at within the voucher value?

Ms Lynne: But 50 per cent. is nothing like enough. If one does not live in a constituency where——

Mr. Graham: Does the hon. Lady realise that I represent a rural constituency and that if my people had to keep running into the centre of town for prescriptions, they would pay pounds and pounds in transport costs—if they were lucky enough to get a bus in the first place?

Ms Lynne: I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

The Under-Secretary of State for Health said in 1991 that people would not have to top up. I gather that he meant that they would not have to top up at all. On 11 December 1991, in the Committee that considered the National Health Service regulations, the Under-Secretary said:

"The hon. Gentleman also sought reassurance that voucher values would be sufficient to permit anyone holding a voucher to have access to the purchase of spectacles without needing to pay a supplement. That is, indeed, the Government's view."—[Official Report, Second Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c., 11 December 1991; c. 14.]

Obviously it is not the Government's view any more, because the Minister refers to a figure of 50 per cent. Do the Minister and the Secretary of State think that the vouchers will cover costs in all cases? I doubt whether the hon. Gentleman could stand up at the Dispatch Box and say that, in every case, the voucher would cover the cost of spectacles.

There is real fear that people will not be able to get the treatment that they need. They will not be able to get their prescriptions. In many cases, they will not be able to get the dental care or the eye care that they need.

On 11 March 1993, Virginia Bottomley herself—[HON. MEMBERS: "Order".]—the Secretary of State for Health said:

"above all, the NHS will continue to offer care on the basis of need, not ability to pay."

I hope that the Government take that into account, because if the regulations go through tonight, that will certainly not be the case.

10.37 pm

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): It is always a joy to follow the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne). Whatever she tells the House, she tells it with great aplomb. The trouble is that she never tells us very much. It was most interesting to hear what the hon. Lady had to say. I refer her to a document that her party published in February 1992, entitled "Restoring the Nation's Health". The sum total of the Liberal Democrats' views on prescription charges can be paraphrased thus: the total abolition of charges is not necessarily desirable. So I ask the hon. Lady, "What is the Liberal Democrats' policy?"

Never mind the Liberal Democrats; let us deal with those on the Opposition Front Bench. A great thing happened to this nation last week. Mr. Yentob of the BBC made the cataclysmic announcement that "Eldorado" would be taken from our screens. Some of us occasionally switched on at 7 o'clock in the evening and watched totally inadequate, totally hopeless people limping from crisis to crisis, without any idea of what on earth they were doing. Where will we look now to make us look adequate? I suggest that we look at the health team on the Opposition Front Bench. I cannot attack their policy on prescriptions because I do not know what their policy is, and if I do not know what their policy is, I know that they do not know what their policy is.

In the run-up to the general election, the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said that Labour would freeze prescription charges and that, over time, they would decline in value.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. This is a specific debate about the Government's proposals and has nothing to do with Opposition policies. Many hon. Members wish to catch your eye to talk about the specific proposals before us. The hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) has spoken for some minutes now without mentioning the Government's proposals.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I usually allow a little latitude, but the word is "little". I am sure that that point will be taken on board.

Mr. Hayes: I always obey your rulings in these matters, Madam Deputy Speaker. In my constituency of Harlow, we live in a nuclear free zone. Obviously the Opposition Front Bench lives in a policy-free zone.

I was simply trying to constrast what Opposition Members have been saying with Government policy. That is a perfectly fair and reasonable thing to do. The Opposition spokesman did not tell us what the Opposition were going to do.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Order.

Mr. Hayes: The Opposition are praying against the regulations. They should have the courage to tell us what they are going to do. The House and the general public deserve an answer, but we have not heard an answer tonight.

What did we hear from the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) tonight? Perhaps he, or one of his colleagues, will tell us later what the Opposition will do. Would they freeze prescription charges or abolish them? Would they bring more money into the health service? Or is the hon. Gentleman going to continue, as the press reports that he is, to attack my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health?

In the Financial Times the hon. Member for Brightside accused my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health for caving in to the Treasury. He said that the Government were prepared to tax the sick, not the rich. Therefore, according to the hon. Member for Brightside, my right hon. Friend is caving in to the Treasury. The proposals in the regulations involve £278 million. Is that money going to the Treasury? No, it is going directly to health care and directly to the patients. As my hon. Friend the Minister said so eloquently a moment ago, it will go to hospitals, into coronary bypasses and into reduced waiting lists. [Interruption.] I am sorry. The hon. Member for Brightside may have said something about a policy. Is he attacking that amount of money?

The Opposition always talk about cuts. I talk about them as well. I remember the cuts in the pay of doctors and nurses under the last Labour Government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The subjects of tonight's debate are the regulations that make increases. Those regulations are being prayed against. The hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) should consider the pros and cons of the proposals.

Mr. Hayes: You are absolutely right, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, I thought it only fair, right and proper to put the record straight. The trouble is that the Opposition have no policy that we can attack. They have all the balance of a wet blancmange.

Hon. Members have asked me to consider the achievements in the drugs budget. We are talking about more than £2·3 billion being spent every year. Opposition Members said that we are taxing the sick and the poor. Four out of five prescriptions are free. They are free if one is pregnant, a child, elderly, or in receipt of income support. The provisions are the most generous in the western world. If the Opposition had any decency or honesty, they would admit that.

I do not want to provoke any of my Conservative colleagues who might be regarded as the gnomes of Maastricht—mercifully they are not here tonight—but perhaps I can refer to Europe. The Opposition are great at praying in aid what happens in Europe. Let us consider what happens in Europe.

Mr. Ron Davies: Order.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman may say, "Order", but my point is directly relevant to the debate. The Opposition tell us what happens in Europe and what should happen in this country in relation to Europe. They tell us how much money we should be spending vis-a-vis Europe. Perhaps I can remind hon. Members what happens in Europe. The German Government intend to reduce the drugs budget by 5 per cent. It is the intention of this Government——

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) trying to address the 50p increase in prescription charges that the Government have imposed on the people of this country or is he auditioning for a part in "Eldorado"?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is not for the Chair to judge the quality of any contribution.

Mr. Hayes: I am deeply grateful for that.

We are talking about a 50p increase for many people who are not poor, frail or most in need. It is the equivalent of two copies of the Daily Mirror, if anyone in his right mind wishes to read the Daily Mirror and I am not suggesting that the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) is in his right mind.

Spain and Britain are the only EC countries to exempt pensioners from prescription charges. German pensioners have 6·25 of their state pension deducted. In socialist France, with 3 million unemployed, pensioners are expected to pay £4·60p a day for hospital charges, and in Belgium pensioners pay up to 25 per cent. of a doctor's consultation fee. What are the Opposition praying against? A 50p increase in the charge? We are talking about £278 million that is going not into the hands of the Treasury but directly into patient care. I cannot understand, and I doubt whether the general public can possibly comprehend, what on earth they are complaining about.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I wish to add my voice to those who object to a tax on the sick. I do not think that the poor or sick will gain any comfort from the speech of the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), and certainly not from the Minister's hard and unfeeling speech. He presented an almost Dickensian figure at the Dispatch Box. Far from protecting those who are on low incomes and need medication, the Government have placed an intolerable burden on them. The Minister tried to defend the indefensible, which probably accounted for his rather heartless rhetoric.

Fourteen months ago, I introduced the Health Benefits Bill, which would have exempted from prescription charges all people in receipt of other benefits. Conservative Members do not realise or recognise that people who claim poll tax benefit, housing benefit, invalidity benefit or disablement benefit are not entitled to free prescriptions, yet their low incomes are recognised by the fact that they need help with such basic needs as housing. The Minister was challenged about the level of incomes of people who are in receipt of benefits, but he did not have an idea. I do not think that he lives in the same world as anybody else.

My Bill would have exempted from prescription charges anybody who was diagnosed as chronically sick. It seems eminently sensible that if people have chronic illnesses the least a caring society should do is to ensure that they have free medication. It would have exempted people requiring long-term medication, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) referred, such as those with chronic bowel disease. A constituent of mine has Crohn's disease. He received an increase in benefit of just 8 per cent., which took him above the level at which he could get free prescriptions. He needs them weekly—all the time, in fact. So he ended up with a cut in his weekly income of £3.

I wish that the Minister had taken more notice of my Bill, which would have taken care of such people. Those with asthma, multiple sclerosis and cancer do not automatically get free prescriptions.

One of the saddest categories of people whom the Government continually ignore is that of the mentally ill. I have a great deal of contact with a self-help group in Halifax. The group is for people who have suffered from a mental illness, and it is called Calderdale Survivors Speak Out. Its members would clearly tell the Minister about their friends who, when faced with electricity and other bills, often pay the bills but do without their medication. They then get progressively worse and end up back in hospital, costing the system a lot more than if they had had free prescriptions in the first place. It is obvious to all that such people will be badly affected by the increase proposed tonight.

The Bill that I presented drew attention to the help that may be derived from the health benefits scheme. Those benefits are for dental and optical charges, and for travel costs—but they offer little or no help with prescriptions. In practice, the scheme does not meet its objectives. It is terribly bureaucratic, and thousands of people are deterred from claiming health benefits because of the scheme's complexity.

I sent the Minister a copy of the form that people are expected to fill in to claim back small amounts. Its 20 pages contain 50 questions. Not surprisingly, there was no reply from the Minister.

In reply to a question from a Conservative Member almost two years ago, the Secretary of State for Health promised:

"During 1991, the Department of Health will undertake a review of the administration of the low income scheme. The review will produce proposals by the end of 1991 for simplifying the claim form AG1 and other administrative procedures."—[Official Report, 22 May 1991; Vol. 191, c. 530.]

Nearly two years on, we are still waiting for the Secretary of State to do something about this complex and wasteful system.

The system has failed. Almost 1 million people a year try to get help through it. The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux said last year that almost 100,000 people a year go to them for help to fill in the forms. Even so, 35 per cent. of all forms are sent back to the claimants because they are incorrectly completed.

The Government have a duty to tell us tonight what they intend to do about the health benefits scheme. It offers some help, but it is so complex that it is failing to help those who need it most.

I felt ashamed this evening to hear the Minister trying to defend the £4·25 that the Government now charge for each prescription. The Minister talked about the last Labour Government. The charge was 20p in 1979. The Minister cannot defend an increase that attacks the most vulnerable people in society—who go without the treatments that they require because the Government have callously decided to tax the sick.

10.54 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): There is no question but that our national health service is the finest in the world. It is the envy of the world and many people from all over the world come here to examine in great detail the way in which we handle it. Perhaps because it is the best in the world, it is one of the most costly and the taxpayer does not have a bottomless pit of money. The Government do not have any money at all. What they have is taxpayers' money, which they have to circulate——

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): Do not be stupid.

Mr. Dickens: I am not being stupid. The Government have to recirculate the money and spend it in a wise way, to the benefit of everyone.

I suspect that, if I were in opposition, I might be praying against the regulations. However, I would not be doing it for genuine reasons—I would be doing it to make political advantage, as the Opposition are doing this evening. If only four out of five people pay for prescriptions, aid must be targeted on those in greatest need. It is marvellous that not one pensioner nor person on income support has to pay for a prescription.

I feel sorry for some people—those who are in the narrow band of the poverty trap. They are considered too rich to get any benefits, but they are often a little too poor to keep paying ever-increasing prices. We appreciate that a line has to be drawn somewhere. I often used to get letters from people saying that they would willingly pay more tax to do something about this or that. I would write saying that my local hospital would be grateful to receive a donation towards various units, but those units never got any money from my constituents. Sometimes, such claims are false.

People are nervous about their health and they should be pleased that we have such a wonderful health service. I do not want to make a long contribution, because I know that some—[HON. MEMBERS: "Go on!"] Well, in that case, I will. Many hon. Members wish to speak. We have had some thoughtful contributions.

I congratulate my very dear friends the Secretary of State and the Minister for Health on what they are doing for the health service. Many of our reforms, which cost an awful lot of money, meet initial opposition. All the medics were up in arms and against reforms, but now they are rushing to be budget holders and to be part of an NHS trust. They can see the benefits, but those benefits have to be paid for. As the Secretary of State and the Minister realise that throwing resources at everything is not always the answer, they have introduced streamlining and efficiency. That is why we have such a great health service.

Each and every hon. Member should be honest. We have something very precious. They must not whinge and run it down. If those who can afford have to pay a little more, they should remember that the money will not go to build motorways. It will go into the NHS for further patient care. Who knows, the constituents who write to Opposition Members may need that care and they will thank God that we have a health service. Perhaps they will even thank Him that we charge those who can pay just a little more. We should remember that some people can get a season ticket. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Hon. Members asked me to continue.

[Mr. Dickens]

You know me and my generous disposition, Madam Deputy Speaker. I would not take advantage of all those who want to continue to rubbish the health service. One day, Opposition Members, or their constituents, might be glad of the NHS. They should thank God—I know that they are praying against the regulations—that they are fortunate enough to live in the United Kingdom, comforted by a health service second to none—I defy anybody to tell me of a better one—paid for by the taxpayer. He pays for new techniques, new operations and procedures that were not even thought of only a few years ago. We are delivering them now.

Hon. Members should remember that ours is the best health service in the world. I shall now be fair and let others speak in the debate.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): The hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), who is no longer in his place, was clowning, as usual. His feet were planted firmly in the air. The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) followed the example of his hon. Friend and we heard the same nonsensical rhetoric.

The Opposition are not arguing that the moneys collected from prescription charges will not go to the health service. We are not saying that they will go to the Treasury. We are arguing that the moneys, if necessary, should come from the Treasury. We are engaged in an economic debate because with the rundown in the economy the health service can no longer be funded properly. We are not talking about where the moneys that will be collected from the outrageous increases will be spent. We simply say that the increases are outrageous. After all, we are faced with a current charge of £3·75.

I take four forms of medication a day for a minor ailment. Under the Government's proposal, I would be faced with a charge of £17. I am extremely fortunate because I can afford that.

Dr. Mawhinney: If the hon. Gentleman cared to buy a season ticket, the charge would be £22 for three months.

Mr. Boyce: That is right. I could afford that. In fact, I have a season ticket. The Minister should understand, however, that some people would not be able to afford a charge of £17, let alone £22. People are having to make choices and I doubt whether they are going without their medicine. Indeed, they could not do so. That means that they do not spend on other things. If the poll tax suffers —their payments—they will be hounded. They will be put under pressure for the non-payment of an iniquitous tax. We know that all Conservative Members voted in favour of that pernicious tax and imposed it on working people.

Earlier, I asked the Minister about the level of benefits. The hon. Gentleman said that I should be aware of it. I am only too well aware. After all, it was a rhetorical question. We are talking about those who are slightly above income support level, who are the poorest in society. I knew the answer to my question.

There will be a time of reckoning. The time will come when the Conservative party will have to account for all the misery that it has inflicted on ordinary people. If the Government want to find the money without increasing charges—my opinion may not be shared by all my right hon. and hon. Friends—they should scrap the nuclear arms programme.

11.4 pm

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): I am astounded that the poor and the sick of our nation are expected to pay increased prescription charges. I never thought that the Government would have the audacity once again to increase the charges. I listened to the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), and I thought that I was listening to Jean Harlow, an actress. As for the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), what an example we present of fat, healthy people. However, we have £31,000 a year and can afford the increase in charges. Many people in my constituency cannot pay the current prescription charges.

I have written to the Department on a number of occasions, seeking exemptions for chronically sick constituents. The answers that I received were horrific; they were insensitive to the problems of sick people. How can any Health Minister say that he will not give an exemption to a chronically sick person? How can he say that he will not give an exemption to someone suffering from cancer?

A woman constituent wrote to me about her husband, who was suffering from cancer. She had to buy £16 worth of medicine a week. She did everything possible to give her husband aid and succour in his dying days. I wrote to the Minister about that case. How, for God's sake, can we inflict such pain and suffering on the sick? Can hon. Members imagine being sick, going to the chemist with four prescriptions and saying, "Pick the one I don't need"? A doctor—a professional with the skills and ability at least to try to make someone well—has written four prescriptions, but the patient cannot afford them. Hang your head in shame, Minister——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly, but would he please remember that he is addressing me, not the Minister?

Mr. Graham: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker. Unfortunately, such matters get me wound up. If I do not fight for the sick and disabled, who will?

The Minister cannot get away with simply saying that the orders are the way to save £300 million in the health service. There is no saving when people are being denied proper medication because they cannot afford it. The Government should be trying to improve the provision of medication if there is a problem—and there is. There is a massive problem with thousands and thousands of constituents not getting the medication that they need. People are already suffering because of low pay; the regulations will make matters worse.

I do not want to take up parliamentary time. I am becoming so angry that I am likely to breach parliamentary order and privilege. My sick constituents deserve better from the Government. The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth said that there was not a bottomless pit. These regulations should be named the Bottomley pit. It is a pit of the Government seeking once again to tax the sick in our community.

There should be a new regime to look after the health of Great Britain, and under no circumstances should it be that lot sitting in the Department of Health. We do not want anyone—Tory, Liberal, nationalist or Labour voters—to suffer the indignity of a Government driven continually by the market place, by a free market. At the end of the day, millions of people are unemployed and thousands are on low pay. We sat for weeks and weeks listening to the Government talking about a trade union reform Bill. They abolished the wages councils, so we will see the spread of low pay, which will drive people further into bad health and sickness. They will not be able to recover because they will not have enough money to pay for prescriptions—and that will be because of the Government's unthinking, uncaring and sheer heartless attitude.

11.9 pm

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): Even though I have been in the House only a short time, I realise that it is traditional to refer to the remarks of the previous speaker. I can truthfully say that I have never been so strongly in agreement with the speaker who immediately preceded me, my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), as I am now. I will emphasise a number of his points and comment on tonight's announcement and our reaction to it. It is worth remarking on the nature of the announcement, the manner in which it was made, and the Government's defence—although I was able to agree with my hon. Friend that the Government have ceased to defend any of their proposals. The announcement was made in a matter-of-fact way, as if it were just a 50p increase. The point has already been made that prescription charges have in fact increased 2,000 per cent. under successive Conservative Governments.

The 50p rise in prescription charges represents a 13·33 percentage increase. The Government constantly boast about low inflation and the level of wage increases that should be sought—but the charges represent a 13 per cent. increase and the Government do not bat an eyelid. They think that it should be accepted without protest and query the fuss that we are making tonight.

The announcement was cynical and was delivered as though it was of little importance to anyone. The information was just slipped out. We learnt of the increase a week ago through a parliamentary procedure that did not involve a public announcement which would have allowed the public to react. The Opposition had to make it clear that the announcement had been made and to publicise it—just as it is left to the Opposition to comment on the increased charges tonight.

The Government have offered no defence. The Minister says that the poorest will be protected. Even the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) pointed out that those at the margin are in the most difficult position. The same was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde and other of my hon. Friends. To many, the increase represents a massive rise. For them, £4·25 for every prescription that they need is a lot of money. The Minister would not disagree that many people need double prescriptions and they will have to pay £1 more and a total bill of £8·50p. Many at the margin will have great difficulty paying those higher charges.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) mentioned certain categories who would suffer, such as students. I have engaged in correspondence with the Minister about a student in my constituency, who wrote to me setting out his budget. He said that he felt that, given his income, he should not have to pay the prescription charges. He was determined to get through his college course without recourse to a student loan; as he explained in his letter, he would much prefer to be free of debt when he graduated. He was trying not to draw heavily on his parents' resources, while also trying to complete his course without a loan.

When I asked the Minister why that student was having to pay prescription charges, it was explained to me that he was being charged as if he had drawn his student loan. He had been told that he had a notional student loan. He had been lent no actual money, but the fact that a loan was available to him apparently meant that the money that he had not claimed still counted against him. That is just one small indication of the lengths to which the Government will go to penalise, in this case, a student who was determined to complete his course and be free to pursue employment—if he could find it, that is—without the hindrance of a loan.

That student was forced to pay prescription charges on the basis that he had claimed a loan that he rightly had not claimed. He is just one of a category of people for whom the imposition of extra charges will be the last straw. A 13 per cent. increase in a charge that is so important to so many people is simply not acceptable. The defence advanced for the charges has been negligible; such a level has never been justified.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): An increase is now being proposed in the number of items being taken off the list that a doctor can prescribe. Those receiving the benefit of not having to pay prescription charges are now having to pay normal chemist shop prices. They are being hit twice. If they are elderly, for instance, they will get away with not paying prescription charges, but they will probably have to pay more for the same medicine than they would have paid otherwise.

Mr. Gunnell: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that important point, which has been raised by others. I only hope that the Chancellor will not impose VAT on medicines tomorrow. I noted that the pamphlet provided by the House of Commons Library included medicines among the items that might attract VAT; certainly, many people would be affected by that. As others have pointed out, there are quite different ways in which a Minister could choose to tackle the allegations of waste in prescribing.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) that our national health service is the best in the world. Can the hon. Gentleman tell me which country in the western industrialised world has lower prescription charges than those proposed in the regulations and which has exemptions more generous than those provided here? There is none.

Mr. Gunnell: I shall have to refer the hon. Gentleman to the paper that I have received from the Library. What I know, however, is that the Conservatives voted against the NHS when it was set up in 1947.

Mr. George Kynoch (Kincardine and Deeside): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member who has the Floor does not give way, hon. Members trying to intervene must sit down.

Mr. Gunnell: I think that I have said enough to make it clear that I, like my right hon. and hon. Friends, find the scale of the increases and the way in which they have been announced unacceptable. Once again the Conservative party is proving that the NHS is not safe in its hands.

Ms Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): In the few minutes that are left to me to sum up for the Opposition, it is important to return the debate to the subject of the regulations—the 13 per cent. increase in prescription charges. That is higher than the 1·5 per cent. pay increase that the Government forced on health service workers, whose lobby we saw today. The increases will take dental charges to 80 per cent. of the total cost of treatment for national health service patients. It is part of the Government's strategy to force dentistry out of the NHS.

There has been a great deal of misinformation from the Government about exemptions from charges and about who can or cannot afford to pay the increases. We should be under no illusions. The increases are a result of the Government's failed economic strategy. They are a tax on the sick to pay for the health service because the Government's economic strategy is not delivering the resources.

The increases will weigh heavily on those who just fail to qualify for the benefit that hon. Members have mentioned. Forty per cent. of the population pays national health service charges. Perhaps in his winding-up speech the Minister will reveal the information in the Government's possession about the true failure of their income and exemption schemes. The Minister wrote to Ms Ann Abraham, chief executive of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, on 16 July 1992. His letter followed the report by the association entitled "Health Warning" which pointed to the problems with the exemption scheme.

For example, people have to apply for exemption on a 19-page form. Even those who administer the scheme find the form difficult to understand and make erratic and incorrect judgments on people's entitlement. What must it seem like to people applying for needed medication? The grounds for exemption are not consistent. For instance, a pensioner is exempt from prescription charges but not from other charges. A pregnant woman can get help with most charges, but not with hospital visits. The maximum help that is available does not cover the total cost of, for example, optical charges.

The Government agreed that the system did not work and that the people they were trying to help were not helped by the system. In his letter to Ms Abraham the Minister said:

"As you know, the Government has been concerned to keep the arrangements for providing help with NHS charges under close scrutiny. The decision to carry out the Review announced by my predecessor shortly before the . . . report . . . was published, reflected our concern to improve . . . the Scheme.

Although the Review has been completed, more detailed work is being carried out on the wider implications of . . . the proposals. This will assist the decision making process."

Where is that review? What does that tell us about the Government's empty promises about helping people in need? Why did they not implement the review before looking at increasing the charges?

If we need further evidence about the complications of the scheme, I refer the Minister to a letter of 10 August 1992 to Baroness Hollis about the disability working allowance—a special allowance to help disabled people get back into work. However, they are not exempt from paying prescription charges, despite the fact that they are on low incomes.

The Royal Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain said that more people will be unable to have the medicines that they need. The president asked the Government to consider the implications—that people will be forced back to their doctors because they will have to choose between the drugs that they need instead of having them all. The British Medical Association calls this rise a tax on illness. It is illogical; it is unfair; it is discriminatory; and it bears no resemblance to the Government's rhetoric this evening. There should be no increases.

Dr. Mawhinney: With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker. I should have liked to——

Miss Joan Lestor (Eccles): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I believe that the Minister has to ask for the permission of the House to speak again. As a Member for the House, having been disgusted by the behaviour of those who have been on the Treasury Bench during the debate, I should like to deny the Minister the opportunity to speak again. If I may give you my reasons for this——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not necessary. A single objection, when a Minister seeks leave to speak again, is sufficient.

Mrs. Mahon: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. May I add my voice to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor).

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There is no need for that. A single objection is sufficient.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): On a different point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. [Interruption.]

Miss Lestor: Perhaps I may explain why I do not believe that the Minister should be allowed to speak again.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We do not need to have a debate about that. A single voice uttering dissent is sufficient.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. No more.

11.28 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): Once again, Madam Deputy Speaker, we have had a catalogue of whingeing and moaning and a lack of policy from the Opposition. My hon. Friends are not prepared to put up with their diatribes. Time and again——

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Miss Lestor rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is this a point of order?

Miss Lestor: Yes. The right hon. Lady came in late to this debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "You weren't here, either".] Oh, yes I was. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am already dealing with a point of order. [Interruption.] Order. I do not expect to be interrupted when I am addressing the House. Objection was taken to the Minister replying to the debate. Therefore, it seemed to me to be perfectly reasonable that the Secretary of State for Health should be given the opportunity to speak.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Every week, Madam Deputy Speaker, there are 2 million more free prescriptions than there were in 1979.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is this a different point of order?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. When the Secretary of State for Health stood up at the Dispatch Box, my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor) was on her feet. She ought surely to have been allowed to finish what she was saying.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a matter for me. If the criticism is of me, there is a regular way of dealing with it, which is by substantive motion tabled in the House—not now.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mrs. Bottomley: The Opposition are trying to deprive the House of the opportunity of hearing the sensible reasons why we have taken these decisions.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Prentice: Is it appropriate for the Secretary of State to reply to the debate as she arrived late and did not hear all the contributions?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is for the occupant of the Chair to decide who to call.

Mrs. Bottomley: I have full confidence in the Minister. He was ably explaining to the House the reasons for the decisions, but the Opposition refused to hear them.

Mr. Morgan rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The House is not behaving well. Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Morgan: Could you, Madam Deputy Speaker, tell the House whether you have received a request for a statement on the collapse of the Government's court case between the Welsh Office——

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)).

The House proceeded to a Division——

Mr. Hayes (seated and covered): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you rule on whether there has been a gross abuse of procedure? Although the Opposition objected, properly, to my hon. Friend the Minister of State speaking, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State rose to speak, they refused to hear her arguments.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is not appropriate for me to deal with that now. Points of order taken during a Division must relate to the Division.

The House having divided: Ayes 229, Noes 289.

Wessex RHA (Computer Project)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

11.43 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): I am extremely grateful for the opportunity to initiate this Adjournment debate. Over a period of eight years, Wessex regional health authority spent more than £60 million on the failed regional information systems plan—or RISP—computer project. Millions were wasted. The Public Accounts Committee will now examine the Wessex saga in detail, but it might not have done so had it not been for inquiries by Computer Weekly, The Independent and myself.

Ministers have known everything that I am about to say for months and, in some cases, years. They have done nothing to reveal the full facts. It is only today, faced with the prospect of this debate, that Ministers have announced new measures to control computer projects in the health service. Control will never be successful, however, until the full lessons of Wessex have been learnt.

I have four main concerns: the failure of the Department of Health to control Wessex and its active connivance at the cover-up; the network of personal, political, commercial and corporate interests that exploited Wessex and their interest in concealing the truth; the way in which Wessex sought to divert attention from key aspects of the RISP project, particularly those personally involving Sir Robin Buchanan, the chairman of Wessex and now of the NHS supplies authority; the abject failure in nearly every case to recover public funds or to take effective action against companies or individuals.

In September 1986, Arthur Andersen and Co. and IBM received the main RISP contract. Public concern broke out almost immediately because in May 1986 the tendering process had been reopened to enable the IBM-Andersen bid to move from fourth place to become the prime contractor.

The report that the Government had wanted to suppress reveals that, during that process, the RHA chair and/or the regional general manager were lobbied aggressively by people with vested interests: Jim Foster, who was an RHA member and also a board member of IBM; Sir Edwin Nixon, the then chairman of IBM, who became deputy chairman of Natwest; Sir Anthony Cleaver, the chief executive of IBM; and the noble Lord Jenkin, a consultant to Arthur Andersen, who clearly had unusual knowledge of rival bids which the district auditor implies were wrongly obtained through other Andersen consultancies with Wessex. At one stage, Andersen was allowed to accompany a Wessex visit to the United States to assess a DEC bid even though Andersen was a direct rival in competition. Andersen also took part in Wessex debriefings. There was much to cover up.

At least one company protested to the Department of Health. In 1986, the district auditor submitted a report in confidence which I am informed covered all the major issues revealed in the 1992 confidential auditor's report.

The Department knew what had happened, but immediately moved to conceal the truth. In December 1986, my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) asked the then Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton), who had advised Wessex on any aspect of the prospective contracts before tenders were invited. He was given a list of consultants employed between October 1984 and October 1985, but those arbitrary dates excluded Andersen's role dating back to 1983. The Minister did not draw attention to Andersen's role in 1986. At the time that that question was answered, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) was a junior Health Minister. Her husband and brother-in-law worked for Andersen.

On 17 December 1986, my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) asked the right hon. Member for Braintree on what basis, and by whom, the tendering companies for the Wessex RHA were selected. That question was answered five months later on 15 May, the day when Parliament was dissolved for the 1987 general election in which health was to be a major issue. A major scandal involving companies with individuals at the heart of the NHS and involving senior members of the Conservative party would have done grave damage to the Government. What better way to conceal a disingenuous answer than to wait five months until everyone's attention was elsewhere.

Not much happened in those five months. On 15 May the Minister told my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley:

> "I understand from the regional health authority that the tendering companies were selected under the EC-GATT arrangements."—[Official Report, 15 May 1987; Vol. 116, c. 431.]

On 21 October, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), told me

> "There is no record of any correspondence between the right hon. Member for Braintree and the then Regional General Manager . . . it is possible that such assurances were given verbally although it would now be impossible to verify . . . it is clear that this procedure was not followed on subsequent re-evaluation of the tenders, which led to the contract being awarded to a different company than that originally selected."

It took five months to make one alleged and unrecorded telephone call to produce an answer which was simply wrong and which the Department must have known, or suspected, was wrong.

It is not clear whether the district auditor who compiled the 1992 confidential report was asked to examine or was given access to the Department of Health's files on RISP. Last July, Wessex said

> "the people with principal responsibility for RISP in the period 1982 to 1989 are no longer employed by the RHA."

That was carefully worded and calculated to divert attention from three people associated with RISP after 1989. Sir Robin Buchanan became chairman in August 1988 after chairing the Bath district health authority when he must have been aware of the problems with RISP. Far from wrapping up RISP, he drove it forward long after health district support had collapsed.

Harry Tuffill was seconded to Wessex from IBM at Buchanan's request and reported directly to him. He was to abuse the conflict of interest inherent in the position that Buchanan had created for him. He did not leave Wessex until 1990.

The third was not a matter for Wessex staff: Philip Sellers was chairman of CSL. CSL advised Wessex on the privatisation of its computer division—the division responsible for RISP—and, through subsidiaries CFM and WIS, took over services. As the district auditor noted,

"The involvement of CSL as consultant and supplier was contrary to accepted best practice."

The WIS contract was negotiated before Buchanan became chair and signed just afterwards. It effectively enabled Sellers' company to determine Wessex's computer budget in the company's interests. According to the district auditor,

"at worst, CSL knowingly or recklessly intended to promote its own interests and those of its subsidiary, WIS, at the expense of the RHA and public funds."

Did Sir Robin end this deplorable situation? Far from it. He tried to raise a loan from Sellers to fund RISP in Bath, which, given WIS's position, would have been used to fund work by Sellers' companies, CSL and CFM, which enjoyed a unique ability to exploit the region, and would have been repaid by the taxpayer.

Sir Robin personally renegotiated the WIS contract in February 1990 on terms even more favourable to WIS. By this time, RISP was collapsing. Eight out of 10 districts had refused to accept the system. RISP should have been closed down, but Sir Robin went ahead. Bypassing the region's internal and external legal advisers, he brought in solicitors, Blake Lapthorn, who had never worked for the RHA before and who reported directly to him. The contract removed penalty and performance clauses. New provisions, which Deloittes advised against, were incorporated in the new contract that Sir Robin personally negotiated.

What was the position? WIS, a private company, could undertake work for other organisations knowing that its staff costs and overheads were already paid for—even overpaid for—by Wessex. The contract signed with WIS paid for 40 staff more than worked for the company. Work done by WIS for Rampton and Broadmoor was undertaken at non-commercial rates but was of course pure profit. Wessex was meant to get a share of the profits, but the original 50:50 split was altered under Sir Robin's chairmanship to become two to one in favour of WIS. According to the district auditor, there are strong grounds for questioning whether Wessex regional health authority has received full credit for profits earned on outside work undertaken by WIS. A payment of £68,000 "would appear suspect", as WIS recorded a turnover of £4·7 million.

When WIS and its parent company, CFM, ended their relationship with Wessex in 1991, they took possession of office equipment and personal computers. According to the auditor,

"it is probable that the equipment taken by CFM included items that were the property of Wessex. CFM should be required to prove that equipment they had taken possession of had not been paid for by Wessex."

Under the contract, WIS records should have been made available to the auditors. To date, the confidential report records that

"these records have not been examined by Wessex or its internal auditors."

Sir Robin Buchanan attempted to borrow money from Sellers to implement the RISP project. He negotiated the WIS contract in Mr. Sellers' favour, but he did not apply elementary audit procedures to Sellers' companies. Sir Robin Buchanan is now chairman of the NHS supplies authority, responsible for £4 billion a year of public money.

The Department had said that the WIS contract should be tightened. It knew that it had not been. The Department did nothing. I understand that one district auditor who reported on RISP to the Department of Health from 1986 to 1989 finally resigned from the service in frustration, sending a file to the Department.

The district auditor said that Wessex should take action against CSL for breach of contract. He said that it should take action against CSL and WIS in respect of neglect and/or fraudulent advice and should recover money paid ultra vires or for work not needed by, and in respect of which no benefit accrued to, the regional health authority. He also said that Wessex should take action against Andersen/IBM; and that IBM should be asked to return part of the money paid for a 3090 computer, bearing in mind that the RHA had a good legal claim against the IBM secondee, Tuffill, who advised against cancellation.

I have, before this debate, tabled a series of early-day motions covering the auditor's main conclusions about the action that Wessex should have taken. To date, all action against IBM and Andersen has been dropped. Ministers have told me in parliamentary answers that this is entirely a matter for Wessex, but Wessex is the very organisation chaired by the very individual with the most to lose from full exposure of these facts in a court of law.

Wessex is now attempting to avoid court action involving WIS and its parent companies, again avoiding exposure and public scrutiny of private settlements. No doubt Ministers will say that this is a matter for Wessex as well, but it is all a convenient means of hiding the truth.

Full exposure would not just hit those directly associated with the Wessex saga. In his report, the auditor criticises the NHS management executive for lack of co-ordination, lack of effective management and project control, little attempt to cost-justify it, and too much reliance on suppliers. Much responsibility for the state of affairs that allowed Wessex to be exploited must lie with the chief executive of the NHS management board. From 1986 to 1989 the chief executive of the board was Sir Leonard Peach, now chairman of the Police Complaints Authority. He had been seconded to that post from IBM, which continued to pay his salary.

The drive to bring business principles into the NHS laid bare the heart of the NHS to business exploitation and a network of influence with close connections to the Conservative party. That, above all, is why everyone has been so anxious to cover up the RISP affair.

The Public Accounts Committee inquiry is welcome, but I believe that an inquiry is also needed into the conduct of Ministers and the Department. I believe that at every stage there were Ministers and officials who were aware of what was happening in Wessex, but did nothing about it. I want an inquiry that will reveal how much the Department knew, when it knew it, who was informed, what advice Ministers gave, what decisions were taken about what, if anything, to reveal, and why so little was done. I want to know tonight whether the Government will encourage and support such an inquiry.

Meanwhile, the people of Wessex should be compensated for what they have lost. Tonight in aging Victorian wards at the Royal South Hants hospital in my constituency, patients will be settling down to sleep in wards that are run down, outdated and impossible to maintain at today's standards. Despite the care that patients receive from staff, those conditions should not exist in the NHS. It would cost £10 million to replace those wards—money that has been wasted on the RISP scandal. Will the Government refund the people of Wessex for what they have lost because of their neglect in recent years?

[Mr. John Denham]

On 11 February, the hon. Member for Bolton, West told my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer):

"I have every confidence in Sir Robin Buchanan".—[Official Report, 11 February 1993; Vol. 218, c. 762.]

Does he still have that confidence? When I raised this matter at Question Time on 23 February, the Minister told me:

"Waste is something that we do not recognise."—[Official Report, 23 February 1993; Vol. 218, c. 749.]

I wonder whether the Minister can now recognise what has been happening in our health service. When the NHS was set up under a Labour Government by Nye Bevan, the idea was that the wealth of the community should be used to banish the pain and suffering arising from ill health. When we see how companies and powerful individuals, who read like the roll call of the British establishment, have got into the NHS and used and manipulated it for their own benefit, we realise how far we have come and how low the Government have sunk.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on his success in the ballot for a debate on the Adjournment of the House. As I know from previous questions of his interest in information systems in the NHS, it is no suprise that he has chosen today to raise the matter of the Wessex regional information systems plan. However, there is no connection between the debate and the announcement of various future monitoring systems for the procurement of information technology in the NHS, made at Health Care Computing 1993. That is the largest such event in Europe, so it is not surprising that I made such an announcement in Harrogate this morning.

Before I reply to the points made by the hon. Gentleman, I think that it is important to make abundantly clear, in case any hon. Members or the public are under any misconception, that those events did not occur yesterday, this year or even in this decade. The matters to which he referred were proposed first by the Wessex regional health authority in the early 1980s, and were developed from 1984 until cancelled in early 1990 by the then new regional general manager of Wessex RHA.

That is not to say that I am trying to, or would, defend what occurred on the project during that period. We do not defend what appears to be a gross mishandling of public money, and neither does the regional health authority. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health said on 10 February that she welcomed the decision by the Public Accounts Committee to commission a further report on the project for the Comptroller and Auditor General. We believe that it is important that the matters should be studied and lessons learnt. That is also why I welcome the opportunity to reply to the hon. Gentleman on that important matter.

Before I go any further, I must say that the hon. Gentleman has used his parliamentary privilege to cast aspersions on the integrity of a number of people in public life. I found particularly regrettable the mention, which he did not develop, of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) and her work with a certain company. I think that he would not dare repeat several of his remarks outside the House.

Mr. Denham: If the Minister reads the official record, he will see that I put together a conjunction of simple factual statements. I have not repeated certain allegations that were made in 1986 about the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). Does the Minister agree that the best way to resolve the issues involving that hon. Member and others would be for him to support an independent inquiry into the conduct of the Department of Health, and of Ministers, which I urged on him earlier in the debate?

Mr. Sackville: The hon. Gentleman knows that the Public Accounts Committee will be investigating all those matters.

I do not propose to defend the actions of individuals previously employed by Wessex RHA. As the hon. Gentleman knows, some of those individuals appeared in court in Winchester earlier this month to answer for their actions. I am here to defend the actions of the current management of Wessex RHA, which has devoted a considerable amount of time to ensuring that all factors contributing to that have been fully investigated and that budgetary, financial and management lessons have been identified and learnt.

It is important to remember that it was the current regional general manager, fully supported by his regional chairman, Sir Robin Buchanan, who took urgent action on his arrival in the region to rectify the weaknesses inherited from the previous general manager which were the root cause of the RISP affair. It was these remedial actions that the district auditor commended in his report in the public interest.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that on many occasions the Wessex RHA tried to cover up or suppress the events concerned with RISP. That is rubbish. I remind him that it was the RHA which invited the district auditor to carry out his investigations. It was the RHA which held a press conference in July 1992 to announce the findings of the district auditor. It was the RHA which on several other occasions held press conferences at which it always answered questions put to it. In addition, the RHA and its staff have complied fully with requests from the National Audit Office, the District Audit Service, the Public Accounts Committee and the NHS Management Executive for any information or clarification on matters relating to RISP. I know that they will continue to do so despite allegations to the contrary from sections of the press and the hon. Gentleman. I find the hon. Gentleman's allegations all the more remarkable as I understand that the regional chairman wrote to him in November 1992 offering to discuss his concerns and to answer fully any questions that he wished to put. I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has now taken up that offer to discuss the matter personally.

With regard to requests that Ministers should——

Mr. Denham: Will the Minister note that I accepted the invitation before I knew that I had secured tonight's Adjournment debate?

Mr. Sackville: Indeed the hon. Gentleman did—several months after the offer was made.

I have mentioned the very thorough actions taken by Wessex RHA to rectify the organisational and financial weaknesses where they were found to be the main cause of the failure of RISP. Before I turn to the actions that my Department has taken as a result of this and other problems with computer systems in Wessex, the west midlands and elsewhere, I should mention that legal actions are being taken by Wessex RHA as a result of its and the district auditor's inquiries.

As recommended in the district auditor's report, Wessex RHA has taken comprehensive legal advice. As a result of that advice, the RHA has reached a settlement with one of the computer suppliers, AT and T Istel. It was also decided at that time, on the basis of independent legal advice, not to pursue legal action against Arthur Andersen and Co. and IBM in respect of the contract for three of the five core systems which were to make up RISP. The RHA is taking actions against other companies involved in RISP and it would be inappropriate at this time to comment further on that. I would wish to reassure the House, however, that Wessex RHA is pursuing all avenues for legal redress. In addition, on the basis of the confidential information provided by the district auditor, the Hampshire constabulary has been pursuing its own inquiries into possible criminal charges resulting from the RISP project.

I turn to the actions taken by my Department to seek to ensure that events such as this one cannot be repeated. Earlier, as I have said, I addressed the 1993 conference in Harrogate. I was able to announce a series of measures to be taken to increase our control over future investment in information technology. Before describing them, I would not wish you, Madam Deputy Speaker, or anyone else, to gain the impression that the example that has been quoted is in any way typical of the investment that the NHS has made and makes in IT.

At today's prices, there are about £800 million-worth of computers operational in the NHS. Most of the money spent has gone into operational systems in hospitals such as patient administration systems, pathology and radiology. The majority of these systems are working day in and day out without problem. Unfortunately, things can and do go wrong. The events in Wessex and the west midlands, and unfortunately in the London ambulance service, are the results of what happens when things do go wrong.

There is never any simple explanation. We shall continue to study all the projects to learn from our mistakes. We have already identified some common threads, especially managers and IT professionals losing touch with the end users of systems; unrealistically high expectations; lack of formal project control, including financial control; lack of informed involvement by senior management; and, in some places, a level of IT skills that does not match what is required.

Mr. Denham: The Minister's list is interesting, but it does not include corruption, the use of influence, the use of insider knowledge, close relationships between NHS staff and suppliers of equipment, and the exploitation of those weaknesses by unscrupulous firms. Does he agree that those should also be on his list of what has gone wrong with the health authorities in Wessex and other places?

Mr. Sackville: If any of those allegations are proven, appropriate action will be taken.

Last December I announced the launch of a national strategy for IT. I stipulated that all future IT investments of more than £1 million would be reviewed by the management executive in the Department of Health against explicit criteria. I shall briefly list them—a properly structured business case based on good investment appraisal; a clear plan for benefits realisation; sufficient skilled and experienced IT staff; commitment from the chief executive, board chairman, clinicians, nurses and everyone involved to implementation and benefits realisation; proper project management; an adequately resourced and structured training programme; and a clear post-implementation evaluation of investment. I stress, as I did at the conference earlier today, that not only projects costing more than £1 million will be evaluated against the criteria; I have asked all authorities approving all substantial investments to use them.

I reiterate my appreciation to the regional chairman and the regional general manager of Wessex for their considerable efforts both in dealing with the affair and in the efficient and effective way that the health service is managed in Wessex. I have every confidence in Sir Robin Buchanan as chairman of the Wessex RHA and, indeed as chairman of the supplies authority. Only with his strong backing has the regional general manager been able to take the necessary actions, so commended by the district auditor, to rectify the weaknesses that led to the events mentioned in the debate. I have full confidence in the work that they and the authority have done to investigate these matters fully.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

TEC Courses (Sheffield)

1. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of students entering TEC courses in the Sheffield area (a) complete their course and (b) obtain employment when they finish.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): In Sheffield in 1991-92, 34 per cent. of people leaving youth training and 61 per cent. of those leaving employment training had completed their agreed training. 51 per cent. and 32 per cent. respectively of all those leaving courses were in employment six months after leaving.

Mrs. Jackson: In view of those appalling figures, showing that, at the end of youth training, two out of every three people on the scheme have no job to go to, and that two out of every three students on employment training are still out of work six months later, does the Minister accept that it is now time to put resources and money into real education and training for manufacturing jobs, and to make resources available so that local authorities can finance students properly through discretionary grants?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am sure that the hon. Lady will welcome the fact that, since 1986, unemployment in her constituency has fallen by about 24 per cent., and in the constituency of Sheffield, Central by 21 per cent. In Sheffield, Brightside, unemployment has fallen by 21 per cent. since 1986, and in Sheffield, Hallam by about 36 per cent. I should have thought that even the hon. Lady would have welcomed that.

Mr. Sykes: Is my hon. Friend aware that, some time ago, when Hamleys, the famous toy shop in Regent street, wanted to resettle in Sheffield, it was said that its rates in Sheffield would be higher than the rates in Regent street? Does my hon. Friend not agree that that is an example of the kind of ridiculous practices that Sheffield city council has pursued over the past 25 years?

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend's point about recruitment is true. That is why I am pleased that the Meadow Hall development has opened and made Sheffield council think carefully about how to attract business to its area.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is it not astonishing that the Minister should answer the supplementary question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mrs. Jackson) by citing unemployment figures, of all things? For how many months now have the Government increased unemployment? Yet the Minister cites unemployment figures in their favour. Is not the reality that the training, whether on ET or YT, and whether in Sheffield or nationwide, is pathetic, and that fewer than a quarter of the people on ET and fewer than one third of those on YT obtain a qualification? The last thing we need today is more promises of cheap low-quality training. What does the Minister intend to do to give decent-quality training to people out of work?

Mr. McLoughlin: What is pathetic is the way in which the Opposition continually carp and talk about training, yet have opposed every training scheme that the Government have introduced.

Mr. Evennett: Will my hon. Friend confirm that Britain is the only country in Europe that offers training places to 16 and 17-year-olds without a job? Should we not therefore be grateful, and encourage young people to take up the training places, with a view to getting jobs at the end of the placement?

Mr. McLoughlin: Indeed, my hon. Friend is right. Most young people who go on courses appreciate that youth training has been a substantial help in finding employment. The Opposition have said many times that we are failing to meet the youth training guarantee, but they have gone off talking about that subject because of the successful manner in which the TECs have managed to fulfil the guarantee overall.

Labour Statistics

2. Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will give figures on employment levels in manufacturing industry in each year since 1979.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): Employment in manufacturing in Britain was 4,593,000 in September 1992 compared with 7,253,000 in June 1979. Information for the intervening years can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the House Library.

Dr. Wright: Does not the Secretary of State understand that those figures tell the whole story about what has been happening to this economy since 1979? Three million jobs have been lost in manufacturing industry and half a million jobs have been lost in manufacturing in the west midlands alone. Does she not understand that it is an economic disaster because, when we get a competitive devaluation, we do not have a competitive base to take advantage of it? It is a social disaster because it destroys lives, families and communities—[HON. MEMBERS: "Question."] Finally, the question to the Secretary of State is this: when she spoke to the Chancellor of the Exchequer this morning, did she say, "Come on: the Prime Minister has told us we made a mistake. The time now is for jobs, jobs and more jobs"? Or did she say, "Let's have"——

Madam Speaker: Order. I call the Secretary of State.

Mrs. Shephard: As for what transpired this morning, the hon. Gentleman will have to possess his soul in patience—if he is capable of doing that. Instead of doing what the Labour party usually does and talk down British achievements, the hon. Gentleman should be congratulating British manufacturers on their highest ever export levels and on their outstanding improvements in productivity and profitability over the past decade. Or perhaps the hon. Gentleman advocates a return to Labour's manufacturing policy: overmanning, millions of working days lost through strikes and Red Robbo.

Sir Michael Neubert: Is not employment in manufacturing declining in most major industrialised countries, even in Germany, whose workers are now the most expensive in the world? Is it not extraordinary that, with its commitment to the statutory minimum wage and support for the social chapter, the Labour party wants to take us down that uncompetitive path?

Mrs. Shephard: Yes, that is indeed extraordinary. As my hon. Friend has said, manufacturing employment peaked in this country in the mid-1960s, and there has been a steady decline under all Governments since, as there has been in all other major industrialised countries. However, if we followed the policies of the Labour party, we would quickly cease to be competitive.

Mr. Barry Jones: Does the right hon. Lady know that, in my constituency, 500 of the best kind of manufacturing jobs have been lost at British Aerospace, Broughton, on the airbus project? Is she aware that it is feared that very soon more jobs will be lost in the same factory on the production line of the world-beating executive jet, the 125 series? May I have her assurance that she will tell the Cabinet that development area status should not be taken from my constituency? Does she understand that manufacturing jobs and regional policy go together? We want a national strategy for manufacturing.

Mrs. Shephard: I am reminded of the hon. Gentleman's passionate advocacy of free trade in our employment debate last week. I note what he says about the status of his constituency. As he will know, that is not a matter for me: the potiential job losses that he mentions are a matter of commercial decisions for the company concerned. However, whatever, happens, my Department in the form of TECs and the Employment Service, stand ready to help wherever people face unemployment.

Labour Statistics

3. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures she intends to bring foward to assist the unemployed in the east midlands.

Mr. McLoughlin: New arrangements, announced at the time of the autumn statement, will offer almost half a million more opportunities on our programmes in 1993-94 than we are providing this year.

Mr. Robathan: I thank my hon. Friend for that response. He will know that my constituency of Blaby is not one of those badly affected by the current high rates of unemployment. While recognising the awful and tragic consequences of unemployment, will my hon. Friend add his not inconsiderable weight in support of the excellent work of the Leicestershire TEC in my area and, in particular, the imaginative approach of the career choice scheme which is encouraging disaffected youngsters to go back into employment training, the child care voucher scheme——

Madam Speaker: Order. May we have a question?

Mr. Robathan: Will my hon. Friend particularly add his support to the close involvement of the TEC with the Leicestershire city challenge scheme and initiative fostering a partnership between the private and public sectors?

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend's point is correct. I shall be in Leicester tomorrow to sign the city challenge agreement between the Government and the city challenge organisation.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister agree that the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) is as wrong as his noble predecessor in his approach to the handling of unemployment, and that what matters in Leicester and the rest of the east midlands, where the traditional manufacturing industries of hosiery, knitwear and footwear are collapsing, is not to train unemployed people for jobs that will not exist but to help existing industries to stay alive and employ people?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am surprised that the Chairman of the Employment Select Committee downgrades and denigrates the training opportunities that are provided throughout Britain. That is an appalling indictment of him. The important factor is the amount of inward investment which has been attracted. The east midlands has benefited greatly from that inward investment. I should have thought that even the hon. and learned Gentleman might have welcomed that.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my hon. Friend consider that those who wish to undertake training should be encouraged? Therefore, does he believe that a good idea for helping the unemployed in the east midlands might be to make expenses incurred in whatever way in undertaking training allowable against tax?

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend asks a junior Minister to comment on tax matters. Today in particular, I do not wish to embark on that.

Mr. Barnes: If the initial pit closure programme is implemented in Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, some 30,000 jobs in coal mining and associated industries will be lost. What will that do to help unemployed people's prospects of getting work in the east midlands? Will he have a word with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to tell him that it is time to call the dogs off?

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will make a statement on the White Paper in due course. I should have thought that even the hon. Gentleman might welcome the Toyota investment in Derbyshire. That £700 million investment is the largest single investment in any country for some considerable time.

Jobcentres (Gloucestershire)

4. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how effective the jobcentres in Gloucestershire have been in placing people back into work.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Since 1 April 1992 jobcentres in Gloucestershire have placed 12,270 people in work—an increase of 18 per cent. on the same period last year.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend will be aware that every person who is newly unemployed is entitled to go to a jobcentre and have an in-depth interview for up to 45 minutes—[Interruption.]—to plan how to get back into work. Is not that, combined with the success of the jobcentres which my hon. Friend has just announced, a practical measure which shows that the Government are prepared to help the unemployed, unlike the Labour party, which merely utters platitudes?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is right. I am sure that the House will have noticed the jeers from Opposition Members when he referred to the excellent work done by the Employment Service. Of those people who become unemployed, two thirds find work within six months as a result of the efforts of the Employment Service. We owe a debt of gratitude to the Employment Service. For the longer-term unemployed, a range of measures, including job clubs, have been successful in placing long-term unemployed people back into work.

Child Care (West Midlands)

5. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the TECs have taken to encourage the provision of child care in the west midlands.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The work of TECs to set up child care provision in the west midlands will be boosted by the £45 million child care grant which I announced on 16 December last year, to be introduced this April.

Mr. Coombs: Given that Britain employs a higher proportion of the female population than any other country in Europe bar one, and that in the past three years the number of registered day nurses has doubled, does my right hon. Friend agree that there is enormous potential in the private sector to provide child care such as that provided by the excellent Hickory Dickory Dock nursery in my constituency? Will she do everything that she can to encourage that?

Mrs. Shephard: I am delighted to hear of my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for the Hickory Dickory Dock scheme. He is right: there has been a large growth in private child-minding and nursery provision. However, there is no doubt that my initiative, which has been keenly welcomed by playgroups the working mothers associations and others, will be a very useful supplement to the work that he describes, including that of the Hickory Dickory Dock scheme.

Job Clubs (Wales)

6. Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment she has made of the performance of job clubs in Wales.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The job club programme is very effective in helping long-term unemployed people in Wales. In the last year, job clubs in Wales have helped nearly 12,000 people, the majority of whom have found work as a resul, with others going on to training, further education or self-employment.

Mr. Sweeney: Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating those who operate the job clubs on their success? Does he agree that the effectiveness of their work is vital in maintaining the morale of those who become unemployed?

Mr. Forsyth: I am very happy to join my hon. Friend in congratulating those who run the job clubs. Eighty per cent. of the clubs have been contracted out to private-sector organisations, and approximately 53 per cent. of the people participating in job clubs in Wales are going on to employment, with a further 14 per cent. going into further education, training or self-employment. That is one reason why we will be expanding the number of job club places by some 75,000 during the next year.

Mr. Wigley: Does not the Minister realise that what we need in Wales are not job clubs, but jobs themselves? Does he not recognise that, in the old coal-mining areas and the old slate quarrying areas, we have long-term unemployment among the under-25s? What is he going to do to provide jobs for those people, rather than the apology provided by his job club regime?

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening, he would have heard that job clubs are singularly successful, in placing people in work, particularly in Wales. The hon. Gentleman should also know that more than 80 per cent. of people placed in jobs by job clubs are filling vacancies which have not been advertised through jobcentres.

The hon. Gentleman ought to be a little less gloomy. The facts are that, in the last year, manufacturing output is up, exports are up, investment is up and real incomes are up. The hon. Gentleman really ought to cheer up and give credit where credit is due.

Working Carers

7. Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what attention her Department is giving to the needs of those who work and also care for relatives.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department's policy of encouraging flexible working arrangements is of particular benefit to those who combine work with family responsibilities.

Mr. Wicks: Given the significance of the worker/carer issue—one in eight full-time employees and one in five part-time employees have caring responsibilities—will the Government introduce firmer employment measures to complement the community care strategy?

Mr. McLoughlin: There are a number of areas in which the Government have helped. The Department is always willing and ready to advise employers on the best way to arrange flexibility for people with care responsibilities.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend agree that the community care proposals have already brought into being an extraordinary range of varied provision for all kinds of people with such difficulties, which are very real? Will he give an assurance that his Department will join the Department of Health in encouraging the further expansion of these very desirable developments?

Mr. McLoughlin: I give my hon. Friend that assurance.

Work in the Community

8. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans she has to encourage work in the community.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Opportunities to undertake community work are currently available on employment action and other programmes run by my Department. My hon. Friend will be aware that training for work, which comes into force at the end of the month, will combine employment training and employment action.

Mr. Brown: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the employment action programme currently enables people to work in the community, cleaning up heritage sites and removing graffiti? Can she give some idea of how she might expand this programme? May I suggest that the railway stations between Newark and Cleethorpes, which suffer from graffiti, could come within the ambit of the scheme?

Mrs. Shephard: There is no doubt that the various tasks undertaken by people on the employment action scheme are not only useful but valuable. My hon. Friend clearly has his own enthusiasms—other tasks include helping elderly people, teaching literacy and numeracy skills and, in my constituency, running a museum.

Mr. McAllion: If the Secretary of State is serious about encouraging work in the community, why does she not intervene directly in the community of Dundee, where the management of Timex have sacked the entire work force for the crime of exercising their legal rights under the Government's trade union legislation? Is the Secretary of State content to add to the ranks of mass unemployed and so create the conditions in which those out of work envy those in work, those in work fear those out of work and bad employers such as Timex can drag down wages and conditions by exploiting the existing conditions?

Mrs. Shephard: The issues between Timex and its employees are a matter for the company; I note that the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service has not yet been called in.

Mrs. Peacock: Does my right hon. Friend agree that more people who are presently unemployed would be willing to become involved in voluntary work if they did not lose their entitlement to benefits when they undertook that work?

Mrs. Shephard: Unemployed people can engage in unpaid voluntary work and retain their benefits as long as they continue to look for work and are willing to give up that voluntary work at 24 hours' notice. My hon. Friend makes a valid point and, as she doubtless knows, we intend to build on the successes of employment action with other schemes.

Vacancies

9. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unfilled vacancies are currently recorded by her Department; and what is the extent of duplication of these numbers where vacancies are listed at more than one office.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Some 104,700 in January 1993. There is no duplication, as each vacancy is counted only once.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister give the House a categorical assurance that no duplication has previously occurred and been counted? Does he accept that if duplication has occurred, it may provide an innocent explanation for ministerial claims to have observed the green shoots of economic recovery? In that case, the cause would have been duplication and error, not villainy, as some of us suspect.

Mr. Forsyth: I am astonished at what the hon. Gentleman has said. I should have thought that he would know that the Employment Service in South Yorkshire has placed about 50 per cent. more people in jobs than two years ago. The Employment Service advertises a minority of the vacancies, which is why it has been advertising for more employers to place vacancies with it. The hon. Gentleman is well aware—as is everyone in the House—that there is a recession. However, the Employment Service is doing an excellent job and I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman seeks to denigrate its excellent activities.

Mr. Forman: I welcome my hon. Friend's clarification that there is no duplication, but is it not also true that the officially recorded statistics for vacancies understate the true number as they do not take account of those that are privately notified?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Vacancies may be advertised in several jobcentres so that people have an opportunity to apply for the jobs. We do not count the vacancies twice, but individually.

Mr. Dobson: Will the Minister confirm that, according to the Government's figures, there are 31 people chasing every job vacancy in the Chancellor's constituency, 181 people chasing every job vacancy in the Chief Secretary's constituency, and no fewer than 195 people chasing every job vacancy in the constituency where the Prime MInister grew up?

Mr. Forsyth: What I will confirm is that, if the hon. Gentleman had had his way and there was a minimum wage and a payroll tax, and we had embraced the social chapter, there would be 2 million more people out of work in this country.

Workfare

10. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what research her Department is currently undertaking into workfare; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We are considering a range of options to help unemployed people to use their time constructively.

Mr. Steen: Does the Secretary of State remember that in 1975 I, with Sir Leon Brittan, wrote to The Times advocating that the young unemployed, while waiting to join the work force, should be encouraged to become a force for good by being given opportunities to provide personal service in the community for the benefit of people less fortunate than themselves and should be paid a wage equivalent to their unemployment benefit? Eighteen years on, the situation has not changed. Young people should be given an opportunity to do something, rather than take taxpayers' money and do nothing in return.

Mrs. Shephard: Of course, I remember my hon. Friend's letter very well. I know that his interest in these matters goes back a considerable time. He has always argued that the principle of mutual responsibility should be applied in the designing of schemes for unemployed people—particularly young unemployed people—and I agree.

Mr. Cryer: Is not it the job of the Government to avoid mucking about with marshmallow schemes like workfare to create fake jobs and instead to adopt an economic policy that will encourage manufacturing industry to provide proper jobs for all our people? While the right hon. Lady is about it, will she condemn those people who take taxpayers' money but do nothing in return, such as Tory Members of Parliament, who take their salaries and also line their pockets with the proceeds of outside job after outside job?

Mrs. Shephard: Some hon. Members take two lots of money from the taxpayer. I refer, for instance, to those who have a dual mandate in Europe. Conservative Members know that people want real jobs. That is why our policies have been aimed at producing the lowest inflation rate that we have had for 25 years, the lowest interest rates in the European Community, a competitive exchange rate, the lowest level of business taxation, and non-wage costs at 61 per cent. of the level of those in Germany. That is what we mean, but not what the hon. Gentleman means, by the right framework for real jobs.

Mr. Paice: When considering workfare, will my right hon. Friend look behind the hype of exploitation and all the other adjectives that are used to describe the scheme? Will she recognise that, for many people, doing something useful in return for the money that they receive as benefit is a means of retaining some pride in themselves and that there is a sound and valid argument for the introduction of the widest possible opportunity for this to happen?

Mrs. Shephard: It is certainly desirable that unemployed people be helped to keep in touch with the world of work while they are being assisted to seek and to train for work. My hon. Friend will be aware of employment action and of the range of opportunities that are thereby made available. As I said earlier, we intend to build on success of that kind.

Mr. Galbraith: May I congratulate the Minister of State for rebuking the Prime Minister's ideas on workfare? In the 5 February issue of Today, the hon. Gentleman said:

"I have seen workfare, and it does not work."

Can the Secretary of State confirm that her Minister of State and her Department will continue their opposition to workfare and not simply use it as a cheap form of labour or as another means of fiddling the unemployment statistics?

Mrs. Shephard: For the hon. Gentleman's information, I can say that the Prime Minister, in his Carlton club speech, did not suggest that all-embracing, large-scale schemes should be introduced to require people to work in return for benefit. Nor, indeed, did he use the word "workfare". Given the close attention that the hon. Gentleman pays to these matters, I am surprised that he did not notice that the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), condemned some of the schemes that he had seen in the United States as being costly and ineffective.

Retraining

11. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment she has made of the need for retraining of those in jobs to meet present and future job requirements.

Mr. McLoughlin: Our assessment is that more effective investment in the skills of people in work is needed. The Government's policies are operating to encourage such investment. In particular, training and enterprise councils are promoting the use of the new "Investors in People" standard.

Mr. Rathbone: Does my hon. Friend accept that, with fast-developing technology, there is a continuing requirement for the retraining of people in jobs and the retraining of management and that TECs, such as Sussex TEC, have a special role to play?

Mr. McLoughlin: I agree with my hon. Friend. The TEC movement has an important role and it is interesting to note that each TEC develops policies most suited to its own area.

Mr. Enright: Since the Government have squandered substantial oil revenues and have frittered away immoral earnings from gas, electricity and water, what confidence can ordinary working people have in their investment in retraining?

Mr. McLoughlin: They can have the confidence that they have shown in the last four elections by re-electing us.

Mrs. Browning: Is my hon. Friend aware that one group of people who are particularly anxious to be retrained are those aged over 45? Will he guarantee that he will do all that he can to encourage the TECs and other training organisations not to discriminate against people on grounds of age? Over-45s have much to offer and they are as entitled to a restart as anyone else.

Mr. McLoughlin: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. If I hear of any TECs that are discriminating against older people, I will take up the matter with them.

Low Pay

12. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is her estimate of the numbers working in the public sector earning less than the Council of Europe's low pay threshold analysed between (a) full-time male employees, (b) full-time female employees, (c) part-time male employees and (d) part-time female employees.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There is no recognised Council of Europe low pay threshold.

Mr. Burden: The Government may not recognise it, but poverty pay does exist. Does the Minister recognise that a hospital domestic, for instance, earns £121·14 for a 39-hour week, less than is paid at Tescos and £78 per week less than the average for women's pay? Does he recognise that Government pay policy, which they intend to impose, will give that woman 90p extra? Is not it disgraceful that the Government are prepared to condemn their own employees to poverty pay?

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman is concerned about poverty, he should recognise that the biggest single cause of poverty is unemployment and that his party's commitment to a minimum wage would add 2 million to the unemployed. The hon. Gentleman asked about European standards on minimum wages. Those countries that have embraced a minimum wage are the countries which are struggling with the highest unemployment, like socialist Spain.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that the low paid would prefer a job with low pay to no job? Is not it immoral for hon. Members to seek to legislate for the unemployment of their constituents rather than their continued employment?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Both in the House and in Europe, people have to recognise that passing legislation for better working conditions does not deliver better working conditions unless they have been earned. One thing that we have to do if we are to get unemployment down is to be more competitive. The continual attempt by Opposition Members to add to the cost of employment will add to the numbers on the dole.

Ms Quin: Is not the gap between the highest and the lowest paid wider now than at any time since 1886? Whereas in other European countries the pay gap has remained constant in recent years, it has widened dramatically in Britain. Does not that show clearly that besides the large numbers of people who are unemployed there is also a great problem of people on low pay? Are not all those people getting a poor deal from Tory Britain today?

Mr. Forsyth: Even Mr. Delors has recognised the problem of Europe pricing itself out of world markets. He suggested the other day that we needed a global social chapter to address that problem. I venture to suggest that the hon. Lady should look at the figures. Germany now has 50 per cent. of its labour costs—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Labour Members may jeer, but half of German labour costs arise from non-wage costs. That compares with 10 per cent. in Pacific rim countries and 25 per cent. in Japan. If we cannot compete, jobs will leave Europe and go elsewhere. The hon. Lady should recognise that.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does my hon. Friend agree that many British businesses carefully monitor their total wage costs and that if a minimum wage were imposed on them they might have to get rid of some of their employees? Does he further agree that higher wage costs would lead to higher inflation, at which Labour Members are experts?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. The key to competitiveness and employment lies in keeping wage costs down and ensuring that they reflect performance and productivity. That is the way forward. The best way to determine wages and conditions in the workplace is negotiation between the employer and employees. That is not a matter for government either at national or European level.

Redundancies (West Midlands)

13. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number of redundancies in the west midlands in the last quarter for which figures are available.

Mr. McLoughlin: The latest available figures from the quarterly labour force survey show that 25,000 people were made redundant in the west midlands in the three months before the survey of the summer of 1992.

Mr. Ainsworth: Does the Minister accept that that is proof that redundancies are continuing at a staggering rate? There are now 7,266 people out of work in my constituency, with 62 people chasing every job vacancy in the west midlands. Do the Government have any responsibility for that?

Mr. McLoughlin: The hon. Gentleman said that unemployment in his constituency is 7,266, but he failed to say that that it is 16 per cent., or 1,406, lower than in 1986. Unemployment in the constituency of Coventry, North-West is 12 per cent. lower and in Coventry, South-East it is 23 per cent. lower. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman might have welcomed that.

Mr. Fabricant: Has my hon. Friend visited Stuttgart or Munich recently and seen the number of BMWs and Mercedes that are sitting unsold in car parks? Does not he welcome the 350 new jobs that have been created by Lucas, the hundreds of new jobs that will be created by Jaguar and the 3,000 new jobs that will be created by Toyota?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I do not share his travel experience, but I very much welcome the investment that has been made in Britain, which would not have been made if we had followed the policies proposed by the Opposition.

Mr. Grocott: Does the Minister remember the heady days of the 1960s, when he was at school and when engineering companies in the west midlands were thriving, engineering apprentice schools were full to overflowing and there was optimism abroad and plenty of jobs? Is not it crystal clear that the records of the Labour Governments of the 1960s and 1970s on manufacturing industry show that Labour Governments work and Tory Governments do not?

Mr. McLoughlin: That is rather strange coming from the Member who represents Telford, given the amount of inward investment that Telford has been fortunate enough to secure. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that for his constituents.

Unemployment (East Hertfordshire)

14. Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures she is bringing forward to assist the unemployed in east Hertfordshire.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The new employment and training measures that will begin in April offer the widest range of help to unemployed people that we have ever provided. We expect to offer almost half a million more opportunities in our programmes in 1993-94 than we are providing this year.

Mr. Wells: I thank my right hon. Friend for that constructive and helpful reply, for which my constituents in Hertfordshire and Stortford will be grateful. Are not the depressing remarks that are constantly made by Labour Members about unemployed people being on the scrapheap entirely refuted by her constructive words?

Mrs. Shephard: My hon. Friend is right to point out the extremely positive work that is done by the Employment Service, which last year placed 1·4 million unemployed people back in work.

Mr. Oiner: Does not the Minister realise that not only in east Hertfordshire but all over the country people need proper employment? Is she aware that only last week Rolls-Royce announced further redundancies of very highly skilled personnel? When will the Government recognise that the manufacturing base of this country is disappearing fast under their leadership? When will they go and let people who want to work work properly?

Mrs. Shephard: I have to point out to the hon. Gentleman that, although, of course, I share his concern for anyone who is facing unemployment or redundancy, he and his hon. Friends have absolutely no constructive or uniform views on either the economy or employment. It would be a great help to him and his hon. Friends if the official Opposition spokesman on employment stopped his vendetta against employers, whom he continues to describe as scum, and bankers, whom he now describes as shortsighted, stupid and on the make. That is not a very constructive approach to employment.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Byers: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 16 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Byers: The Prime Minister will know that, according to the latest Government figures, there are now 39 unemployed people chasing every job vacancy. Is the Prime Minister aware that this morning Littlewoods pools stated that the odds against winning a dividend on their coupon are 39 to one? Can the Prime Minister explain to the House how it is that, after 14 years of Conservative Government, an unemployed person has as much chance of getting a job as of winning the pools?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman neglected to mention that in recent years in his constituency unemployment has fallen by 20 per cent. Perhaps that is something that he should have borne in mind.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the taking-stock exercise has gone down extremely well in Scotland? Will he confirm that this Government will never bring forward proposals for unwanted, expensive regional assemblies in England, where over 80 per cent. of taxpayers and the population live, nor will they bring forward proposals for assemblies in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland?

The Prime Minister: I can confirm that, as, indeed, I did at the last general election. We do not believe that such extra assemblies would be helpful either to democracy or to good government in any part of the United Kingdom. I know that there are contrary views in the House. On the Opposition Benches we find unionists, federalists, separatists and devolutionists. That does not add up to a great deal; often not even effective opposition.

Mr. John Smith: Will the Prime Minister publish the report by the Department of Trade and Industry on the state of Britain's manufacturing industry?

The Prime Minister: The report to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers was private advice to Ministers and I do not propose to publish it all. I am surprised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should raise that question the day after the news that manufacturing output rose to its highest level for 18 months and that it was up on the year before. Perhaps for once the right hon. and learned Gentleman will acknowledge good news.

Mr. John Smith: So much for open government. The Prime Minister knows that he is the first to publish information whenever it suits him. Why does he wish to conceal from the British public the devastating assessment of the Department of Trade and Industry in his own Administration—I quote from its report—that our manufacturing product base is weak and deteriorating?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is up to his old tricks yet again. Whatever he can do to talk down British industry, he will do. If he read a little further in the report from which he gleans his information he would recognise that our productivity has improved faster than that of Germany, France, Italy or the United States. I ask again: when will the right hon. and learned Gentleman help to talk up British industry and stop talking it down?

Mr. John Smith: Does not the Prime Minister now see that he should publish the report, because it also says that the main source of new products is imports, that British industry is fundamentally weak, suffering from inadequate investment in new technology, and that there are flaws which it will take decades to remove? Is not it clear to everyone that the reason why he is frightened to publish it is that it reveals that 14 years of Conservative government have done deadly damage to British industry?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will explain why output in the engineering industry is rising, computers are rising and textile output is rising. Perhaps he will explain why the CBI survey shows yet another increase in output expectations—— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

The Prime Minister: They cannot accept anything but bad news as far as this country is concerned, so they will not like the fact that manufacturing investment has risen in each of the past three quarters. Those are the figures which the right hon. and learned Gentleman never mentions. He knows them, but they never pass his lips.

Mr. Brazier: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the measure introduced temporarily last November to ease the Treasury rule on capital receipts for housing authorities was sensible? Will he join me in condemning what is happening in Canterbury, where the Treasury rule is being abused and the housing account is being raided by the Liberal-controlled authority to squander funds on leisure facilities?

The Prime Minister: I was not myself aware of that particular point, but my hon. Friend has made me aware of it in a most forceful way. I shall pass it on to my right hon. Friend.

Q2. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 16 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McAvoy: Hon. Members on both sides of the House know that one sign of a weak Prime Minister is constant clarification of what he really meant to say. Last Tuesday the Prime Minister talked about "when" Scottish water will be privatised and then tried to cover up by saying that he should have added the words "if implemented". Does the Prime Minister accept that such weak behaviour fully justifies the Paul Johnson quote:

"Major is what he is: a man from nowhere, going nowhere, heading for well merited obscurity as fast as his mediocre talents can carry him"?

The Prime Minister: When the hon. Gentleman gets here, perhaps he can make that sort of remark.

Q3. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 16 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Rathbone: Following my right hon. Friend's answer to the Leader of the Opposition, is he aware that people in manufacturing are indebted to him for his confirmation of the importance of those who work making things? Will he spend a moment today commending the engineering skills that make that possible?

The Prime Minister: I shall certainly be happy to do as my hon. Friend says. As he knows, and as I have repeatedly made clear, I believe that manufacturing is vital to the United Kingdom economy and that engineers have a key part to play in that. Figures released yesterday showed an encouraging picture, with output in electrical and mechanical engineering rising strongly, as did manufacturing output overall.

Mr. Eric Clarke: This is the first chance that I have had to ask the Prime Minister a question. When are the Government going to implement the recommendations of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council, which stated that emphysema and bronchitis should be considered as industrial diseases for people who have had mining experience? Is the delay one that saves the Government money since, as we have seen in the past, the claimants die off?

The Prime Minister: The report has been with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, who has been discussing it with colleagues. I hope that an announcement will be able to be made very shortly.

Sir Michael Grylls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is rather a sorry reflection on the standards of the Opposition that the Leader of the Opposition has to rely on the material——

Madam Speaker: Order. Let me remind the hon. Gentleman that the Prime Minister is responsible only for Government policy, not for what the Leader of the Opposition gets up to.

Sir Michael Grylls: Will my right hon. Friend encourage the Leader of the Opposition to visit British industry, where he could see some of the great successes such as in motor cars, television and the chemical industry, where we are now leading the world?

The Prime Minister: I would endeavour to encourage that understanding opposite. I am sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman heard what was said and I look forward to him taking note of it.

Q4. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 16 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Banks: I realise that everyone's mind is on the Budget, but may I ask the Prime Minister to give some thought today to the future plight of great whales, which has a price beyond calculation? Does he recall when some of us came to 10 Downing street to present a petition signed by half a million people protesting about Norway's intention to carry on with commercial whaling? Will he now make a protest to the Norwegian Prime Minister so that she and everyone else in Norway knows that if Norway goes ahead with commercial whaling, there will be no place for it in the Community and that appropriate sanctions will be taken against that country?

The Prime Minister: I will certainly raise the point that the hon. Gentleman mentions, which he has raised with me before and which we have raised with Norway on a number of occasions in the past. But I will not take the hon. Gentleman's advice on the second point. Norway is keen, I think, to join the Community and I hope that in due course she will.

Q5. Mr. Faber: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 16 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Faber: In the light of reports last week that about 30 per cent. of 14-year-olds now achieve a reading age of between nine and 11, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is more important than ever that these children are rigorously tested regularly and that the results are made available to their parents? Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the disgraceful action proposed by the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers which will wreak havoc in the classroom?

The Prime Minister: I very much agree with the thrust of my hon. Friend's remarks. No one can be happy with the level of achievement in English that is thrown up by the report, but if we are to help pupils and raise standards, we need testing and the national curriculum. If we get the tests, we shall see which children are falling behind and we shall then be in a position to take action to help them. I would certainly deplore any action to disrupt those tests and I look for support in that from every part of the House.

Mrs. Fyfe: Would the Prime Minister like to demonstrate his support for open government by instructing the Secretary of State for Scotland to publish details of the secret correspondence he had with the leader of the Scottish National party?

The Prime Minister: I rather thought that it had been published.

Q6. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 16 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Gorman: During his visits behind what used to be the iron curtain, did my right hon. Friend have a chance to go shopping, as I did recently on a visit to Kiev, where I discovered that the contents of the very best department store were about the equivalent of a boot sale on a bad Sunday afternoon? Is not it true that, despite the attempts of the Opposition to talk this country down, this is still the best democracy in the world? But, before we hand over our government to Brussels, should not we consult the British people through a referendum?

The Prime Minister: For one magical moment I thought my hon. Friend was going to carry me entirely with her. I strongly agree with the first part of her question and I think that no one is in any doubt about the acutely difficult situation faced by the Russian Parliament and by the Russian leadership at the moment. We very much hope that the Group of Seven will be able to help the reform movement in Russia and we certainly intend to do so. So far as the referendum is concerned, I can give no comfort to my hon. Friend.

Q7. Mr. Miller: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 16 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Miller: On 31 March last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer told Channel 4 News:

"We will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

Does the Prime Minister appreciate that if the Chancellor breaks that pledge in a few moments' time, no one will ever trust anybody on the Government Benches again?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will not have long to wait on that point. It is an odd question to come from him, when the leader of his party said recently:

"Well, we change our policies as we move towards a different election. We're not necessarily committed to what we did at a particular election."

Mr. Bennett: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I ask you to confirm that it is the normal convention of the House that when a Minister quotes from a document, that document should be placed on the Table of the House? As the Prime Minister quoted from a report on the state of manufacturing industry, can we take it that that report will now be placed on the Table of the House?

Madam Speaker: If a direct quotation was made from a state paper, the Minister in question should table that paper for the entire House.

WAYS AND MEANS

Budget Statement

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Before I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be for the convenience of hon. Members if I remind them that, at the end of the Chancellor's speech, copies of the Budget resolutions will be available to hon. Members in the Vote Office.

3.31 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Norman Lamont): In my Budget last year, I announced a far-reaching reform that was supported, I believe, on all sides of the House. From November this year, public expenditure and taxation will be brought together in one annual Budget statement.

The advantages of the new system are clear. Ensuring that tax and spending decisions are taken at the same time will allow better control over Government borrowing. Indeed, that is the main purpose of the change. With tax, spending and borrowing decisions presented in a single statement, the relationship between them will be much easier to understand. However, for now, our existing, and, to me, rather antiquated, procedures remain in place. I shall therefore concentrate today largely on the tax side of the accounts. My Budget should nonetheless be considered alongside the autumn statement that I delivered just four months ago.

In that statement, I set a firm limit on public sector wage increases. This was essential and we shall stick to it. And I established tight overall spending ceilings for the next three years. But I also gave priority to programmes that would help to promote growth and the long-term performance of the economy. In this way, the autumn statement played a key role in putting Britain on course for recovery.

My Budget today is designed to ensure that this recovery will be sustained. Above all, this Budget has two objectives: first, to support the recovery in the year ahead; and secondly, to set out a clear medium-term strategy for bringing the borrowing requirement back towards balance. The "Financial Statement and Budget Report," with a number of press releases filling out the details of my proposals, will be available from the Vote Office as soon as I have sat down.

WORLD ECONOMIC BACKGROUND

It is impossible to review the short-term prospects for the British economy without first considering what is happening in the world outside. Many people talk as if Britain's economic problems were unique, as if we can somehow insulate ourselves from the economic tides that sweep across the world. The truth, of course, is quite different. As ours is an open economy which exports a third of its output, developments abroad have a profound impact on Britain.

The one ray of light on the world scene has been the recovery in north America, and particularly in the United States. The United States economy grew by over 2 per cent. last year, with growth in the final quarter revised up to an annual rate of 4¾ per cent., but the success of the United States stands in marked contrast to developments elsewhere.

Industrial production has been falling in many of the world's largest economies—over the last year it has fallen 2 per cent. in Italy; by 2½ per cent. in France; by 6½ per cent. in Germany; and by 7 per cent. in Japan. By contrast, in Britain, industrial production has actually risen, and the recent indicators of GDP confirm this gloomy world picture. Even Japan has now been visited by the prospect of recession, with gross domestic product declining by ¾ per cent. in the second half of 1992. France and Italy have also had to cope with falling output. And Germany, still struggling with the costs of reunification, has now suffered three successive quarters of declining GDP.

It was against this background that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I secured agreement at the Edinburgh Council last December to a European growth initiative. This was closely modelled on my own autumn statement, and was designed to deal with the most serious problem facing the European Community—and the seemingly inexorable rise in unemployment across the continent.

Last year, unemployment in the Community rose by 1¼ million, and it is projected to rise further this year, to some 11 per cent. of the work force. France, like Britain, has 3 million unemployed; in Ireland and Spain more than one in six are out of work. Even in west Germany, unemployment is rising once again.

To a large extent, this pattern reflects the impact of recession, but, particularly in the European Community, the recent rise in unemployment comes on top of a relentless upward trend. In the Community as a whole, unemployment rose in every single year from 1973 to 1985; and although it fell back in the boom of the late 1980s, it has stayed at well over twice the level of 20 years ago.

Unemployment in Europe is much higher than in many other parts of the world; and it cannot be reduced simply by stimulating demand. A deep-seated problem needs more fundamental solutions. It requires more flexible markets, not just for labour but also for goods and services, and it requires support given by Governments to be directed less at propping up declining industries and more at helping the unemployed to rejoin the work force.

Above all, if we are to secure a lasting reduction in unemployment over the years ahead, we must continue to resist the imposition of job-destroying measures emanating from Brussels.

The high-cost economies of the European Community cannot insulate themselves from the world outside—from the more flexible economies of the Pacific rim and north America. Nothing would do more damage to job prospects, not just in Britain but across Europe, than the imposition of further tax or regulatory burdens on employers. That is why this Government will never sign the social chapter.

UNITED KINGDOM ECONOMY

While activity has been falling in many parts of the world, GDP in Britain rose slightly in the second half of last year. With interest rates down by four percentage points in just six months, Britain enters the year ahead in a more favourable position than most of our major competitors. That is confirmed by the European Commission, which expects Britain to be the fastest growing of all the major European economies both this year and next.

The substantial interest rate cuts I have made provide a solid foundation for recovery this year, and they come alongside the measures in my autumn statement to revive business confidence. We are already beginning to see their effects.

Lower interest rates have contributed to a pick-up in the growth of narrow money, while retail sales have been on a steady upward trend for almost a year. The abolition of car tax has prompted a surge in activity in the motor trade, right at the heart of British manufacturing. New car registrations were nearly 16 per cent. higher in the latest three months than a year earlier.

By the end of this month, the additional money that I provided in the autumn statement will have taken about 20,000 properties off the housing market. Although house prices remain weak, building society commitments and advances are stronger, and both house builders and estate agents are now reporting increased activity.

The extra support that I announced for British exporters will reinforce the competitiveness of our companies trading overseas, while exports in the last three months of 1992 were already at record levels; and the temporary increase that I announced in capital allowances will provide a continuing boost to business investment over the next six months. According to the CBI, manufacturers are more optimistic now than at any time for almost five years.

The recovery we have seen in confidence rests, above all, on one crucial foundation—the dramatic progress that we have made in getting inflation down. There has been much debate about Britain's experience with the ERM. Today I wish to make just two observations. First, it was absolutely vital to get inflation in this country down. The two years that we spent in the ERM were tough, but the war against inflation was one we had to fight, and one we had to win. Secondly, once sterling left the ERM, and with inflation sharply down, we were right to take the opportunity that that gave us to relax policy and get interest rates down.

Inflation is now at its lowest level for over 25 years. The rapid fall in the headline rate is, of course, partly the result of the reduction in mortgage rates; but even more significant is the fall in the underlying rate. That is down in the last year from 5½ per cent. to 3¼ per cent. Except for a few months in 1986, after the collapse in the oil price, underlying inflation has not been this low since February 1968.

SHORT TERM PROSPECTS

In my Mansion House speech, I announced the establishment of the panel of independent forecasters. My intention in doing so was to demonstrate more clearly that the judgments the Government have to make are not based on one single forecast.

I have now received the panel's first report, and I am most grateful to it for its contribution. The panel recognises that the substantial relaxation of monetary policy has greatly improved the prospects for recovery in 1993. Its forecasts for growth this year vary between ¼ and 2 per cent., with an average of just over 1 per cent.

The Treasury's forecast is very similar. Broadly in line with the average of the panel's forecasts, we expect GDP to grow by 1¼ per cent. this year, with the recovery gathering pace through the year. Growth in the year to the second half of 1993 might reach 1¾ per cent., rising to 3 per cent. in the first half of 1994.

However, as the panel stresses, uncertainties remain. It is possible that growth this year may exceed the 1¼ per cent. forecast that I have made, but there are significant downside risks, too. It is very difficult to be sure when consumers will feel that their finances are sound enough to support a stronger growth of spending, and there are, as I have said, considerable doubts about the prospects for our major export markets.

This will inevitably affect the prospects for the current account. The deficit in 1992 was about £12 billion, and as the economy recovers and the unfavourable short-term effects of the fall in the exchange rate feed through, I expect the deficit to widen this year to £17½ billion. But the measures that I shall be putting in place today should help to strengthen our trade position over the years ahead; and I expect the deficit in the meantime to be readily financeable.

THE MEDIUM TERM

The key to an improved trade performance lies in the competitiveness of our products, and the signs are encouraging. Earnings are now growing more slowly than at any time for 25 years. Labour productivity has been rising rapidly; and while unit wage costs in manufacturing have been rising in Japan and Germany, here they showed no increase at all during 1992. British business now has a great opportunity to expand into overseas markets and to replace imports at home; but costs must be kept under firm control.

The Government's task is to provide a clear and predictable framework for policy—to ensure that business has the freedom and the support it needs to get on with the job. Our strategy for sustained growth rests on three key principles: first, that growth comes from the private sector, not from Whitehall; secondly, that a continuing commitment to low inflation is vital if competitiveness is to be maintained; and thirdly, that the only way to increase the country's long-term growth rate is by improving the supply side performance of the economy.

SUPPLY SIDE POLICY

Supply side improvements are seldom the stuff of headlines, but the policies that this Government have pursued have begun to improve the way that markets work. We have transferred to private ownership some two thirds of the state sector we inherited; and our labour market reforms have given back to management the power to manage, so that last year the number of days lost to strikes was the lowest for a century.

But we still have a long agenda of unfinished business. In my autumn statement, I set out proposals to increase the role of the private sector in modernising Britain's infrastructure. I also announced additional resources to underpin the education reforms that we have set in train.

The wealth of a nation depends largely upon the skills of its people; and nothing could be more important for the long-term performance of the British economy than the steady improvement in education and skills that this Government are determined to bring about.

INFLATION AND MONETARY POLICY

However, if long-term improvements in economic performance are determined largely by the supply side, we have seen all too often in the past 20 years how short-term prospects can be blown off course by inflation. I am absolutely determined that this should not happen again.

The Government's objective is to keep the underlying rate of retail price inflation within the range of 1 to 4 per cent.; and to bring it down to the lower half of that range by the end of this Parliament. I expect underlying inflation to be 3¼ per cent. at the end of this year, close to the top of its target range, but inflation should fall further over the medium term. Monetary policy is set to meet that objective.

The detailed framework for monetary policy was set out in my letter to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee last autumn; and since then, I have introduced two further developments to demonstrate our determination to conduct monetary policy in a way that will deliver our inflation target. We now publish a monthly monetary report which shows the information that guides our decisions. I have also asked the Bank of England to provide regular reports on our progress towards meeting our inflation objective.

Interest rate decisions are based on a continuing assessment of monetary conditions, measured principally by the growth of narrow and broad money, and movements in the exchange rate and asset prices. Alongside the target for inflation, I am setting monitoring ranges for both the narrow and broad measures of the money supply; for the period of this Parliament the ranges are 0 to 4 per cent. for M0 and 3 to 9 per cent. for M4.

In judging the prospects for inflation, I have to weigh the evidence from all the indicators, taken together. If any one is out of line, it is particularly important to assess its significance against the performance of the others.

Following the recent substantial reduction in interest rates, M0 growth may be above its monitoring range in the period ahead, but, on the basis of the indicators taken together, I believe that interest rates at their current level are consistent with the achievement of the Government's inflation objectives. At the lowest level in the European Community, they are also fully consistent with the prospects for recovery this year.

FUNDING

I turn now to funding, a subject of peculiar fascination for many City commentators and of particular interest to a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends. The Government's full fund policy ensures that their borrowing does not add to inflationary pressures. I am clear that this policy remains appropriate, but, from time to time, it has been right to reconsider its detailed application.

I have therefore decided that transactions by banks and building societies in gilts will, from now on, be included in the funding definition. In periods when banks and building societies reduce their holdings of gilts, extra sales to other sectors will be needed, but in current conditions the change I am making will help to ease the pressures on liquidity and avoid complicating money market management. If it also leads to some strengthening in the growth of M4, that would be no bad thing.

In the year ahead, sales of gilts will, as usual, form the bedrock of the funding programme, but national savings will again make an important contribution.

FISCAL POLICY

In controlling inflation, monetary policy must of course be supported by a sustainable fiscal policy. I expect a PSBR in the current financial year of £35 billion—slightly lower than projected at the time of my autumn statement, but, because unemployment tends to increase for a while, even after growth has resumed, and because some taxes, particularly corporation tax, are collected a year in arrears, I expect borrowing next year to rise further. The PSBR for 1993-94 has therefore been set at £50 billion, some 8 per cent. of GDP.

Unless action is taken, large deficits will continue over the medium term. The PSBR could still be around 6 per cent. of GNP in 1996-97, the last year of this Parliament. I do not believe that borrowing on that scale is acceptable, and I shall be announcing measures today to reduce it progressively over the years ahead.

In the early 1980s, we took steps to bring the public finances back under control. We turned a PSBR of over 5 per cent. of GDP into a surplus of 3 per cent., and we nearly halved the ratio of public sector debt to GDP. We did not shrink from making the necessary changes then and I shall not shrink from making them today.

The rise in the PSBR since 1989-90 is largely due to the recession, and, because of the reduction in the national debt in the 1980s, I have been able to allow the so-called "automatic stabilisers"—the increases in public spending and the reduction in tax receipts that directly reflect the weakness of the economy—to operate fully. It was right, I believe, to do this to maintain the level of demand during the recession. However, just as a business cannot go on year after year ignoring a fall in cash flow caused by a downturn in the economy, so too the Government cannot keep on running up debt in the hope that recovery will solve our problems. Even if the higher debt we now face was largely caused by the recession, the extra borrowing still has to be financed. As debt mounts up, so does the debt interest. In this way, what might have started off as a cyclical deficit could soon become a structural deficit unless action is taken to bring borrowing down.

All around the world, we see countries striving to reduce their fiscal deficits or suffering from their failure to do so sooner. President Clinton's programme shows that the need for fiscal discipline is now widely understood. The deficit which the Italians are now having to deal with is a salutary warning to those who think that a problem postponed is a problem solved. Those who argue that there is no need for action should confront the consequences of such a course—the consequences not just for the public finances but also for the level of interest rates.

For all these reasons, I believe that the greatest threat to sustained recovery in Britain would come not from a lack of demand, but from excessive Government borrowing over the medium term. We have to address that problem now.

Action to bring the fiscal deficit down clearly has to start with the amount that the Government spend. The new control arrangements that I put in place last year were an important first stage, and we now have firm ceilings for expenditure over the next three years that will keep the growth of spending below that of the economy as a whole.

But proper control of public expenditure cannot be achieved simply by setting targets. It requires a continuous examination of each and every Department and of all the functions of Government. What was once a desirable role for the public sector may no longer be appropriate today. That is why the fundamental reviews of public spending are so important. Those reviews will inevitably take time, so I have also had to look at the revenue side of the accounts.

BUDGET JUDGMENT

In doing so, I have had to balance two key objectives: first, the essential task of helping recovery; secondly, the need to tackle the deficit so that the recovery will be sustained. I believe that my proposals today strike that right balance. In the year ahead, 1993-94, their effect will be broadly neutral, thus allowing the recovery to take hold, and I will be announcing later some measures to improve that prospect by helping business and the unemployed.

However, for subsequent years, as the economy strengthens, my proposals are designed to build in a wedge of steadily rising revenue. Overall, they will raise revenue by £6½ billion in 1994-95 and by £10½ billion in 1995-96 —the equivalent of 1½ per cent. of GDP.

In setting out the Government's plans for raising revenue, good intentions are not enough. I intend that, as far as possible, these proposals should be legislated for this year, in this year's Finance Bill. Taken together with the tight public spending plans that I announced in the autumn statement, they should ensure that the PSBR returns towards balance over the medium term; but if further action proves necessary, I shall not hesitate to take it.

REVENUE MEASURES 1993-94

Taxation objectives

The proposals I shall be announcing today are part of a continuing programme of tax reform—a programme which has strengthened work incentives and improved the efficiency of the economy. In deciding where to look for additional revenue, I have been guided by a number of principles: first, that, where possible, money should be raised in a way that will not damage the working of the economy; secondly, that in general this means that reducing the value of allowances and broadening the tax base is preferable to increasing marginal tax rates; thirdly, that taxation should support social, health and environmental objectives.

I will deal with my revenue-raising proposals in two parts. I will start with my proposals for the year ahead, 1993-94; I will then describe the measures that I propose for the two years thereafter. For the year immediately ahead, as I have said, my proposals are very broadly neutral. The objective has been to strengthen the recovery by giving help to business, but, in order to pay for that, I have had to raise revenue from other sectors of the economy.

Allowances

The first is income tax. With inflation down to levels not seen for a generation, I propose for the year ahead to freeze the personal allowances, the married couple's and related allowances, the basic rate limit and the income limit for age-related allowances. The threshold for inheritance tax, the capital gains tax exempt amount and the earnings limits for tax relief on pension contributions will also remain unchanged. This will save some £670 million this year.

Excise duties

The second is excise duties. The removal of customs controls at the channel has been welcomed by many thousands of travellers who are now seeing the benefits of the single market at first hand. It has also brought many benefits to British business, including some 10 million fewer forms this year. But there is a natural concern as well about the impact of an increase in cross-border shopping, and the effect that it might have on British businesses, particularly in the south-east.

In considering what changes to make to excise duties, I have had to balance that against the need to raise revenue. I have therefore decided to raise the duties on most alcoholic drinks by only 5 per cent. this year. From 6 pm today, the total tax on a pint of beer will rise by about 1½p, and that on a bottle of wine by about 5½p.

I have also received many representations this year about the taxation of spirits, and, in particular, the taxation of whisky. This is one of Britain's most successful exporting industries. I promised in my Budget speech last year to resist proposals from Brussels to introduce tax rules that would hit whisky sales in Europe; but, having succeeded in that, it is important that our own tax regime does not further disadvantage the industry. I have therefore decided to make no change in the duty on spirits this year. I am sure that that will be welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and especially in Scotland.

I turn next to tobacco. Last July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health published a White Paper containing our commitment to maintain the real value of the taxation on tobacco products, but again I have also had to take into account the impact of the single market. I propose, therefore, to increase the overall burden of duty by some 6½ per cent, four percentage points above the rate of inflation. This will add 10p to a typical pack of 20 cigarettes—and, I regret to say, some 4½p to a pack of five small cigars. But I also propose to make this increase in a different way from usual.

As the House will recall, cigarettes are subject to two different excise duties: a "specific" duty, which is a flat-rate charge per cigarette, and an "ad valorem" duty, on their price. Given that the health objective is to tax the harm that cigarettes do, it is better to tax the cigarettes themselves than to tax their price. I therefore propose to increase the specific duty on cigarettes by 10 per cent., while cutting the ad valorem duty from 21 per cent. to 20 per cent. This will mean a proportionately bigger tax increase for cheap cigarettes, many of which are imported.

I also propose this year to increase the duty on most gaming machines by 20 per cent. Taken together, those changes will raise £290 million in 1993-94 and £365 million in 1994-95.

I turn now to motoring taxes, where I propose to combine raising revenue with tax reforms. When I abolished car tax in my autumn statement, I said that I would recoup the cost from other motoring taxes. I therefore propose to raise all fuel duties by 10 per cent. from 6 pm today, putting 12p on a gallon of unleaded petrol and 15p on a gallon of four-star. From midnight tonight, vehicle excise duty for cars—the tax disc—will also rise, by £15, to £125.

Taken together with the abolition of car tax, those measures will raise a net £400 million in 1993-94. The overall impact will be to shift the tax burden from car buyers to car users; and to help both the environment and the industry. Together with the increases that I have announced on alcohol and tobacco duties, it will add a quarter of a percentage point to the RPI in April, compared with indexation.

Fuel scales

Alongside the increase in fuel duties, I propose to increase by 20 per cent. the scale charges for free fuel supplied to company car drivers for private use. I also propose to abolish the 50 per cent. discount currently available to drivers doing more than 18,000 business miles a year. Employees can, of course, avoid this tax altogether by paying for the full cost of all fuel provided for private journeys themselves. The environmental impact of my proposals on fuel duties will be strengthened by reducing the number of motorists who use fuel at no direct cost to themselves. This measure will raise £65 million in the year ahead and £70 million in 1994-95.

Company cars and vans

I turn next to the tax treatment of company cars. From its introduction in 1976 until 1988, the income tax charge on company cars significantly under-estimated their true value. Since then, charges have been steadily raised to more appropriate levels. I propose this year to complete that process, by bringing the car scales up to a level which fully reflects the true value of the benefit of a company car. That requires an increase in car scales of 8 per cent., bringing additional revenue of £100 million in 1993-94.

However, as I said last year, the structure of the current regime remains unsatisfactory. In most cases, the value put on the benefit, and the tax that is payable, are determined not by the price of the car, but by the size of the engine. That might have mattered less when the scale charges were very low, but it now gives rise to serious distortions.

Following consultation with the industry, I propose from 1994-95 to replace the current car scales with a simple system based on the price of a car. The annual benefit of a company car will be valued for income tax purposes at a fixed percentage of the manufacturer's list price. To ensure that the reform is revenue-neutral, I propose to set that percentage at 35 per cent. Company car users will then pay income tax at their marginal rate on that amount.

However, I do not believe that it would be right to apply the full rigour of the charge to those who use the company car largely for business purposes. I therefore propose that there should be a discount of one third for those company car users who drive more than 2,500 miles a year on business, and a discount of two thirds for those who do more than 18,000 business miles. In future, the tax on company cars will rise or fall automatically with the price of those cars. It follows that there will no longer be any need to set the tax charge each year in the Budget.

My reform will reduce tax distortions in the car market and enable manufacturers and fleet managers to plan production and purchasing in a more rational and stable system. For these reasons, I believe that it will be welcomed. I also propose to replace the existing complex arrangements for taxing employees' private use of company vans with a simple scale charge, covering both the van and any fuel provided, set at the modest level of £500. This will raise £10 million in the year ahead and £35 million in 1994-95.

Anti-avoidance

In addition, I intend to close a number of loopholes which have been exploited by people to avoid tax. First, from midnight last night I propose to exclude from the business expansion scheme all schemes which involve the provision of loans to BES investors. The BES was set up to encourage investment in small business—not to provide highly subsidised loans for top-rate taxpayers. Secondly, I intend to end the practice whereby group companies buy up other companies with capital losses simply in order to set those losses against their own capital gains. Thirdly, I intend to restrict the situations in which changes in company ownership can create scope to avoid advance corporation tax. Finally, I propose to tighten the rules for foreign companies under United Kingdom control.

Full details of these and other measures are provided in a series of Inland Revenue press notices being issued today. The revenue is not insignificant. Taken together, the measures should raise some £70 million in the first year, rising to over £460 million in the following year.

TAURUS

Before leaving my proposals for 1993-94, I wish to make clear the position on stamp duties on securities and property other than land and buildings. Following the decision by the Stock Exchange last week to abandon TAURUS, stamp duty will remain in place at least for 1993-94, raising £1 billion during the coming year. I will review the position further in the light of the conclusions of the securities settlement task force set up by the Bank of England.

The measures that I have proposed so far will raise £2·4 billion in 1993-94, not including stamp duty. Of this, £750 million is required to finance the abolition of car tax. I will be using a large part of the rest to reduce taxes on business.

REVENUE MEASURES 1994–95 AND BEYOND

Before I turn to business taxes, I intend to set out my tax proposals for 1994-95 and the years thereafter. As I have already explained, these tax proposals will build up over the years, creating a wedge of increasing revenue, which, as far as possible, will be legislated for in the coming financial year.

National Insurance Contributions

In my autumn statement, I took some tough decisions on current spending to maintain capital programmes, but, to protect the poorest and most vulnerable members of society, we also decided to uprate social security benefits in full. That decision was warmly welcomed on all sides of the House. However, had no further action been taken, the effect of that decision, combined with the rise in unemployment, would have been to push the national insurance fund into deficit. To prevent this, I introduced a new Treasury grant, and legislation to implement this has been taken through the House.

This makes sense at a time when ensuring economic recovery is our priority, but it is clearly not a fair or reasonable basis for financing the national insurance fund over the medium term. A Treasury grant is paid for by the general body of taxpayers, including millions of pensioners who have already made a full contribution to the fund throughout their working lives. Accordingly, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security and I propose to place the finances of the national insurance fund on a firmer footing.

I do not propose to increase national insurance contributions in the coming year. However, from April 1994 my right hon. Friend and I propose to increase the class 1 main rate of employee national insurance contributions by 1 per cent., to 10 per cent., and the class 4 rate for the self-employed by 1 per cent., to 7·3 per cent. The arrangements for employees earning below the lower earnings limit and the self-employed with profits below the lower profits limit will be unchanged by these measures. The necessary legislation will be brought before the House in the coming year.

Taken together, these increases will raise about £1·8 billion in 1994-95 and £2·2 billion in a full year.

However, that will still leave a deficit in the national insurance fund of £2·8 billion in 1994-95 and a similar sum the following year. National insurance contributions are, of course, paid not just by employees and the self-employed, but also by employers; and when a deficit of this size emerges in the fund, it is natural to look to all contributors to make up the balance. The remaining deficit is roughly equivalent to an increase in the employer national insurance contribution rate of 1·2 per cent. from 10·4 per cent. to 11·6 per cent. However, having reflected carefully, I do not believe that it would be appropriate to increase the burden on employers. I therefore propose to retain a smaller Treasury grant to make up the continuing shortfall in the fund.

North Sea Fiscal Regime

One of the main objectives of this Government's tax reforms has been to eliminate tax rules which distort investment decisions. This was the driving force, for example, behind the far-reaching reform of the corporation tax system in 1984. Today I wish to carry this principle through into another important sector of the economy—the North sea, and in particular petroleum revenue tax, or PRT.

When PRT was introduced in 1975, the North sea oil sector looked very different—oil prices were very high and the typical oilfield was relatively large. The purpose of the new tax was to ensure that the Exchequer got its fair share of the large profits to be made in the North sea, while companies were left with a reasonable return on their investments.

However, as the North sea has developed, the PRT regime has come to look increasingly anachronistic. As profits in many existing fields attract a marginal tax rate of over 83 per cent. there is little incentive for companies to keep costs under control or for additional investment in existing fields. Moreover, as a result of the uniquely generous allowances that are available, the Exchequer is no longer getting a fair return. In 1991-92, the PRT regime actually cost the Exchequer £200 million.

As many in the oil industry recognise, this is neither reasonable nor sustainable. The North sea tax regime has to be placed on a clear long-term footing, so today I intend to set out a major reform which will raise revenue in the medium term and give the oil industry a stable framework to plan ahead.

I propose from 1 July this year to reduce the PRT rate on existing fields from 75 per cent. to 50 per cent., and for new fields I propose with effect from today to abolish PRT entirely.

It follows that, for new fields, I also intend to scrap all the allowances that go with the existing PRT system, including, for example, relief for exploration and appraisal expenditure that can be set against PRT on existing fields: but contracts entered into before today for exploration and appraisal will continue to get relief against PRT on existing fields for the next two years. Allowances that can be claimed within existing fields will remain essentially unchanged.

This reform will greatly simplify the tax regime for new fields, disapplying at a stroke some 300 pages of complex legislation; and it means that the only tax on new oil fields in the North sea will be corporation tax—at 33 per cent., the lowest rate of business tax in the industrialised world. Britain will have a competitive tax regime which strikes a reasonable balance between the interests of the industry and those of the nation as a whole.

The paradox of this reform is that, despite the abolition of PRT for new fields, and the reduced rate for existing fields, after 1993-94 it will actually raise revenue for the Exchequer. I expect the yield in 1994-95 to be some £300 million and in the following year to be some £400 million.

Relocation Expenses

I turn now to another area where reform is long overdue—the tax treatment of job-related relocation expenses.

When a company asks its employees to move house, it may offer help with relocation expenses. Usually, that involves paying for the cost of the removals, but sometimes, if the move is to a more expensive area, the employer will also pay allowances towards the employee's higher living costs.

For the past 40 years, we have allowed employees to receive most of this help tax-free, provided the employee has sold his existing home—a condition which has been the subject of much criticism. That means that someone whose employer gives them as much as £25,000 might pay no tax on it at all. On the other hand, people who decide to move to find work and pay their own costs get no help whatsoever from the tax system.

I see a case for some measure of relief where employers help meet employees' removal expenses, but it is difficult, in my opinion, to find a convincing rationale for a system of tax relief whose effect is to give the biggest subsidy to those moving to the highest-cost areas. With these reliefs expected to cost the Exchequer no less than the staggering sum of £800 million this year, I believe that the time has come for reform.

I am therefore asking the Inland Revenue to withdraw the present extra-statutory concession which helps people moving to a more expensive area, and I propose to restrict relief on removal expenses to payments of up to £8,000 for people whose employers require them to relocate after 6 April this year. Under the new system, the existing home need no longer be sold to qualify for relief.

Although these changes come into effect immediately, they will not start to raise revenue until the year after—about £200 million in both 1994-95 and 1995-96.

Mortgage Interest Relief

I turn now to mortgage interest relief. The rapid expansion of home ownership is one of this Government's most enduring achievements, and I have no plans to change the existing ceiling for mortgage interest relief of £30,000, but in the last few Budgets we have taken steps to improve the focus of mortgage interest relief and to contain its costs—most recently in my 1991 Budget—by restricting the relief to the basic rate.

Even so, mortgage interest relief is expected to cost the Exchequer £4·3 billion next year alone. I propose, therefore, to reduce the rate at which relief is given from 25 per cent. to 20 per cent., but I propose to defer the implementation of this change until April 1994. In all, this change will yield £900 million in 1994-95 and £960 million in the following year.

At the current mortgage rates, no borrower will be more than £10 a month worse off from the reduced rate of relief, and for many with mortgages below £30,000 the increase in payments will be even smaller. Moreover, it is the level of interest rates, not the amount of tax relief, that is the most important determinant of the cost of a mortgage. Because interest rates have fallen so far since October 1990, payments on the average mortgage have been cut by over £150 a month, so the cost of the change I am proposing is equal to just a fraction of the benefit mortgage payers have already received from lower mortgage interest rates.

I know that there are some elderly people with life annuity home income plans which allow them to draw down some of the savings that they have invested in their houses. Such schemes will continue to attract relief at 25 per cent.

I am fully aware that, despite some encouraging signs of increasing activity, the housing market remains fragile. That is why the changes I have described will not come into effect until next year; and it is also why I have one further proposal which will affect people buying houses. Whereas my proposals on mortgage interest relief do not apply until April 1994, this measure comes into effect immediately. I propose to double the stamp duty threshold to £60,000 for documents executed from today and not stamped before 23 March, when the required Budget resolution has been considered by the House.

This means that the cost of buying homes priced at between £30,000 and £60,000 will be reduced by up to £600. From today, the number of transactions in the housing market liable to stamp duty will be halved. This will be of particular benefit to first-time buyers, who tend to buy less expensive homes. With mortgage interest rates at their lowest level for decades, this reduction in stamp duty should provide a further stimulus to the housing market. The change will cost £220 million in 1993-94 and about £270 million in the following year.

Last year, I announced a significant change in the treatment of the married couple's allowance, giving couples greater flexibility in allocating it between them. Today, I have a further important change to propose.

At present the married couple's allowance reduces a taxpayer's liability at his or her marginal rate. A taxpayer on the 20 per cent. lower rate benefits by £344, but a higher rate taxpayer gets £688—twice as much. There is no good reason why an allowance intended to recognise the responsibilities of marriage should give least to those on low incomes and most to those right at the top of the income scale.

From 6 April 1994, therefore, I propose to restrict relief for the married couple's allowance to the lower rate of 20 per cent. It will then be worth the same amount to taxpayers at all levels of income. The allowances which are linked to the married couple's allowance for those aged under 65 will be similarly restricted.

Because of the higher level of MCA to which they are entitled, this change will bear harder on elderly married couples, so, also from 1994-95, I propose to increase by £200 the married couple's allowance for those aged 65 and over. This will ensure that pensioners paying tax at the basic rate are affected by the change in the same way as any other basic rate taxpayer, and some elderly married couples in the lower rate band will actually gain slightly.

As I have said, these changes will not come into effect until 1994-95. They will then raise about £900 million in 1994-95, and £1·2 billion in 1995-96.

Green Measures

In recent years, there has been much debate on the subject of global warming and the role that tax measures can play in combating it. This has led the European Commission to propose a Communitywide carbon tax. There may indeed be a case for further co-ordinated international action on global warming, but I remain unpersuaded of the need for a new European Community tax. Tax policy should continue to be decided here in this House, not in Brussels.

Individual countries should, of course, take their own measures to give people the right signals to encourage the efficient use of energy. Today, I shall propose measures designed to do just that, and to raise revenue at the same time.

Last June, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister signed the United Nations convention on climate change at Rio. This was a milestone in international efforts to halt global warming.

When Britain and other countries have ratified the convention, the Government will be committed to bringing forward measures aimed at returning greenhouse gas emissions from this country to 1990 levels by the year 2000. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment published last December a consultation paper which set out the various options.

The largest contribution to the growth in United Kingdom carbon dioxide emissions in the coming years is expected to come from the transport sector. I therefore propose to make clear today the Government's long-term intention on road fuel duty. We intend to raise road fuel duties on average by at least 3 per cent. a year in real terms in future Budgets, in addition to the increase I have already announced for this year.

In deciding the level of duty to be levied in any particular Budget, we will, of course, take full account of conditions at the time—including, if charges for motorways and urban roads are introduced, the overall level of taxes and charges which road users are paying. However, my announcement today will help manufacturers and consumers to plan ahead. It should provide a strong incentive for motorists to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles, and it will raise at least a further £520 million in 1994-95 and £950 million in 1995-96.

However, in order to meet the commitment that we entered into at Rio, action will be required not just in the transport sector, but across the whole economy, and in deciding how best to meet our carbon emissions target, we will need to ensure that the right incentives are in place throughout the economy—encouraging people to consume less and conserve more. Above all, it is crucial to avoid taking measures that will have a disproportionate impact on the competitiveness of British industry.

Against this background, I have one further measure to propose that will not only encourage greater energy efficiency in every household in the country, but will also raise a considerable amount of revenue for the Exchequer over the years ahead.

Fuel and energy supplies to industry pay VAT in Britain. Those to the home do not. In this respect, we are unique in the European Community. I therefore propose, over the next two years, to end the zero rate of VAT on domestic fuel and power. Again, this change will not come into effect immediately, but in 1994. VAT will be charged at 8 per cent. from 1 April 1994 and at 17½ per cent. from 1 April 1995.

This measure will raise some £950 million in 1994-95, £2·3 billion in 1995-96 and around £3 billion a year thereafter. For the first time, the rate of VAT on domestic fuel and power will be the same as that charged on goods like loft insulation material, which improve energy efficiency. This will bring to an end the current anomaly, which makes nonsense of any attempt to use the tax system to improve the environment.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House should listen to the Chancellor.

Mr. Lamont: My intention is to legislate for this proposal this year.

Social security benefits will, of course, rise automatically to reflect the price effect of this change, but I recognise that this will cause particular problems for those on low incomes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will take this into account when the income-related benefits are uprated next year.

Taken together with the measures which have already been announced, these tax proposals take Britain two thirds of the way to meeting the Rio target, and they will do so in a way that does the least possible damage to the competitiveness of British industry. I am confident that the remaining gap can be filled through sensible energy-saving measures, as and when the convention is ratified by our major industrial competitors.

The measures I have announced so far will raise substantial revenue in 1994-95 and beyond. I turn now to my measures for business.

DEREGULATION

Self-assessment and simplification

As the House is aware, the Government have embarked on a major drive to reduce the burden of regulation on industry. I will therefore start with three significant measures of deregulation, which should be of particular benefit to the self-employed and to small businesses generally. Self-assessment of income tax has operated successfully in many countries, including the United States, but none of my predecessors has found a way of introducing it here. For most people, that has not been a problem—the PAYE system already deals very simply with the tax affairs of some 16 million employees—but for the 8 million taxpayers who have to fill in a tax return each year, the current arrangements are very far from simple.

Following a detailed consultation exercise, I now propose to offer these people, including 4 million self-employed, the option of self-assessment on income tax. Legislation will be brought forward in next year's Finance Bill to implement the proposal from the earliest practicable date, which is 1996-97.

For those who choose to take it up, self-assessment should provide a significant reduction in bureaucracy and paperwork; and it will also bring out more clearly the link between public spending and the burden this places on the individual taxpayer. A more transparent tax system can only lead to more informed choices and debate; and I believe that self-assessment for a third of all taxpayers will contribute to that.

But for self-assessment to work, the system has to be simple enough for taxpayers themselves to be able to fill in their own returns. My second reform will achieve a significant simplification, particularly for the self-employed. One of the least attractive features of our present tax system is that it is simply too complicated for them to work out how much tax they owe: people setting up in business on their own are more or less forced to employ an accountant.

Since 1926, the self-employed, working under the so-called "preceding year" basis of assessment, have generally paid a tax bill based on profits they made up to two years previously. People with several different sources of income may be assessed on a number of different bases, with separate tax bills and payment dates for each. It would be difficult to invent a more complicated system for taxing the self-employed, even if one set out with that very intention.

Under my new proposals, people will have just one tax bill each year, covering all their income, and the self-employed will pay tax on the profits they make in the current year, not the preceding year. This should be a major simplification; and I am sure it will be warmly welcomed.

Taken together, these two measures amount to the most fundamental reform of income tax administration since the introduction of pay-as-you-earn in 1944.

STATUTORY AUDIT

My third announcement is of particular interest to smaller businesses.

At present, all businesses which are incorporated have to have their accounts audited. While it is clearly important that accounts should be reliable and indeed that the Inland Revenue and other users should have the assurance they need that the accounts have been drawn up properly, the current statutory audit requirement imposes a disproportionate cost on many small businesses. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will therefore shortly be issuing a consultative document setting out options for reducing this burden, at least for the very smallest businesses that are incorporated. This would deliver significant savings and would represent a major step in cutting out red tape and bureaucracy.

BUSINESS TAXES

Reducing the Government's borrowing requirement will benefit business by ensuring that the recovery is sustained, but, as I said in my Mansion House speech last October, the Government are determined to keep our policies under continuous review to ensure that British business has the backing it needs to compete in world markets. This is particularly true of our tax policies.

Britain already has the lowest rate of tax on business profits in the industrialised world, and we have a personal tax system which makes it attractive for entrepreneurs and managers to live and work in Britain. We intend to see that continue.

Britain has had an outstanding record over recent years in attracting investment from overseas—indeed, we have attracted no less than a third of all foreign investment into the European Community over the last few years—but we cannot be complacent. With the advent of the single market, the competition in Europe to secure inward investment has become ever more intense. So my Budget sets out to ensure that our business tax regime retains its clear competitive edge.

SURPLUS ACT AND THE TAXATION OF DIVIDENDS

In discussions with business organisations over the last few months, one issue has come up again and again—the problem of surplus advance corporation tax, or ACT. Many believe that this feature of our tax system both penalises successful British-owned international companies and distorts investment decisions.

This issue has, of course, been with us for many years, and it has so far defied solution. Nonetheless, I made a commitment in my Budget last year to return to this subject, and I am pleased to be able to report to the House that I have now found a way forward.

I hope that the House will bear with me, as I am afraid that my proposals are complex, but they do attack the problem of surplus ACT, they are central to the strategy of this Budget, and they raise significant amounts of revenue.

At present, ACT is paid on dividends at 25 per cent. This funds a tax credit which covers the basic rate income tax bill of the shareholder, but, as its name implies, it is also an advance payment of the company's corporation tax bill.

In normal circumstances, the system works very well, but sometimes it does bring problems, particularly for companies which earn a large proportion of their profits overseas. These companies often end up paying an ACT bill on their dividends that is greater than their entire United Kingdom corporation tax liability. The so-called "surplus ACT" that results cannot be claimed back, so in effect it becomes an extra tax on profits.

This can have damaging economic effects. For example, it gives some companies a strong incentive to move important activities, including research and development, abroad, leading to the loss of skills and jobs in this country. It cannot be right to distort the commercial decisions of British companies in this way or to give companies a positive incentive to move elsewhere in Europe; so today I am putting forward some proposals that will go a long way towards alleviating the problem.

First, I shall establish a special tax regime from 1994-95 to help foreign-owned international companies which are considering setting up their headquarters in the United Kingdom. This will make it more attractive for international companies to base their operations in Britain, and it will further promote London's position as Europe's leading financial centre.

Secondly, I am today issuing a consultation document proposing a scheme under which British companies may choose to class any dividend paid out of overseas profits as a "foreign income dividend". Unlike normal United Kingdom dividends, this will not carry any tax credit, and although ACT would initially be payable in the usual way, the company will be entitled to a refund if it gives rise to surplus ACT. Once fully operational, this scheme could reduce the build-up of surplus ACT by some £250 million a year.

Finally, I have one further proposal which will help not just companies with surplus ACT, but all dividend-paying companies; and it will do so in a way that will raise considerable revenue. I propose simply to reduce the rate of ACT in two stages, from 25 to 22½ per cent. in 1993-94 and then to 20 per cent. in 1994-95. This will give companies which pay dividends a cash flow benefit of about £2 billion over the next two years, and it will reduce the build-up of surplus ACT by about £300 million next year.

I also propose to reduce from 25 to 20 per cent. in 1993-94 the tax credit that shareholders get when they receive a dividend.

Those who are familiar with these issues—a select few, I fear—will know that tax credits affect two main groups of shareholders. Those with no tax liability, particularly pension funds, can claim a cash payment from the Inland Revenue for the tax credit, and higher rate taxpayers have to make up the difference between the 40 per cent. top rate of tax and the 25 per cent. tax credit they receive.

The reduction in the tax credit that I am proposing will therefore have two important effects. First, the payments that lower rate payers, non-taxpayers and particularly pension funds, get from the Inland Revenue will be reduced by five percentage points, saving the Exchequer no less than £1 billion a year. Secondly, higher rate payers will have to pay an extra 5 per cent of tax on the dividends they receive in order to discharge their liability to tax at the top rate of 40 per cent. This, in turn, will yield an extra £200 million a year.

Finally, in order to ensure that most ordinary shareholders are not affected by this change, I propose to reduce the rate of tax on dividends from the current basic rate of 25 to the lower rate of 20 per cent. The effect of this, combined with the change to the tax credits, is to leave basic rate taxpayers neither better off nor worse off than they are now.

Thus, these proposals achieve three objectives at the same time. They will give companies a £2 billion cash flow boost over the next two years, they will significantly reduce the problem of surplus ACT for the future, and they will raise £900 million extra revenue for the Exchequer from 1995-96 onwards.

There is, however, one group for whom I believe it would be desirable to ease the immediate effect of these changes. I therefore propose for charities to phase in the effect of the reduction in the tax credit over a four-year period. I also have some further measures for charities, to which I shall turn later.

Export credit

The House will be relieved to hear that my next measure is a little less opaque, but it is equally important for the long-term success of British manufacturing.

In the autumn statement, I announced a substantial increase in export credits to help British businesses win major contracts abroad, but the fact remains that export credit insurance has proved expensive for the taxpayer. For that reason, the Government have negotiated hard over the years to secure a reduction in the subsidies offered by other countries. Some progress has been made, and we shall continue in that effort, but in the meantime British firms, in my opinion, are sometimes at a competitive disadvantage in seeking business overseas. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and I have therefore looked again at the whole range of ECGD services and have decided to make some important changes.

The first relates to premiums. Last year, premiums were cut on average by about 20 per cent., but there is scope to do more. We have therefore decided to make a further reduction of 7½ per cent. in the average level of ECGD premiums. This means that, while premiums for individual export markets will always differ, the average level of premiums paid by British exporters next year will be down to around the average paid by their G7 competitors.

The second is export credit cover. In the autumn statement, I increased the cover available to exporters by £200 million this year, and by a further £500 million for 1993-94. Over the next three years, my right hon. Friend and I propose that additional cover of £1·3 billion should be made available for those exporting into some of the fastest growing and most important markets around the world. Taken together with my autumn statement announcement, this means that the annual cover for these markets will have increased by more than 75 per cent. in just four years.

As a result, British firms will now be able to go into export markets with greater confidence that they can compete on a more equal basis with their overseas competitors. I am sure that they will seize the opportunities that are now available to them.

Insurance

Over the years, one of Britain's most successful exporting industries has been insurance, but for some years now the industry has argued that the tax reliefs available to some of their European counterparts put them at a competitive disadvantage. In fact, that is not the whole story; in other respects, our own tax system is very favourable. Nevertheless, having reviewed the position again, I believe that there may indeed by a case for allowing tax relief on certain types of equalisation reserves covering occasional, exceptional losses.

However, if such reserves were to be allowable for tax, they would also have to be within the regulatory framework for the industry. This would be a major departure for both the tax and regulatory systems. A consultation document will be issued later this spring to consider the options.

Lloyd's

I also propose to introduce a significant reform of the tax regime for Lloyd's. I propose to tax the gains on the disposal of assets which form the premiums funds of Lloyd's names in the same way as those of corporate insurers, and I intend to replace the current reserve arrangements with a better targeted reserve, which should enhance Lloyd's ability to deal with the particularly volatile type of risk which makes up most of its business.

My proposals will greatly simplify the taxation of Lloyd's. Lloyd's has certainly had a difficult time recently, but it remains vital if London is to retain its pre-eminent position in the world insurance market. Taken together, the two reforms I am proposing will cost the Exchequer nothing.

SMALL BUSINESS

The measures I have announced so far will be of help particularly to large businesses, but small firms play a crucial role in our economy. Small businesses do not follow the economy; they lead it. That has been demonstrated time and time again. In this Budget, I shall set out some further proposals which will help small businesses to lead the recovery once again.

Loan guarantee scheme

Following heavy losses in recent years, the banks are bound to be more cautious in their lending in future. Moreover, the fall in property prices has reduced the security for many of their loans. As the recovery progresses, small firms may therefore find that their prospects for expansion are increasingly threatened by a shortage of bank finance. My first proposal is directed precisely at that problem.

The Government's loan guarantee scheme helps entrepreneurs who have viable projects but who do not have the track record or loan security to attract sufficient finance on their own. It enables them to borrow with a Government guarantee, usually for 70 per cent. of the value of the loan, in return for paying a premium of 2½ per cent. on the guaranteed part of the loan.

In Germany and the United States, a large proportion of lending to small businesses is done at fixed rates of interest. By contrast, in Britain, most borrowing is linked to the level of base rates. I have long believed that many small businesses would benefit from making more use of fixed-rate finance, which would give them more stability and would enable them to plan ahead.

I propose therefore to make a substantial reduction in the loan guarantee scheme premium for guarantees on fixed-rate lending. This will fall to ½ per cent. and will, I hope, encourage more fixed-rate lending. I also intend to reduce the premium on other variable rate loans to 1½ per cent. The premiums will henceforth apply to the whole loan, not just the guaranteed portion. This change should take effect in the next month or so.

I also propose that the limit on the size of loan allowed to such businesses should be raised from £100,000 to £250,000, and the proportion of the loan guaranteed increased from 70 per cent. to 85 per cent. I am sure that those proposals will be warmly welcomed by small businesses. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and I will be taking this forward urgently with the banks.

CGT REFORM

My second measure relates specifically to entrepreneurs who have built up successful businesses and now wish to sell them in order to start up a new one.

The current capital gains tax regime provides generous annual exemptions to those who make regular capital gains from trading in shares, but it is much less generous to the entrepreneur. Typically, he sells shares in his own company only once, so has only one year's annual exemption to set against gains built up by hard work over a lifetime. Thus, for every £100 taken out of the old company at the margin, he has only £60 to invest in a new one. It is hardly surprising that entrepreneurs complain that they are locked in by the CGT regime, and prevented from investing their talents elsewhere.

For this reason, I propose in future to defer the payment of CGT for any entrepreneur whose gains from the sale of his own company are reinvested in another qualifying unquoted trading company, or companies. I know that this will be widely welcomed by the venture capital industry.

I also propose to relax the conditions for CGT retirement relief by reducing the qualifying shareholding from 25 per cent. to 5 per cent.; and to extend this relief to cover full-time employees as well as directors. These changes will cost £50 million in a full year.

VAT THRESHOLD

I turn now to the VAT regime, which for many small businesses takes up a great deal of time and can be a particular source of worry. The best way to help is to keep them out of the VAT system altogether. I am therefore raising the VAT threshold to the maximum extent possible. The new threshold will be £37,600.

CASH ACCOUNTING AND BAD DEBT RELIEF

Over the past couple of years, I have also announced measures to allow traders to reclaim VAT on debts which remain unpaid after 12 months, and to encourage firms to take advantage of the cash accounting scheme under which traders only have to pay VAT to Customs when they themselves have been paid by their customers. I now intend to take this further in a way that will help many small businesses.

I propose to increase the ceiling on turnover below which firms may join the cash accounting scheme by £50,000 to £350,000. This will allow an extra 15,000 businesses to benefit, on top of the 400,000 that qualify already.

I also intend to help businesses which are too big to take advantage of the scheme. At present, VAT can be reclaimed on any invoice which remains unpaid after 12 months. I propose to halve that qualifying period to six months.

These measures will give considerable help to companies, improving traders' cash flow by some £150 million in the year ahead.

VAT PENALTIES

In addition, I have a further series of reforms to propose to the current system of VAT penalties.

First, I intend to focus the rules better so that only larger errors and the most persistent offenders will incur the "misdeclaration penalty". This will reduce the number of penalties imposed by over 40 per cent. Secondly, I propose to place a three-year limit on the number of years' interest that can be charged when tax has been underpaid. Thirdly, I have decided to reform the VAT default surcharge so that traders will be notified sooner of default and surcharged at a lower rate, and only on larger defaults. This will make the surcharge more effective, but remove some 125,000 small traders from the default surcharge altogether. I know that this will be welcomed by small businesses.

KEITH REPORT

I have one final reform of the VAT penalty system. Following Lord Keith's 1983 review, the Government concluded that it would be wrong to give Customs discretion over the level of VAT penalties. After considerable debate, this conclusion was eventually accepted by the House—I remember the strong debates very well—but the controversy has continued ever since, and, over time, more and more people have come to believe that it is wrong to have a penalty regime which is almost entirely automatic.

I have considered this matter all over again, and I have concluded that the time has come to make a change. I propose, therefore, that Customs should be given some discretion to mitigate the penalties for misdeclarations, to enable them to take account of the individual circumstances of the trader. If necessary, of course, the trader will still be able to appeal to a VAT tribunal, which will also have greater scope for discretion.

These reforms will put the VAT compliance system on to a secure long-term basis. They will be of most benefit to small businesses, for whom the burden of compliance is heaviest; and I know that they will be widely welcomed on both sides of the House.

BLOODSTOCK

I have already announced my intention to extend value added tax to domestic fuel and power from 1 April next year. I have one further announcement to make on VAT.

As the House knows, it has long been this Government's intention to switch the burden of taxation from direct taxes on income to indirect taxes on consumer spending. It is perhaps less well known that Britain has one of the lowest effective rates of VAT in the European Community.

Against this background, and in a Budget designed to place the public finances on a sound footing, I have inevitably had to look very carefully at the whole structure of our current VAT regime, and particularly at whether all of our existing zero rates should be maintained. Some of these zero-rated goods—for example, food and water—are clearly amongst the most basic necessities of life. Others —for example, sewerage and newspapers—perhaps fall into a different category.

Having reflected carefully, I have decided nonetheless not to extend the VAT base beyond fuel and power. I do, however, have one further announcement on VAT, which will I hope offer some consolation to those hon. Members who would rather be at Cheltenham today, watching the Champion Hurdle.

For some time, the bloodstock industry has been concerned about competition from other EC countries which levy a lower rate of VAT on horses. The single market has exacerbated this problem and created a major incentive to move bloodstock business abroad, threatening 30,000 jobs.

There have been intensive discussions between the Jockey Club and Customs, and I am pleased to announce that a way forward has been found. As a result of proposed changes in the Jockey club's rules, owners who wish to do so will now be able to organise their racing activities in a more commercial way. This in turn will enable them to meet the normal business test for VAT registration and to claim credit for VAT on purchases, subject to the usual rules.

I know that there have been representations on this from both sides of the House, and I know that registration on this basis meets the industry's concerns over this problem. No Government have done more for racing than this one—and quite rightly so, for it is an important industry, and a vital part of our national life. This measure will be welcomed by the industry and by its many supporters in this House.

UBR

I have one final announcement, which will be of direct help to many businesses.

My last Budget helped many thousands of firms by altering the business rates transitional arrangements to accelerate the gains of those who gained most from the change in the system, while freezing real rates bills which otherwise would have risen substantially.

The freeze applied for one year only, so many businesses now face a substantial increase in their rates bills in the year ahead—up to 20 per cent. over and above inflation on large properties and up to 15 per cent. on small properties.

It would, I believe, be wrong to impose such increases in present circumstances. I therefore propose for a further year to freeze in real terms the rates bills of those losing from the new system.

As a result of this and last year's measures, no business will face a real increase in its rates bill in the year ahead, and many will benefit from reductions. In cash terms, that means that no bill will rise by more than 3·6 per cent.—the increase in the RPI in the year to last September.

Subject to Parliament's approval, the Government will again pay extra sums into the business rates pool to ensure that the income of local authorities is not reduced. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will shortly introduce a Bill to implement these proposals. Full details will be published today in a press notice.

The new measure will reduce the total business rates bill in England and Wales next year by 2·6 per cent. Bills in Scotland and Northern Ireland will likewise be reduced by 2·6 per cent. in aggregate. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland will be announcing the details.

These measures will again bring significant and early benefit to many thousands of businesses throughout the United Kingdom. About 800,000 business properties will benefit. The revenue cost is estimated to be some £370 million in 1993-94, and some £260 million in 1994-95.

Taken together, the measures I have announced will reduce the burden on business by about £1 billion in the year ahead. I hope that the House will agree that this is the best possible use for the sums I have been able to raise this year.

NATIONAL LOTTERY AND CHARITIES

The House is aware, also, of the Government's plans to introduce a national lottery from next year. This will provide a substantial increase in resources for a number of good causes: charities, sport, the arts, the national heritage and the millennium fund. I have no doubt that the lottery will be both popular and successful.

We have always made it clear that the national lottery will be taxed. In deciding the tax rate, I have taken into account the level of tax on other forms of gambling and the extent to which spending is likely to be diverted from other taxed activities. Much, of course, will depend on how the lottery develops and I shall keep the position under review, but for the first year of its operation I propose that national lottery tickets should be taxed at a rate of 12 per cent. Existing society and local authority lotteries will be exempt. Winnings will incur no tax whatsoever. I believe that these proposals will make sure that the national lottery gets off to a good start.

Since 1979, the Government have done an enormous amount to help charities. Indeed, their special position in society is recognised by the substantial tax reliefs, approaching £1 billion, that they already receive, and they will also benefit from the new lottery. I now have two further changes to propose.

First, I intend to raise the annual limit for income tax relief under the payroll giving scheme from £600 to £900 with effect from 6 April. Secondly, I propose that the minimum gift attracting tax relief for single donations under the gift aid scheme should be reduced from £400 to £250 from today, thus increasing substantially the incentive, through the tax system, to charitable giving.

These measures build on the principle that tax reliefs for charity should focus on what individuals give, rather than what charities themselves spend. Taken together, they will boost tax relief on donations to charities by some £30 million in a full year.

EMPLOYMENT MEASURES

In the autumn statement, the Government announced a number of measures to help the unemployed, and in my Budget I have set out my further proposals to help business and sustain recovery. That it the best way to promote employment.

However, we know from experience that unemployment may continue to rise for a while even after growth has resumed. That is a matter of great concern to the whole country, and it is a concern which I fully share. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and I have therefore decided to take further special measures to help an extra 100,000 unemployed people.

First, we have decided to provide more help for those who wish to set up their own businesses under the business start-up scheme. This offers advice and financial assistance, and has been one of the most successful employment schemes. We propose to offer an additional 10,000 places in 1993-94. That will give a direct boost to small business creation and self-employment in years ahead.

Secondly, the Secretary of State for Employment proposes to introduce a new initiative to allow the long-term unemployed to learn the practical skills they need to find work. In the past the benefit rules have been an obstacle to allowing them to study. We intend to introduce an education allowance that will enable 30,000 long-term unemployed people to study on full-time vocational courses.

Thirdly, it is widely agreed that, in every community, there are plenty of jobs needing to be done, and plenty of people who want to do them. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has recently indicated the importance of offering more unemployed people the opportunity to undertake some form of useful work or other activity. We are therefore launching a new community action programme to allow 60,000 of the long-term unemployed to do part-time work in their local communities, organised by voluntary groups. Those involved will be paid an allowance based on their previous benefit rates plus a small premium. The scheme will start as soon as possible.

Those who have been unemployed for a long time tend to lose touch with the job market, and the problem is that they find it increasingly difficult to find an employer who wants to take them on. We propose to test in pilot schemes the feasibility and effectiveness of a new approach under which, rather than pay benefit to the long-term unemployed to do nothing, payments will instead be made, for a limited period, to an employer who recruits them. Employers taking on people who have been out of work for at least two years will receive a one-year subsidy based on the benefits which would otherwise have been paid. That subsidy will taper off as the period of employment progresses. Pilot schemes using different approaches will be launched this summer in four parts of the country. If they can be made to work, I believe that they could be useful, and would lead to permanent jobs for the long-term unemployed as the economy recovers.

Finally, the establishment of training and enterprise councils throughout the country has successfully brought local business people into the design and running of training and enterprise programmes for the unemployed. I now propose to offer the TECs a new £25 million fund. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment will invite TECs to submit competing applications to develop the most imaginative schemes to help the long-term unemployed and stimulate job creation. The degree of local business involvement will be an important criterion against which each application will be judged.

These measures will cost £230 million, and will give special help to those who need it most, including disabled people. The disabled will be given priority in the vocational education initiative and in community action, helping us to build on our achievements in helping the disabled back to work. In the first nine months of 1992-93 the Employment Service found jobs for 31,000 unemployed disabled people, 25 per cent. more than in the same period of 1991-92. I am sure the House will welcome this.

PRIVATE FINANCE

Mr. Deputy Speaker, in my autumn statement I announced significant changes to the rules for the private financing of major infrastructure projects. This initiative has met with an enthusiastic response, and today I have a number of specific developments to announce.

First, hon. Members will recall that legislation has already passed through both Houses permitting the construction of a new fast rail link that will cut the journey time between Heathrow and Paddington. I can now announce that BAA plc and British Rail have agreed to proceed with this project, the Heathrow Express. This is a major new joint venture, involving private sector investment of nearly £300 million. As well as providing a substantial boost to the construction industry, this project will significantly enhance the transport infrastructure of the nation's capital.

Secondly, there is crossrail, a public sector project first proposed in 1989 to reduce congestion in central London. The Government remain committed to securing for London the benefits that crossrail will bring, but we now believe it would be preferable to take this project forward as a joint venture with the private sector. The present proposals for crossrail will therefore be re-examined. Our aims will be to maximise the participation and financial involvement of the private sector and to secure the best value for money for the taxpayer.

One of the most ambitious civil engineering projects ever conceived has been made possible by private finance. I refer, of course, to the channel tunnel. This will provide a fast link between Britain and Paris, cutting journey times dramatically, but those times could be cut still further by reducing the time taken for journeys within Britain itself. For that to happen, a new rail link will be required—from London down to the channel tunnel itself. This will be a massive undertaking—one of the largest infrastructure projects in this country since the war—but, after careful consideration, the Government have decided to make a firm commitment to the project. So I can announce today that the channel tunnel rail link will go ahead.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be inviting the private sector to come forward with bids so that the project can be taken forward as a joint venture as soon as possible. We will discuss timing with the private sector. We hope to be able to introduce a Bill as soon as the legislative timetable permits, and to see the new line fully completed around the end of the decade. The Government will make their own financial contribution, recognising the benefits that will accrue to domestic travellers from the new link. Full responsibility for the project, its management and completion will be transferred to the private sector.

Subject to the results of detailed work by British Rail over the next few months, the London terminus of the new link will be located at St. Pancras. This will provide a new lease of life for this magnificent Victorian building, which will become the gateway to London for international passengers. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will make a statement on the details of the route shortly.

Over the years ahead, my private finance initiatives will play an ever increasing role in the modernisation of Britain's infrastructure. The projects I have announced today represent a considerable step forward. They will not only improve the country's transport network; they will also create jobs. I am sure they will be warmly welcomed by the country and by the House.

INCOME TAX

I turn finally to income tax. My priority in this Budget has been to set out a clear strategy for reducing public sector borrowing over the medium term. I am therefore unable this year to reduce the basic rate of income tax. I also propose to leave the higher rate of tax unchanged at 40 per cent.

However, in my Budget last year, I opened up an alternative route for moving over time towards our ultimate objective—a 20p basic rate of income tax for everyone. The new lower rate band I announced last year at a stroke took 4 million taxpayers on low incomes down to the 20 per cent. rate, cutting their marginal rate of tax by a fifth.

In this Budget, I have taken my reform a step further. The Government's 20p pledge not only involves a reduction in marginal tax rates for 19 million basic rate taxpayers, but, also, when the basic rate is eventually brought down to 20p, tax reliefs for basic rate taxpayers will, of course, be worth 20p in the pound, too. In this Budget, I have brought forward that change by restricting three specific tax reliefs to 20 per cent., not just for basic rate taxpayers, but for all taxpayers.

First, I have reduced the tax credit on dividends to 20 per cent., to cut the rate of advance corporation tax which companies pay on dividends. Secondly, I will be reducing the rate of relief on mortgage interest payments to 20 per cent., to cut the subsidy on borrowing and to pay for a reduction in the tax on housing transactions. Thirdly, I will be restricting the tax relief for married couples to 20 per cent., to make it worth the same for all taxpayers.

All these measures are sensible reforms in their own right. When revenue has to be raised, it is far better to do this by broadening the tax base than by increasing tax rates; but, in addition, the restrictions I have introduced will also allow me to make further progress in getting income tax rates down.

I therefore propose to increase the width of the new 20p band in 1993-94 by £500 to £2,500. That will help all taxpayers currently paying tax at 25 per cent., and it means that, in the coming year, nearly 5 million taxpayers will face a marginal rate of income tax of only 20 per cent. Already, for about a fifth of all taxpayers, I will have delivered on our promise of a 20p rate in the first Budget of the Parliament, and I will have done so by a sensible and fair reform of the tax system.

But I can also go further. The measures I have announced today will also allow me to make a further extension of the 20p rate in 1994-95. From 1 April next year, I propose that the 20p band should cover the first £3,000 of taxable income, £500 more than in the year ahead; and we shall continue to widen the 20p band in the years to come—year by year, we will make our progress towards our objective: a 20p basic rate of tax for everyone.

CONCLUSION

In the first Budget of this Parliament, I have set out the Government's economic strategy. I have cut the tax burden on business; and given help for small businesses, exports and the unemployed. I have demonstrated clearly how we will bring Government borrowing down in the years ahead. That is the only way to sustain growth and build a strong and sound economy in the 1990s.

This is a Budget for sustained recovery and a Budget for jobs—not just for this year and next year, but right through this decade. I commend it to the House.

PROVISIONAL COLLECTION OF TAXES

Motion made, and Question,

That, pursuant to section 5 of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968, provisional statutory effect shall be given to the following motions:—

(a) Beer (rate: existing regime) (motion No. 2);
(b) Wine and made-wine (motion No. 5);
(c) Cider (motion No. 8);
(d) Tobacco products (rates) (motion No. 9);
(e) Hydrocarbon oil (rates) (motion No. 11);
(f) Vehicles excise duty (rates: general) (motion No. 16);
(g) Vehicles excise duty (exceptional loads: 1) (motion No. 17);
(h) Vehicles excise duty (old bicycles) (motion No. 19);
(i) Vehicles excise duty (trade licences) (motion No. 20).—[Mr. Lamont.]

put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 50 (Ways and Means Motions), and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I now call on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to move the motion entitled "Amendment of the law". It is on that motion that the Budget debate will take place today and on succeeding days. The remaining motions will not be put until the end of the Budget debate next week, and then they will be decided without debate.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply, acquisition or importation;
(b) for refunding any amount of tax;
(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies, acquisitions and importations; or
(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lamont.]

5.24 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I am happy to offer the Chancellor the customary congratulations on the style and manner in which he delivered his Budget. As he noted, this will be the last spring Budget and he is the last Chancellor who will deliver the Budget in its traditional form.

I welcome the change to a unified Budget and public expenditure statement, a change which, after all, the Opposition proposed. May I suggest a further reform for the new arrangements later in the autumn? The Chancellor should consider abolishing the increasingly absurd purdah rule. I suggest that he makes an early announcement to that effect, perhaps the earlier the better, so that he and not someone else can take credit for an overdue reform.

Those who have listened to this debate will have been shocked beyond belief at the cynicism of the Conservative party which went into the last general election as the party committed to low taxation. [HON. MEMBERS: "We have done that."] Conservative Members say that they have done that. Some innocents on the Conservative Benches describe the Budget as a Budget of low taxation. Let me remind the House of what the Government said during the last election campaign—[Interruption.] I know that some Conservative Members do not want to hear this, but I think that the public do.

Let me start with VAT. On 28 January 1992, the Prime Minister said:

"There will be no VAT increase. Unlike the Labour party, we have published our spending plans and there is no need . . . to raise VAT to meet them."

It is difficult to be more categoric than that. During the election campaign, the Conservative campaign guide stated—[Interruption.] I know that that is a matter for humour, but we are entitled to treat it seriously. The guide stated:

"Following a series of unfounded and irresponsible scares by the Labour party, the Prime Minister has confirmed that the Government has no intention of raising VAT further."

To get precisely to the point, during the election campaign, at a press conference, Mr. Tony Bevins of The Independent asked the Prime Minister on 27 March 1993:

"Can you give the same pledge that Mrs. Thatcher gave in 1987 that you will not extend the scope of VAT to children's shoes and clothing, gas, electricity and food?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"I've made the pledge in the past, I've made it clear. We have no need and no plans to extend the scope of VAT."

I do not know how the right hon. Gentleman can sit there as Prime Minister of a Government who are capable of deceit on such a scale. The Conservative party went into the election and was pressed day after day about increases in VAT and still came back the answer, "Lies and scaremongering from the Labour party. The Conservative party wouldn't do anything like that." Those people make pledges as though they matter not a whit.

It is not just a question of VAT—and I will consider the effect of the VAT increase. The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that commitments were made on national insurance as well. On 28 January 1992, the Prime Minister stated:

"I have no plans to raise the top rate of tax or the level of national insurance contributions."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808.]

However, the Government have proposed today a 1p increase in national insurance contributions. No doubt they will go to the country and say, "We haven't increased income tax. We have marginally increased the 20p band." People are not so foolish. They understand clearly that 1p on national insurance is, if anything, worse than 1p on income tax. Apart from anything else, it bites further down the scale. On tax on income and tax on spending, the Conservative party has cynically and ruthlessly betrayed the pledges which it gave to the people of this country. It will not be forgiven for that.

The Conservative party used to say that VAT was all right because, after all, people could choose whether they bought the goods on which VAT was levied. Will it tell us now that people can choose whether to have gas or electricity in their houses? The Government must know perfectly well that throughout the land a 17·5 per cent. increase in fuel bills will push many families who are just on the edge, wondering whether they will manage, to despair.

It is no good the Government saying that they will adjust income support levels. Millions of people in Britain are poor but do not qualify for income support and will be hit savagely by the 17·5 per cent. increase in the basic cost of living. The Chancellor says, "It is all right: I have extended the 20p band." But what does the extension of his band amount to? This year it amounts to about 25p a week and at best in future years it will amount to £1. How will that help people to meet the extra bills that they will have to pay as a result of all the other tax increases and reductions in allowances? Indeed, taken together, the tax increases announced in this Budget must be one of the highest hikes ever.

We have also seen the freezing of allowances. That means that more people will be brought into both the standard and higher rates of tax. All this from the party which said that it was the party of low taxation and paraded that all over the country during the general election campaign. There are hundreds of examples of that day after day.

The Government have betrayed their pledges and caused unnecessary increases in the cost of living. They should have been busy in this Budget looking for loopholes in taxation. The Chancellor may have discovered a few here and there, but there are massive loopholes in taxation by which people do not pay the proper amount of tax. Here we have the Government putting an even heavier burden on the ordinary people of Britain. The Government must bear in mind that the public's conclusion about the Budget will be simple and clear: the Conservative party is a party without honour and without feeling.

The other question that people will ask about the Budget is whether it will bring down unemployment. [HON. MEMBERS: "It will."] There can surely be no doubt that unemployment is Britain's No. 1 problem. We shall see in the November Budget whether this Budget has brought down unemployment. If Conservative Members want that to be a test, we shall make it a test for the Government. The Government cannot simply wish away unemployment. The Chancellor announced inadequate measures on that front. The Government do not seem to understand how depressing and debilitating it is for our people to suffer unemployment of more than 3 million. It is economic madness as well as a social tragedy.

Ministers should bear it in mind that there is hardly a street in Britain in towns or villages, in the country or elsewhere, which the tentacles of corroding unemployment have not reached. It is also depressing to consider that, each time we plunge into another Tory slump, it gets longer than the one before. The last one lasted five quarters. We have already gone 10 quarters in the slump that we are suffering now—the longest since the 1930s.

What measures does the Budget contain to deal with the problem of unemployment? The Chancellor said that the Secretary of State for Employment would announce a few measures which would potentially affect 100,000 people. But 300,000 people have lost their job since the election alone. So even at his most optimistic, the best that he can touch is one third of the people who have become unemployed since the Conservative party was elected on a pledge to reduce unemployment. The measures are wholly inadequate to deal with the scale of Britain's jobs crisis.

There is some merit in the Chancellor's proposals. For example, he has removed the restriction on people on benefit taking up educational courses. Why do we have to wait so long for a simple and obvious change such as that to be introduced? Why does misery have to become desperately acute before the Government will take even minor measures to deal with it?

As we know, the Government's spending on training —one real way in which we could tackle unemployment —has fallen between 1991 and now by 14 per cent. in real terms. That is a reduction of £300 million. So the amount of training falls by 14 per cent. at the same time as unemployment increases by 87 per cent. That gives a clear idea of the Government's approach to the problem.

The Chancellor's proposals in the Budget hardly fill the hole that has been created by the Government's previous actions. Therefore, the Government cannot claim any credit for action on unemployment. That is hardly surprising because the Chancellor gives such a low priority to the unemployed. Who has been more callous and complacent than him? Both he and the Prime Minister want us to forget that it was the Chancellor who told us in the House that unemployment was a "price well worth paying." He said it; he meant it. He has never apologised for it. If nothing else, he might have done that today.

An apology is also due from the Chancellor for the failure of his last Budget—a failure which makes us, and indeed the whole country, cautious about believing anything that he says to us today. After all, his record undermines his credibility. Let me remind the House what he predicted a year ago. He said that the economy would be growing by 3 per cent. and manufacturing output would be growing by 4 per cent. by this time. Let me remind the House of the sad reality—the outturn.

The economy shrank during the whole of 1992 and, even on the latest figures and giving the Government the benefit of the doubt, an increase of barely 1 per cent. per annum is likely. Manufacturing output, instead of growing at 4 per cent. as predicted last year, is not growing at all according to figures published yesterday. A year ago in the Budget the Chancellor predicted that the PSBR would be moving virtuously back towards balance. We know how absurd that was. We know how the Chancellor's management of the economy has thrown Britain deeper into debt, with a projected PSBR of £50 billion.

If the public had known what would be the outcome of the right hon. Gentleman's Budget last year in terms of constantly rising unemployment, deepening recession, rising bankruptcies and home repossessions, let alone the betrayal of election pledges, how many of them would have given the Tory party the benefit of the doubt on the night of 9 April last year? Precious few. We now know that their trust has been spectacularly betrayed.

The other vital question to which the country wants to know the answer is when action will be taken, in a Budget or otherwise, to halt the long, sad economic decline of Britain. Where are the measures of investment and training that will revive the British economy and, in particular, its vital manufacturing sector? The Government will not publish the report from the Department of Trade and Industry that tells us about our problems of weak investment and our skills problems and shows with chilling reality what is happening to British manufacturing industry.

The most important and worrying factor is that investment in manufacturing industry is 6 per cent. lower than it was in 1979 when the Conservative party took office. It appears that civil servants in the Department of Trade and Industry are guilty of the dreadful crime of talking Britain down. Any criticism of this incompetent and dishonest Government is regarded as talking the country down. People are more worried about who is pulling the country down—the Government. They are unable to face up to the scale of the challenge that Britain faces. We shall run into serious balance of payments deficits. We had another foretaste of that in the Chancellor's predictions today.

From the industrial revolution until 1983 we had a surplus in manufacturing trade. Under this incompetent Government we went into deficit for the first time in 1983 and we have remained there ever since. If we examine Conservative economic policy, we find that it will be extremely difficult for us ever to return to a surplus. We shall be able to set a course of sustainable economic recovery only when we begin to invest in industry, in the skills of our people and in the public infrastructure so crucial to our economic development.

On the infrastructure front, we got one reannounced real project and another one postponed. People are doubtful about the channel tunnel business. It appeared to me that the right hon. Gentleman was postponing it yet again. We may find that we have no proper connections on this side of the English channel, while the other side has excellent connections. As for the railways, the most intelligent step that the Government could take would be to remove the threat of privatisation; that would be sensible, and would do a great deal of good to the morale of a beleaguered industry.

Let me briefly remind the House of the Conservative party's promises. It promised economic recovery following its election. Hon. Members may remember the slogan: "Vote Conservative on Thursday, and recovery will continue on Friday". That was 300,000 unemployed people ago. According to the Conservatives, the public expenditure programme set out for the future would be rigorously maintained. There would be no cuts in public expenditure; that was another scaremongering Labour story. What is happening now? The Chief Secretary to the Treasury is undertaking what may be the biggest review in this country's history to cut public expenditure.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): Very good.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman may say "Very good", but his party did not say that at the time of the general election. I am sure that, when voters asked the hon. Gentleman, "What about spending on schools, hospitals and training?", he replied, "Do not worry; all the programmes that the Conservative party has put in place are costed, and they will be fully maintained if you elect a Conservative Government." Did the hon. Gentleman tell those voters, "The Chief Secretary will slip in a few months later and undo all those promises"? That is yet another example of a blatantly broken promise. Worst of all, the Government promised that there would be no increase in taxes, direct or indirect.

This is a shameful Budget, presented by a cynical party, and I hope that the Conservatives live to regret it.

5.41 pm

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): I note the content of the Budget, and will refer to it in due course. First, however, let me congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the sheer stamina with which he made his powerful case. His was a valedictory speech—a valedictory Budget speech, that is, in the light of the reforms that will be implemented in the autumn, when the Chancellor must deliver a speech covering not only budgetary arrangements but public expenditure.

It occurs to me that the House must seriously consider the form that our proceedings will take. The Chancellor's audience is not confined to the House of Commons; he has an audience outside. He will face the difficult task of making a speech of reasonable duration without reverting to Gladstone's five hours of 1853—I have done a little homework to acquaint myself with the potential limits of such speeches. Determining the appropriate form of our debates once the Budget and public expenditure speeches have been combined will present the House with a serious problem.

I wish to make a few general observations about the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). First, let me say how much I enjoyed it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke from the heart about revenue and public spending issues; he did not touch excessively on the subject of borrowing, but it was there, just beneath the surface. He was speaking of the very matters that brought the House into being, and on which it has asserted its authority for generations. He spoke as though he thought that that arrangement was permanent, but he knows very well that he must fight to ensure that the House remains master of these great areas of economic policy. He must partner his convincing rhetoric with the logic of his hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould): I offer him that dream-ticket prospect.

Of course we welcome the approaching debate between the two sides of the House, which will concern the social and economic priorities that we consider appropriate in regard to revenue and public spending and wise in regard to borrowing. That is what this place is all about. At least the words of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East supported that proposition; I hope that his judgment does the same.

Before commenting more directly on the Budget, let me declare my interest. I am a non-executive director of Glynwed International plc and J. Bibby and Sons plc—both manufacturing companies—and I am therefore interested in the Budget's contribution to our manufacturing base. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made some valuable proposals for industry, and his advance corporation tax measures—he confessed that they were somewhat technical, which, in my view, showed a moderation of judgment—will be widely welcomed. Equally welcome will be the priority that my right hon. Friend has given, in a difficult time politically, to the industrial sector; that is matched by the proposals in respect of unemployment.

I shall confine my remarks to the central issue of the deficit. In a Times article on 3 March, just a few days before his death, Lord Ridley said:

> "What has happened for years now is that fiscal policy has been too lax and monetary policy too tight."

I am very happy to preface my comments with that quotation. I believe that, given his views and the manner in which he conducted his campaigns, Lord Ridley will long be remembered in the House as an example of the grit that provides the pearl in the parliamentary oyster. I have a deep personal affection for his memory, and I welcome this opportunity to place on record my esteem for such a personality.

I fear that the deficit is uncomfortably large. That is an anxiety that I share with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor—and, indeed, with almost every other Member of Parliament; certainly with every Conservative Member. Given that the deficit is perceived to be running at about £50 billion, what measures should be taken? I may be a little more anxious than some of my colleagues, because I do not accept the proposition that it will wind down easily with the recovery in the economy. There is now a discontinuity between output and employment; I think that output can recover, while unemployment will continue to lag behind that recovery. In that event, all the recessional costs of the deficit are likely to remain higher than those resulting from past practice.

My right hon. Friend says that he will try to deal with the deficit by means of substantial measures to increase revenue. I am happy to stand here, shamelessly, as a taxing Tory. I cannot believe that, in the present circumstances, the deficit can be seriously reduced other than by an increase in revenue, which means identifying taxes that can be raised to that end. I am not outraged in the least by the increases in national insurance, or by the increases in VAT in respect of fuel and power. We have a narrow tax base in comparison with our major partners and competitors, and the proposed reforms are welcome. I will leave it at that.

I am not quite so happy about the timing. I understand the deep anxiety that is felt: the recovery from recession is tentative, and must not be subject to undue heavy-footedness on the part of the Government. However, I feel slightly uneasy about leaving the increases in taxation until so far in the future. Therefore, I would welcome it if the matter could be reconsidered in the November Budget.

In politics, there is a most powerful instinct—the Augustinian tendency—to say,

"Lord, make me perfect—but not yet awhile."

I feel that the Budget contains all the right instincts, but the timing is a little cautious and too far into the future. I hope that my modicum of unease will not be validated. I should be delighted to discover that my right hon. Friend has made good judgments on both the measures and their timing. Above all, as my right hon. Friend needs luck, that is exactly what I shall wish him.

5.50 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I recall being asked yesterday what I thought that the Chancellor might achieve in the Budget. I said that, if he were sensible, he would recognise that, after the disasters that he had inflicted on us, he could do very little good, but should be careful not to do harm.

Clearly, the Chancellor was not listening to me or anyone else. The Budget will be greeted with disappointment and despair in many quarters of the country. It gives a sharp rap over the knuckles to those who suggested that we were at the bottom of the recession and could expect things to get better. It is clear that the Government expect things to become worse, and we are all going to be dragged down with them next year and the year after.

As to the general background, I find it extraordinary that the Chancellor of the Exchequer can stand at the Dispatch Box and calmly state that the public sector borrowing requirement will be £50 billion next year. He did so having totally lambasted those people who suggested that, if he had taken a little more advice earlier and invested earlier, he might have avoided the situation in which he now finds himself. The Chancellor fails to understand the meaning of investment and the Government's role in ensuring that investment takes place. He is now borrowing to pay for failure, rather than investing to secure success.

The Chancellor's comments on the events of black Wednesday and our leaving the exchange rate mechanism were extraordinary. If one were to believe the right hon. Gentleman, that would have been the first national debacle to be masterminded in advance. He gave himself credit for the achievement, and failed to recognise that he has not left British industry and the British economy in a position to deal with the single market. For a Government who claim to believe in the single market, it is the height of embarrassment to enter that market on 1 January, having just left the mechanism that was designed to make it work with some stability and confidence.

As the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Leader of the Opposition, powerfully and eloquently made clear, the reality is that the Government have been found to be political cheats who reached a position of power by sheer dishonesty and defrauding the electorate. The Budget is a tax-raising Budget designed to tax, tax and tax again—it will tax this year, tax next year and tax even more the year after.

What a cheek for the Government to pretend that theirs is the tax-cutting party. They have consistently increased taxes year after year, but so far the public have believed them. One can only hope that today's Budget will finally make the public realise that the Tories can never be trusted to tell the truth, even about history, never mind about promises for the future.

The Budget contains taxes—not just income tax. As the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East said, the extension of the 20 per cent. band amounts to a difference of 50p a week. For most people on middle incomes, that money will be clawed back by the Budget's failure to index the general allowance. Therefore, most people will be £1·50 a month worse off as a result of those two measures.

The Budget increases excise duties by double the rate of inflation. The increases in tobacco prices are mischievous and malicious. I believe that increases in tobacco tax are desirable for the health of the nation, but why target people on lowest incomes, who buy the cheapest cigarettes? That seemed to be a vindictive little measure. The increase in car tax will be particularly condemned in rural regions, where there are no other means of getting about and the Government have not introduced measures to try to improve the existing means.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) asked me what we could welcome in the Budget, as we should try to be even-handed as we are Liberal Democrats. I find precious little to welcome. I welcome one aspect: the Chancellor has listened to the arguments and recognised the importance of the Scotch whisky industry. As three distilleries in my constituency have recently had to reduce their labour, I hope that that proposal will at least prevent further job losses in that important industry.

There are some welcome measures for the small business sector, such as those relating to the loan guarantee scheme and to value added tax on cash accounting, although the increase could have been much more. I have no doubt that the voters of Newbury will be expected to welcome the changes in the bloodstock regime, but I doubt that they will be very much impressed by them when they look at the consequences for their electricity bills.

By freezing the increase in business rates, the Government have acknowledged the burden that the rates create. However, they have also acknowledged their total failure to create a viable system of business rates that does not require an annual fix.

The Budget will be desperately disappointing for the unemployed. The Chancellor referred to worries about the rise in unemployment and the difficulties that the unemployed face, but he showed little willingness to grasp the nettle. With respect to the community action programme, I suppose that it is refreshing to bring back something which worked, but which was abolished by the Government. However, that measure will help only a relatively small number of people.

The requirement for special measures for the long-term unemployed are welcome in principle. However, by limiting the measures to people who have been unemployed for two years, the Government have drawn them far too tightly. I only hope that the pilot schemes will prove successful and the measure will be extended to people who have not been unemployed for that long.

When we look at the list of bad news we see a 1 per cent. increase in national insurance—a tax increase by any other name. We see the restriction on mortgage tax relief, which constitutes a real cost increase for domestic home owners. We see the freezing of tax thresholds and the appalling prospect of the introduction of full VAT on fuel in two years. That is the one measure for which the Chancellor will be universally condemned. It is breathtaking that the Chancellor can introduce such a measure in such a way without acknowledging the poverty and hardship that it will cause millions of people who are on low incomes but do not quality for benefit. Few people in the country will not find the 17·5 per cent. increase in fuel bills in two years anything other than a substantial burden.

The Budget is, effectively, a Budget of despair and a Budget of desperation which contains little for the unemployed and nothing for those struggling to cope with the recession. In it, the Chancellor merely exhorts those looking for hope and encouragement to hang on now. By God they will have to pay later.

5.57 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): As my right hon. Friend said in his marathon Budget speech, of course recovery is coming. We know that from seeing what is happening in the United States, where the growth figures and indicators are rapidly improving. I see no reason why the progress should be aborted unless, having been started by George Bush—who received precious little thanks for it—President Clinton becomes too enthusiastic in his protectionist tendencies. If President Clinton does so, recovery will be damaged and improvements here will be correspondingly damaged. However, I do not believe that will necessarily happen. As long as we keep a maximum pressure on the Americans and everyone else to avoid protectionist measures, the recovery will come. My right hon. Friend was right to set the measures that he has announced in the context of that coming recovery, to ensure that it goes ahead and is not aborted and undermined by over-hasty measures or allowing the economy to overheat too soon.

Budget occasions—of which this will, mercifully, be the last—generate expectations that are far too high. Everyone looks to my right hon. Friend, or the Chancellor of the day, to achieve miracles when they cannot be achieved at any time, certainly not today. One forgets the European context in which my right hon. Friend is operating. Anyone who thinks that we have problems should look at the rest of Europe. Italy is going down into a black hole; France is about to experience a political earthquake, rather belatedly having the vestiges of socialism—all but President Mitterrand himself—swept away and finding itself in a completely new phase; the Swedish economy is drowning altogether; and the German economy is shrinking.

In those circumstances, it is indeed miraculous that my right hon. Friend has been able to produce a Budget of balance and prudence and to develop so many interesting, if not necessarily very dramatic, proposals to carry us forward into the recovery process—a process that the United Kingdom will be the first European Community country to enjoy. We shall certainly have a higher rate of growth than Germany and many other continental European countries.

Like the very best Budgets, this one will mature. It will not result in immediate flag-waving and cheering, but neither does it justify rather splendid ranting such as we heard from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, who seems to have a basically erroneous concept of what my right hon. Friend is doing. My right hon. Friend says that he has gone this year for a Budget that is broadly neutral. That is a sensible but difficult stance. My right hon. Friend is building in, for coming years, a wedge of changes in the fiscal and monetary balance which will make sense against the background of rising economic activity. I recognise the skill of that approach, which I think is right.

I greatly enjoyed the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen). Indeed, I always enjoy his speeches. I am a little less worried than he is about the timing of the Chancellor's proposals. Incidentally, I should like to associate myself most closely with my right hon. Friend's remarks about the late Lord Ridley—a marvellously non-conformist character who sometimes drove his friends, and certainly his opponents, to distraction, but who contributed mightily to the thinking part of our affairs. He will be sadly missed. My right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North has said that Lord Ridley was the grit that generated the pearls in the parliamentary oyster. Indeed, my right hon. Friend himself is not a bad piece of grit. In any case, we shall certainly miss Nicholas Ridley very much indeed.

It is too soon to go into the minutiae of this very complex and interesting Budget, so I shall refer to three major issues. The first is the purdah that is associated with Budgets. I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) that it is a very good thing that we may now be moving —I hope that we shall indeed move—away from this ridiculous convention, which guarantees that tax reforms are ill considered, ill prepared and dumped on an unsuspecting world in ways that have to be heavily revised, at great cost, afterwards.

I shall be very glad indeed if my right hon. Friend's bold reform—bringing the revenue and expenditure sides of the Budget together, starting this November—results in opening up the discussion of tax reforms, which we could have done with years ago. It is absolutely ridiculous that, at present, the Treasury policy-makers have to go into purdah, whereas many of their advisers, including the seven wise men, have no purdah at all. Indeed, they fiil every column with contradictory views, and these are added to by a variety of people—assorted ex-Chancellors and other commentators of every kind.

In the case of this Budget, when there has been a vast surplus of advice, all we have lacked is additional comment from the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Chief Rabbi. We have had a swirl of outside advice, but the Treasury has been held in purdah, unable to participate in policy-making.

The House of Commons ought to be able to take a little more initiative, perhaps by organising hearings before the Select Committee on Treasury and Civil Service in advance of the Budget. There is nothing to prevent us from doing so. We might have difficulty in getting Treasury Ministers to answer, but we could certainly set the debate going far more vigorously than happens at present. In this regard, the House has a role to play, in addition to my right hon. Friend's initiative of changing the whole timing of the Budget cycle—a move that my right hon. Friend will be remembered for being bold enough to make. Others will have to sit back and say that the officials never told them they could do that—as was said in the 1930s, when the Conservatives decided to go off the gold standard.

The second point on which I want to comment relates to capital and infrastructure. This is one area in which constant weakness has raised costs and accelerated the rate at which, in each cycle, the economy becomes overheated, increasing the volatility and management difficulty of the British economy. I want to see a very much greater impact from investment in the infrastructure of this nation, to cut costs and make us more competitive and to help to accelerate employment, as undoubtedly will happen.

I welcomed in the autumn statement, and I welcome now, the final sweeping away of the old Ryrie rules, which prevented adequate harnessing of private capital to the public sector. It is very exciting that new projects are coming forward and that we shall be able to do what the great cities of Asia have long since been doing: mobilise massive flows of private capital to bring infrastructure, particularly transport, into the 21st century—in our case, even into the 20th century. In expressing that welcome, I gladly declare my own interest as a non-executive director of Trafalgar House, which has a major interest and has had some success in developing privately financed public-sector projects.

Easing the advance corporation tax rules and improving the Export Credits Guarantee Department cover will also help very much in that direction. But that is not enough, so I must ask my right hon. Friend and his advisers in the Treasury to consider going further and starting to develop in this country what has been developed in many other countries—a separate capital budget for that part of the total budget which relates to public sector asset creation. The figures appear in the expenditure papers and, no doubt, in the Budget papers that are now being circulated, which I have not yet had time to examine.

We are told that, of the total Budget spend, about £30 billion is designated for public-sector asset creation. Our friends in Japan say that a Government deficit should be financed by operating on the basis of market psychology and bringing home the fact that much of the deficit arises precisely from capital spending. The Japanese therefore have infrastructure bonds and normal deficit bonds, which they put before the market.

That would not get round the problem of the market's attitude that this is all Government expenditure and should all be treated with the same scepticism when it comes to financing. However, we could make a major start in changing the psychology of the funding problem if it were possible to designate much more carefully and clearly the part of total Budget expenditure and the part of the total deficit to be funded that represented capital expenditure and public sector asset creation.

I ask my right hon. Friends in the Treasury to consider that idea much more carefully in the future. I believe that it would help us to get out of the bind that we have been in. Throughout the 1980s, we enjoyed great success in achieving rapid growth in the economy, but we did not see adequate growth in support and infrastructure—the true supply side of the economy—that many of us, from the early 1980s, urged was necessary. We said that, if that course were not pursued, there would be serious bottlenecks, considerable cost increases and a slow-down in the general performance of the economy.

That is a very important area, and I was very glad to hear what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had to say about it. However, more thinking, better presentation and a little more radicalism in respect of funding the capital side of the Budget are required.

I am glad that we are now thinking radically about proposals to give people the opportunity and the dignity of working part-time or doing voluntary work, or of going into full-time education or training without forfeiting the state payments—perhaps "benefit" is the wrong word.

I understand the joy for the Opposition of taking the figure of 3 million, or wherever we have got to, and using it as a rolling pin with which to hit the Government on the head. There are experienced Members on the Opposition Benches who have made proposals over the years for changing the nature of unemployment. They know that 3 million is a good figure with which to bash the Government but that it is not a real representation of the problem.

We have to unravel the larger figure, and understand that within it there is a vast variety of different conditions which require sensitive and varied remedies in order to remove the whole concept of the scrap heap of unemployment. We must create in every individual who wants work, and in some who may have given up hope of getting work, the feeling that they have a function and a dignity in society.

It is right to start with small schemes, and my right hon. Friend announced a few small schemes; indeed, some are not so small. They are interesting, and I hope that they will grow and develop, and that it will be possible, even in the adversarial politics which we operate in the House, to begin to do away for all time with the idea of the "scrap heap" of unemployment and the self-inflicted misery and undermining of confidence that that language creates. It should be made clear that everyone has a function, and the dignity which goes with that function.

On the monetary side, what my right hon. Friend is trying to do—again this is not the stuff of headlines—is achieve some rebalancing between the monetary and fiscal stances in the economy. We have had the welcome descent in interest rates which has been amazingly rapid, and monetary conditions are reasonably easy. If the Bundesbank cut interest rates again, it might be possible for us to go a point or two lower, although it would be unwise for my right hon. Friend to change the relative short-term interest rate posture of the British economy vis-a-vis the German economy.

Whenever we talk about monetary policy in the House, and whenever I hear my right hon. Friend talk about his plans for short-term interest rates, I feel that he is taking too much on his shoulders. The responsibility for short-term interest rate policy should be spread more widely and should be given more publicly to a central monetary authority, a reformed Bank of England, rather than left solely to the action and discretion of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and other Ministers.

People will say that monetary policy should not become unaccountable in the hands of bankers, but one does not need to go all that way. A sensible compromise would ensure that day-to-day responsibility for setting short-term interest rates and handling short-term monetary policy could be in the hands of a central monetary authority, while there was appropriate consultation with the political masters and those accountable to the House. That is possible—it happens in other countries. The Bundesbank is not totally separate from the political influences in Bonn. It pays attention to them, but it controls monetary policy short term, and that gives monetary policy and the setting of short-term interest rates additional credibility, which our system lacks.

I should like to see a more independent Bank of England, without a total separation between the monetary authority and the Treasury. That would avoid the over-politicisation of interest rates and would enable that whole side of the budgetary balance to be managed in a more sophisticated way. It would give additional credibility to the currency and to the monetary judgments about short-term interest rates in relation to the currency. It would strengthen monetary policy generally. I hope to hear more constructive thoughts on that from my right hon. Friend in future; I believe that they will come.

Generally, this is obviously a Budget of consolidation for this year, but it also makes an important point and breaks with a restrictive stance of the past. The Treasury was a "one year only" organisation—it could think only one year ahead. All parties in the House have urged that Treasury policy should begin to evolve one, two or three years ahead, both on the revenue and on the expenditure sides. One day, it might be possible to get Treasury officials to agree to something that cost more in year one because it would produce savings in years two and three. I can think of many projects which fell at that hurdle when I was a Minister; if a project cost more in year one, it was dismissed out of hand.

With courage, which is his characteristic, and boldness, my right hon. Friend has started to raise our eyes to the length of the true budgetary cycle, which stretches over two or three years. It has taken courage, particularly at present, to do that and to drag the House into the modern world when not everything can be compressed within a one-year timetable.

So we have consolidation now, and radical change lying further ahead. Given that recovery is coming, and given that it has to be sensitively handled, not by the elephantine assaults of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East but by the subtlety and patience of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, I believe that we are on the right path, and that we should stay on that path and give him full support.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): It is customary to contratulate the Chancellor on the delivery of his Budget. That I readily do. I note that his two senior colleagues, the right hon. Members for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) and for Guildford (Mr. Howell), have rallied to his support, but it has been one of the least inspiring Budgets that I have had the privilege of listening to in my years in the House. One could recognise the reluctance to pour weedkiller on those lingering green shoots; nevertheless, much damage has been done by the Budget and an opportunity has been missed.

We have heard the Chancellor's first Budget in 1993. There may be a second bite at the cherry in the late autumn, but there is wide speculation that the right hon. Gentleman will not be in office then. Indeed, as I see things, the future of the Government is in question. No party can remain in office unless it can command a majority in the House, particularly on the main plank of its programme—Maastricht.

In speaking in Budget debates in recent years I have repeatedly emphasised the terrible problem of heavy unemployment. I have indicated what a waste it is and the damage that it is doing to the very fabric of society. The Government never appeared to accept that concept. Even now, they seem to be paying only lip service to it.

Officially unemployment has topped the 3 million mark, but the real jobless figure is more than 4 million. Therefore, the complacency of the right hon. Member for Guildford amazed me. To illustrate the severity of the position, let me point out that there are 27 people chasing every vacancy. For people under 25 years of age, unemployment in January was nearly 900,000, and that figure is rising. What chance have those young people got? Their lives are stunted from the word go. As to the long-term unemployed, those out of work for one year or more total more than 1 million. What a tragedy for so many people; they are thoroughly demoralised.

The Government moan about their borrowing requirement, but do Ministers ever stop to consider that it costs £9,000 a year to keep an unemployed person, which, in turn, means that unemployment is costing the taxpayer £27 billion a year?

Unemployment has social effects. It creates poverty, breaks up families, creates homelessness and ill health and leads to suicide. We are all vividly conscious of the ever-escalating crime rate, which is a constant worry to all decent citizens. Much of that crime is directly due to unemployment. The devil has certainly found work for idle hands and we now have a large alienated underclass.

Another major factor in that increase in crime is the breakdown in family life. Government policies should aim to strengthen the family unit, which is the basis of an orderly society. Putting people back to work would certainly help, but now we have the lethal combination of mass unemployment and a soaring crime rate. No wonder the morale of the nation has never been at such a low ebb.

In that context, the Chancellor delivered his Budget today. All he did was to hand out a few breadcrumbs. I appreciate that he does not have a magic wand. We did not expect him to cure all our major evils overnight and he has a huge deficit to contend with. Nevertheless, he has great powers and he had a great opportunity. The question is whether he rose to the occasion. The answer must be no.

Imposing VAT on fuel, gas and electricity is simply criminal. It will have a highly detrimental effect on the poorest section of community—old people. The announcement was a complete negation of the Government's election and many other promises.

One of the Chancellor's measures seems to be to cane the motorist. We are essentially a road-based economy and one does not need to be a Cambridge economist to realise that increasing the cost of transport increases the cost of almost everything. Not many months ago, the Chancellor assisted the motor industry by getting rid of car tax. The industry has responded magnificently. The principal redeeming feature of the economy in recent months has been the resurgence of the motor industry. February's figures show that sales are up 16 per cent. on the equivalent month last year. The industry needs encouragement, particularly to develop its export trade, which can be so advantageous to our present adverse balance of payments.

We do not have car assembly plants in Wales. Nevertheless, the Welsh economy is now heavily reliant on the components sector, and to penalise the industry only aggravates and increases unemployment in Wales and elsewhere. I say to the Government, back the car industry because it can do so much to stimulate the economy and build a sound trading base, as these two industrial giants, Germany and Japan, realised long ago.

The building industry could do much to rejuvenate the economy and put people back to work. In the past month, there has been, admittedly, a marginal improvement in this sector but, overall, the building and construction industry is in dire straits. Building employers reckon that a further 100,000 jobs are at risk. Last autumn, the Chancellor released the receipts from the new sales of council houses, but only for a limited period. Much more is required. I am sorry that he did not introduce such a measure this afternoon. We urgently need a phased release of all capital receipts from the sale of council houses and land. Such a measure to help increase housebuilding, besides putting people back to work, would help to meet the pent-up need for social housing. Providing bed-and-breakfast accommodation for homeless families is far more costly, and only political dogma prevents the necessary action from being taken.

Likewise, so many empty council housing association properties need renovation. Many school buildings are urgently in need of repair. We need to regenerate local areas affected by the decline in manufacturing and in the coal and defence industries. Such measures would be a boost for the building and construction industry. We did not, I am afraid, hear any such proposals from the Chancellor this afternoon.

Another important aspect is training. Skill, after all, is the key to national competitiveness, and as a nation we are being left behind. Training opportunities for all who need them should be given a high priority. The British people are resourceful and, with the necessary skill training, a start could be made in rebuilding our manufacturing industry, which has been neglected for so long. A report that was leaked in recent days revealed that our manufacturing industry is in a parlous condition.

My hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has set out clearly how such measures as I have briefly mentioned could be paid for—by imposing a public dividend on the excess profits of the privatised utilities, by closing tax loopholes, which are costing the Exchequer millions, and by maintaining tax on share transactions. To achieve recovery, we need emergency investment in the industrial and manufacturing sectors of our economy. That could increase exports, reduce imports and help to provide for a lasting recovery. Even the CBI's pre-Budget message recognised that recovery should be given the highest possible priority. The Chancellor has not met the nation's needs in that sense. He should go without further delay before he does so much more damage.

Mr. David Knox (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I join my right hon. Friends the Members for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) and for Guildford (Mr. Howell) in congratulating my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on his third Budget speech. His first two Budget speeches were well constructed and to the point and today he maintained the high standards that he established on those two previous occasions. His speech was rather longer today and I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North in paying tribute to the stamina that he showed.

The House is indebted to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the style with which he presented his Budget. It was a difficult Budget, but he produced a skilful Budget in extraordinarily difficult and tight circumstances. I congratulate him warmly on doing so and look forward to his fourth Budget towards the end of the year.

I enjoyed the speech of the Leader of the Opposition very much. I think that it could be best described, in the word that Mr. Matthew Parris frequently uses, as a rant.

For many years the debate on the first day of the Budget was marked by speeches from Sir John Stokes and Sir Alan Glyn. Both of those gentlemen retired at the last general election and I am afraid that this occasion will never be quite the same for me now that they are gone. Nevertheless, the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) is—as indeed I am—a veteran of these occasions. Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I believe that in a former incarnation you were as well. No doubt the hon. Gentleman and I will continue the tradition and be joined by others, including my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), who has recently been joining us.

I welcome most of the proposals in the Budget. The measures which my right hon. Friend has introduced concerning industry, insurance and the environment will undoubtedly bring considerable benefits to this country. They are, however, very complicated and it would be wise to refrain from comment at this stage until one has had time to study them in rather more detail.

I welcome the further move towards the 20 per cent. basic income tax rate. Clearly, it was not possible to go very far in this respect today, but I am glad that my right hon. Friend was able to take another step in this direction. Whatever anyone may think, there is no doubt at all, as recent election results have shown, that a reduction in the basic rate of taxation is something that the people of this country want—and it is, after all, our task to respond to the wishes of our masters.

Despite the size of the public sector borrowing requirement, I am glad that my right hon. Friend introduced a neutral Budget today. It would have been very dangerous had he not done so, because it might have cut off expansion. I shall have more to say about this in a minute or two. It was rather ingenious the way in which my right hon. Friend managed to maintain a neutral Budget but nevertheless took steps which will ensure that the PSBR will be reduced in future years, by which time, we hope, economic growth will have restarted and the economy will be moving forward again. My right hon. Friend deserves considerable congratulations on the ingenuity which he showed in this respect.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend found it possible to introduce further measures to help the unemployed. As growth takes off, as my right hon. Friend very rightly pointed out, unemployment will continue to rise, and it is only right that measures should be taken, albeit of a short-term nature, to try to ease the lot of those people who will be out of work over the next few months, and perhaps over the next year or two as well.

I was very glad that my right hon. Friend did not introduce value added tax on books and newspapers. Like most hon. Members, I have had considerable correspondence on this matter during the past few weeks. I am glad that at least in this respect I shall be moderately popular with my constituents for the next week or two.

I was rather less happy about the increase in the tax on petrol. I have a widespread rural constituency and my constituents rely on their motor cars. They will not be terribly happy, therefore, about having to pay an additional amount in petrol tax. On the other hand, I am pleased that my right hon. Friend has maintained the discrimination in favour of unleaded petrol as I feel that this makes a real contribution to improving the environment in which we live.

I was rather interested in my right hon. Friend's proposal concerning the self-assessment of income tax. This is an idea that was floated by the late Iain Macleod in the late 1960s. At that time there was a young man working in the Conservative research department. He later went on to become the Member for Kingston upon Thames and today is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I wonder whether he got that particular idea from his days working with Iain Macleod over a quarter of a century ago.

This Budget will not be judged in the medium or the long term by the specific measures that it contains, because they will be forgotten very soon. The Budget will be judged on the contribution that it makes to getting the economy out of a recession that has lasted for far too long and to reducing a level of unemployment that is far too high.

I thought that the measures that my right hon. Friend introduced in his 1991 Budget and again in his Budget last year were more than enough to generate growth and get us out of recession. Indeed, in the spring and summer of last year there was quite a lot of evidence, admittedly mainly anecdotal, that this was happening. Then everything came shuddering to a halt. The trouble was, and still is, a lack of confidence and I suspect that that owes a great deal to the uncertainty about the ratification of the Maastricht treaty.

Although I have no doubt that the European Communities (Amendment) Bill will eventually reach the statute book later this year, the delaying tactics of the Europhobes and others whose motives are purely party political are having a very damaging effect on the British economy. Their behaviour is creating grave doubts in the minds of our European partners and in other countries about our intentions and is undermining economic confidence and holding back our economic recovery. The early ratification of the Maastricht treaty would do more than anything else to restore economic confidence and enable us to move out of recession. And, of course, it would make my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's job much easier.

However, the ratification of the Maastricht treaty will not be enough on its own. If confidence is to be restored, there must be a certainty that the demand for goods and services will increase and so lead to an increase in the demand for the labour to produce those goods and services.

That is why I was delighted that my right hon. Friend ignored the advice from some sources to increase taxation significantly in his Budget and to cut public expenditure. In the depths of a recession nothing would have been more foolish. Tax increases and public expenditure cuts would inevitably have resulted in a reduction in demand, which would have cut off the green shoots, pushed back the start of the recovery and made recovery much more difficult. The right time to increase taxes and cut public expenditure is when the economy is booming and looks like overheating. The wrong time is in the depths of a recession. Then, taxes should be cut, as the Chancellor cut them last year, and public expenditure should be increased, as it has been in the past two years.

The level of demand will be boosted over the next few years as a result of the devaluation of the pound during the past six months. British goods and services are now cheaper in export markets and foreign goods and services are now dearer in the British domestic market. This provides British industry and commerce with greater opportunities to export more and sell more at home and I hope that they are exploiting to the full the advantage that they now enjoy.

It will be some time before the beneficial effects of devaluation are reflected in the balance of payments figures; perhaps it may be as long as two years. But the effects on the level of demand in the United Kingdom should be apparent much sooner. I feel that the level of demand generated by my right hon. Friend's recent policies, including the Budget, should be sufficient to generate the necessary level of growth to enable us to move out of recession and to start growing once again.

I have already welcomed the measures announced by my right hon. Friend to tackle unemployment. They will help to ease the worst effects in the short term, but they will not deal with the fundamental problem. The long-term solution to the problem of unemployment lies in the demand management policies about which I have been speaking. Between February 1985 and January 1987, unemployment in this country exceeded 3 million. It then fell quite sharply, so that by 1990 it was slightly in excess of 1·5 million. Over the past three years, alas, it has risen again, and it is now just over 3 million. From 1945 until 1974 we had full employment. The level fluctuated a little, but unemployment exceeded 1 million only twice, and then only briefly. In 1955 and 1965, also very briefly, unemployment fell to the very low level of 1·1 per cent. of the working population, about one tenth of what it is today.

Unemployment did not start to rise when the present Government came into office. It began to rise in 1974, under the previous Labour Government, and has been at an unacceptably high level ever since. I do not think that the Labour Government or the present Government can be proud of their records on unemployment over the past 19 years.

In recent years, there has been a feeling that high unemployment is inevitable. It does no harm, therefore, to remind ourselves that for most of the post-war period the situation was very much better than it is now. The current level of unemployment shows how far we have moved from the high level of achievement of the 30 years immediately after 1945. Nor does it do any harm to remind ourselves of the effects of unemployment, socially and economically.

Unemployment is socially divisive. It is difficult to have one nation, which is, after all, the principal domestic aim of my party, if 3 million people are out of work and if 1 million of those are long-term unemployed and have been out of work for more than a year. Lord Callaghan once said that the real division in our society is between those in work and those who cannot find work. Unemployment is also economically wasteful. If we are not using all the available labour, we are not maximising national output. It means that, as a nation, we are forgoing wealth which we could enjoy.

It is nonsense to suggest that demand has peaked and that there is no work available. We all know that we could consume more goods and services if we had the opportunity to do so. We also know that we could spend much more on social and public services. Potentially, there is plenty of additional demand for goods and services, public and private. The task facing us is to ensure that the level of demand is sufficient to utilise the potential supply of labour, capital and enterprise. That is the way back to full employment.

If a much lower level of unemployment is to be achieved and maintained, there must be pay restraint. In the past, there has been a strong tendency for the British economy to generate increases in earnings in excess of the increases in output, causing wage and salary cost inflation. The tendency has been especially powerful when the economy has been booming.

Until 1979, successive Governments tried to control excessive wage and salary increases by incomes policies. Since then, the determination of pay has been left to employers and employees and when the increases got out of hand and inflation rose the Government tried to brake those increases by demand deflationary policies.

Recently, although still too high, wage and salary settlements have fallen back sharply, almost certainly as a result of the recession. The Government rightly want a 1·5 per cent. limit on public sector pay this year and they hope that increases in the private sector will be of the same order. Few doubt that pay restraint is necessary at present but, if it is necessary now when increases are likely to be modest because of market conditions, surely it will be even more necessary when pay increases start to rise again as we move out of recession, as unemployment falls and as labour shortages reappear.

If we are to avoid having to brake back the recovery before full employment is reached, because wage and salary increases are out of control, consideration should be given to extending the attempts to restrain pay settlements to longer-term arrangements. If the Government are right to believe that low pay settlements in the public sector protect jobs—and they are—surely low pay settlements elsewhere in the economy will also protect jobs. Is not there a case for thinking again about incomes policies? Is not the right time now—in the depths of the recession—when the pressures for pay increases are at their weakest?

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I know that it is traditional to congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I shall do so because it is the tradition rather than because I believe that I should appreciate, or congratulate him on, what he has presented to the House.

The Chancellor made a very long speech—far too long. I was always told, in engineering research and certainly when I was a local government councillor, that if one did not have a good argument, one should make a long report. That is fair enough when dealing with reports: the way to get out of that is to do a fast reading course, get rid of all the rubbish and read only the facts. Unfortunately, a fast reading course does not help me when I listen to a long speech such as that which we heard this afternoon.

I shall not dwell on the speech for too long because much has already been said about it, but I am bitterly disappointed that there is to be value added tax on fuel, a fuel tax. That is perhaps the most cruel thing that the Government could do. I do not believe that everyone will be compensated through their benefits, as the Chancellor claimed. He knows very well that thousands of families will not qualify for such help with the fuel tax. In the past, we have discussed old people suffering from hypothermia and worried about whether they could keep warm and how we could help them. Now a dreadful tax burden is being placed on them, which will make matters even worse. I am very disappointed about that.

I am also disappointed about the fact that, despite some of the issues that the Chancellor raised, the message did not get across as to exactly why the country has been going downhill. The hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) said that it was due to the world recession, among other things. That is true, but it seems that it is never anyone's fault. I believe that it is partly the fault of the Government and partly the fault of the philosophy by which they live.

I do not believe that one can stand aside and let things happen; nor do I believe that high wages are the reason for depression and unemployment. There is a theory that high wages bring a nation to its knees, but I should like someone to explain to me why the countries of the third world, where people are paid peanuts for hard work, are not the richest nations in the world. It does not work that way. The problem is that we do not understand the difficulties that face us.

I started this week by visiting schools in my constituency and discussing further school closures, which are to take place because of a supposed lack of money or the standard spending assessment. The Government say that we must have training and a skilled work force. Schools are being closed, but the Government still expect to have a more skilled work force. Again, I do not understand the logic of that.

Local authority spending is being greatly reduced. The infrastructure around our towns and cities is falling apart, family life is disintegrating and crime is rising. What is the answer? The Government take more money out of the local economy, but I do not see the logic behind that.

More and more people are homeless, but, like many hon. Members, I receive letters from building companies who write to Back Benchers in sheer desperation asking us, for goodness sake, to ask the Government to do something because the industry is going to the wall. I did not hear much in the Budget which will help those people. The

[Mr. Bill Michie]

Budget was a big disappointment on the local authority, education and housing fronts and, perhaps even worse, on the job front, which has already been mentioned. The Chancellor said that short-term prospects were not the answer. I fully understand what that means. One cannot throw money at a project and hope that jobs will be provided sooner or later and that new skills will suddenly appear. That has never been the case. I accept one or two points that the Chancellor made, including the fact that employers will get a subsidy if they employ someone who has been out of work for two years; in other words, one buys oneself a job with one's dole money. I welcome the proposal to help 100,000 people who are unemployed to start small businesses. That will be nice for the 100,000, but pretty poor for the 300,000 who have lost their jobs since the last election.

I welcome the proposal for 30,000 long-term unemployed people who may be able to go back into some form of education, but I am still worried about what sort of education they will get and what sort of training skills they will achieve.

I had a wry smile at another of the Chancellor's proposals, for a new community action programme for the voluntary sector which should help to provide jobs or opportunities for at least 60,000 people. I seem to remember that there was a very good community programme, created by this Government many years ago. It was so good that it was popular. It was not only popular but it created permanent jobs and good wages, but once it got to that level the Government scrapped it altogether because people were getting decent wages and decent training. I hope that the Government have learnt some lessons from the past and will create a community action programme that is beneficial, not just to the community but to the unemployed.

I come to the business of action for jobs and the reasons why our industry is in dire trouble. I echo the query raised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition: if there is such good news, why is it not published? Why have not the Government come out with a fanfare of trumpets to say that the whole of manufacturing industry is on the up? It has not been published and I assume that we have to suspect the worst: that the situation is not as good as the Government are claiming.

Skills cannot be introduced overnight. One problem that I have had over the past few years has been to explain to the Government and other hon. Members that one can shut a factory any day very quickly and disperse the skilled labour force on to the dole queues or elsewhere, but one cannot recreate a factory overnight. Once those skills have been lost they cannot be found among those standing on street corners. That is not the way in which engineering skill and technology work. Surely this Government must have got that message by now. We are talking about a 14 per cent. reduction in real training for jobs. Statistics that I have here show that Government spending on training, at constant prices, was £2·4 billion in 1990-91. It fell to £2·1 billion in 1991-92 and remains at the same level this year. It is planned to remain at £2·1 billion for 1993-94, but will fall to £2 billion in the two years after that. In real terms, spending this year has therefore been reduced by £300 million on 1990-91 levels, a reduction of 14 per cent., yet the Goverment are still claiming in this Budget to be increasing training and education for the country's future prospects. While we have had this reduction in training, unemployment has risen by about 87 per cent.

I said at the beginning of my speech that I feel no enthusiasm about the Chancellor's speech. It strikes me that the Government are still slow in learning that, in order to have a nation that is wealthy, it has to be a nation that is working and is competing in the world in technology and new sciences. The only way in which the Government or the nation can achieve that is by long-term investment and long-term planning.

Our industrial base is in tatters. I walk through some parts of my constituency and see the places where I used to work and where my father used to work where there is nothing but dereliction. There is nothing in the Budget which will cure that either overnight or in the long term.

As a plug, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I draw the attention of the House to my early-day motion No. 1540 entitled "Technical and Engineering Capability and the Vulcan Bomber". Basically this expresses the hope that the last of the Vulcan bombers should stay in this country because it is a demonstration of the engineering and design skill of this nation in the past. Many of those designers and engineers are still alive today and some are still fairly active. I say that as one who had the privilege of being near a Vulcan bomber for many years, many years ago, and as one who has a soft spot for it. We should keep it, as I said in this early-day motion, to demonstrate to our future generations what skills we had in this nation and to inspire them and, I hope, this Government to invest in a proper diversification programme in order to retain and retrain skills for peaceful products.

It is no good saying that we have no cold war at present and therefore we cannot afford to invest in defence and that we have no idea of how to invest in peace.

It reminds me of the story I heard once about creating jobs in shipbuilding. An old man suggested that we should build luxury liners so that 4,000 old-age pensioners could be put on those luxury liners in the winter months—especially now that we are going to have a fuel tax—with 2,000 or 3,000 staff to look after them and let them go floating around to warm climates. The shock horror is that no nation can afford that sort of logic, but when one looks at it we have the Ark Royal and other large warships with thousands of highly paid, highly skilled and highly trained personnel floating around the world and we feel that to be a necessity. It may be a necessity, but if the will is there to do it for time of war, which we hope never comes, many of those ships would be lost in the first year. Surely with the right will we can create products for peace and protect our skills and our jobs for the future.

I must make one point on a subject on which I thought the Chancellor did not dwell: putting pressure on the banks. Many small businesses, as most hon. Members will know, have complained about the way in which banks have treated them in the past two or three years. I hope that sooner or later we shall have a Government who will get a grip on the banks and protect some of our small companies.

There is plenty of money in this nation and I hope there always will be. If one asks where one finds all this money, it is amazing how the Government can find money for their pet projects like defence; how they could find money on black Wednesday when billions of pounds went down the pan because of the stupid ERM fiasco and also when billions were spent trying to prop up the poll tax system created by this Government and scrapped by them.

No one will convince the Opposition that there is not enough money to invest in the nation and bring it back to the top of the industrial nations ladder, where it rightly belongs. We should stop frittering away our taxpayers' money on stupid projects proposed by the Government which are built on bias and prejudice. We should instead invest in this nation, which I believe will once again be one of the best industrial nations in the world.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): The hon. Members for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) and for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) made what were from their point of view sincere speeches, even if they contained an excessive degree of gloom. I have no doubt that we shall hear persistently from the Opposition Benches tales of gloom and woe.

I am extremely fond of the hon. Member for Newport, East, with whom I have often crossed swords in debate. He is a splendid constituency Member who reminds me of another great Welshman, Lord Tonypandy, who once told me about a report that appeared in a local Welsh newspaper of a funeral. The noble Lord recalled that the report read, "As the coffin was being lowered, the vicar, the Reverend Eli Jones, slipped, fell into the grave and broke his leg. That cast a gloom over the whole proceedings." That reminds me of the gloom that can be spread by the speeches of Opposition Members, even though it is wholly inappropriate to our economic recovery.

The Chancellor has for a long time been unjustly maligned. I have no hesitation in congratulating him on the way in which he has resisted much unnecessary abuse and has introduced a skilful and relevant Budget. Let us not forget some of the difficulties that he faced when he took on the task, including a world recession and the need to deal with some mistakes in monetary policy that had been made since 1987.

Mr. Bill Michie: Nobody admits mistakes.

Sir Anthony Grant: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I assure him that I admit my mistakes. The mistakes of which I speak were egged on and connived at by the Opposition parties, which encouraged the sort of action which led to the difficulties that my right hon. Friend had to face. That in turn led to our needing an over-rigid monetary policy which resulted in great suffering among, in particular, two sections that were least able to deal with it. I refer to the construction industry and the housing market and small firms, about which I shall say more shortly.

I am particulary glad that, in terms of political correctness, it is now recognised that the economy cannot be dealt with purely by monetary means and that we must also adopt fiscal policies. I am glad that we have returned to that more sensible and flexible system. As a result of the severe problems that the Chancellor faced on taking office, there was a total lack of confidence in business.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): My hon. Friend said that the Government's mistakes had resulted from monetary policy being too rigid.

Sir Anthony Grant indicated dissent.

Mr. Spicer: I must have misunderstood my hon. Friend. The problem was that they abandoned monetary policy in favour of fixed interest rates. That was the mistake to which my hon. Friend should allude.

Sir Anthony Grant: Immediately after black Wednesday, when stock markets throughout the world seemed to collapse, there was over-reaction everywhere, particularly in this country. A few Conservatives of great financial rectitude—including perhaps my hon. Friend—did not take the same view, but the Opposition parties were in favour of interest rates being lowered unnecessarily. I, too, was guilty of favouring such a policy and I accept blame in that respect. We were obliged later to have an over-rigid, over-intense interest rate policy which reached as high as 15 per cent. before we entered the exchange rate mechanism.

I will not pursue that now, though I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) will do so if he has an opportunity to speak in the debate. We now recognise that not just monetary policy but a mixture of monetary and fiscal policy is essential to run an economy such as ours. So I welcome the thrust of the Chancellor's strategy.

I am sufficiently long in the tooth to remember the time when, in 1967, the then Labour Government had to devalue. In the following Budget, introduced by the present Lord Jenkins of Hillhead, we had the biggest increase in taxation anybody could remember. He was cheered to the echo—I was in the Chamber at the time—for taking that action. So the Labour party cannot teach us anything about increases in taxation.

At that time, Lord Jenkins emphasised that recovery following devaluation should be export led. The principle holds good today. The difficulty is that, at a time when we require an export-led recovery, the countries of Europe and Japan are suffering from recession. That makes our export effort more difficult but even more vital.

I welcome the Chancellor's measures on export credit guarantees. I recall from the days when I had some responsibility for that issue how the credit game was played by other countries and we were easily deceived. I am glad that the Chancellor is aware of that and is introducing measures to improve credits for our exporting industries.

As Opposition Members are wholly committed to the Rio environmental decisions, perhaps they will explain how they would implement them. What measures would they introduce? We await with interest their answer in due course. They must not dodge the question. If they try to do so, my hon. Friends and I will persist in repeating it.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) that unemployment is the gravest problem we face. It also represents a major burden on the public sector borrowing requirement. In the 1970s, about which my hon. Friend spoke, I had some humble responsibility in the then Government, when the unemployment total reached 1 million. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) thumped the Dispatch Box hysterically and created a disturbance of monumental levels.

My responsibility at the time was for the regions. When we were unceremoniously thrown out of office in 1974 by an ungrateful electorate, unemployment had come down to about 700,000. Immediately Labour took over, it went up, and within a year it reached 1 million. There was then not a peep from the hon. Member for Bolsover and his hon. Friends. So we need no lessons from the Opposition about unemployment. Even so, it is a grave problem and I welcome the measures that have been announced to deal with it.

Only the revival of the small firms sector will have a true long-term impact. Large firms have already shed labour during the recession, and I fear that their labour forces will never return to their previous levels. Small firms have the resilience and flexibility, especially in the county of Cambridgeshire, to respond to the measures that the Chancellor has wisely introduced.

I was almost the first Minister to be responsible for small firms. The late lamented Lord Ridley had had that responsibility for about three weeks before I came to that office. In those days we clearly recognised that the future of the economy in a free market society lay with a healthy small firms sector. After we left office, the whole thing declined under Labour rule, and nothing was done to help small firms. The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) was the Minister responsible, and small firms languished under that regime. Later, when the Conservatives took office again, they were rediscovered, as it were, and I hope that we will retain that attitude.

It is essential to small firms—indeed, for the whole nation—that inflation is kept under control. The Chancellor and the Government can take pride in the way in which they have handled the problem of inflation. Small firms also want low interest rates. I have always wanted lower interest rates because I detest a high interest rate policy. Although I want pressure on them continually to be downwards, we have probably reached the stage when a degree of stability is justified. Small firms would now welcome stable inflation and stable interest rates. They wanted, and have now obtained, help with investment, and assistance with the corporation tax and VAT thresholds. They sought assistance with capital gains tax and inheritance tax and, above all, with the wretched uniform business rate. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor noted all that, and I congratulate him on his sensitivity in recognising the needs of the vital small business sector.

In particular, I am glad that he recognised the difficulties of small businesses in grappling with VAT and Customs and Excise. I have received endless numbers of letters about the ferocity with which the Customs and Excise administer their task. Small firms have described them as the Gestapo and the KGB. That is probably an exaggeration as they are worthy and honourable civil servants, but they have been over-zealous and draconian. I am pleased to see the changes that my right hon. Friend has announced.

One problem that has not been addressed is that small firms are greatly affected by the credit game—or indeed the credit racket. Large firms abuse smaller suppliers and contractors by taking their credit to the limit, causing considerabe cash flow problems. When I was in office I said that it was disgraceful, but larger firms were not prepared to admit anything until we found evidence that it was true. I was then thrown out of office and that was the end of that. However, the problem still exists. It should be possible to find a legislative format to bring some sanctions to bear.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): Does my hon. Friend agree that there can be a damaging and dangerous domino effect when large, principal contractors are slow to pay so that three or four sub-contractors down the line are all dependent on the money coming through?

Sir Anthony Grant: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In the absence of legislation, will Treasury Ministers and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade think carefully about the problem and emphasise to the large industries with which they are always dealing that it is in the nation's interest that they should pay their bills on time and ensure that small firms, which they were once, have a reasonable cash flow?

Manufacturing industry has made remarkable strides since 1979 when we were bottom of the productivity league of G7 countries. We are now at the top. Output and investment have increased and are increasing. Progress in industrial relations has been quite remarkable. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor pointed out, not since Victorian times or thereabouts have there been so few strikes. We can be justifiably proud of that. However, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was right to point out that industry requires more attention in the present economic climate and in future.

Compared with our partners in Europe and elsewhere, we have not paid much attention to manufacturing as we should. It is a matter of national culture rather than Government policy. If we were to ask anyone in the street in Britain what we meant by an engineer, most people would think of a grubby chap in overalls who repaired cars. However, the same term in Germany, Japan and elsewhere means someone who is held in high esteem and occupies an important position in industry and in the company. We have to move towards that attitude.

In the days when we were trying to encourage regional policy, I sought to encourage brighter people to run manufacturing industry in the north-east and the north-west. The difficulty was that the rewards, the prestige and the ease of work were greater for the brightest people if they went to the City of London to do no doubt very important paperwork in the service sector. We have to address that problem, and I would like to see the manufacturing sector in general and engineering in particular given a much higher profile.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has set the correct course for the future. He has tiptoed delicately between financial rectitude and the need not to damage the delicate flower of recovery. The small business sector will respond most vigorously, especially in East Anglia and Cambridgeshire.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): And the north-west.

Sir Anthony Grant: And the north-west, as my hon. Friend says.

All that is needed now is that mythical word, confidence. Confidence can be achieved only by stability and, with great respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South, small businesses want certainty. Therefore, I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands. The sooner we get over the uncertainty about Maastricht and our situation in Europe, the better it will be for everyone. The CBI, the chambers of commerce and all the industrialists with whom I have spoken want it over and done with so that there is certainty for the future. I hope that that will soon be the case. If it is, I look forward with great confidence to the future of our economy, thanks to the wise management of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) asked what the Opposition would do about the undertaking under the Rio convention to reduce carbon dioxide emissions. I offer one simple device off the cuff. If VAT on domestic fuel and power is considered the appropriate solution, it would be perfectly possible to make that revenue-neutral on VAT by reducing the average rate, so that there was no net increase in cost to the consumer but there was a switch in taxation to discourage people from using so much fuel and power. However, the Treasury do not think that way. They are concerned not with Rio but with the biggest single Budget measure—the £2,300 million that they are taking out of households by levying VAT on fuel and power.

The Chancellor faces a difficult situation, but he has only himself to blame. First, he is simply not believed by the market, by his colleagues in Government or by the House. We have seen a public facade building up in his defence, behind which his hon. Friends will be able quietly to knife him in the back. There were and still are good reasons why a Chancellor who trimmed his sails, changed course and abandoned his policies on the scale of black Wednesday should feel he had to go. The job has to be held by someone who is believed. No amount of special pleading about being overwhelmed by speculators will do —that is always the story. In any case, the Chancellor was maintaining that the economy was not vulnerable to the speculators.

Secondly, the Chancellor represents a Government who made the most colossal errors of judgment by unleashing the credit boom of the late 1980s. There were plenty of warnings, not least from within the Treasury, and even from that much maligned Treasury model, as I showed at the time, but they were ignored.

Thirdly, having suffered such wounds, the Chancellor is devoid of all principles. I mean principles not in any moral or high-minded sense, but simply in the sense of relating one day's improvisations to the next to avoid them cancelling each other out.

The Government used to have a medium-term financial strategy. It survives as monitoring ranges on a number of variables which do not include the most important one, which is the exchange rate. A target for the increase in tax yields three years ahead is offered up as a fetish to the markets of £10·5 billion, but elsewhere in the financial statement is the estimate that the error in forecasting the PSBR for the coming year is some £6·5 billion. For the error three years ahead, there is no estimate, but it must be far more than anything like the £10·5 billion that the Chancellor is offering up.

The Chancellor is unlikely to argue that no strategy is preferable to a wrong strategy, but others not saddled with the Chancellor's mistakes can stress the importance of having a workable strategy, and that is what I shall try to set out. A workable strategy is a political necessity. People need some sense of where the economy is and where it is going if they are to behave sensibly in their personal interest and that of their families. People do not believe the Chancellor, so they are not prepared to train for the long-term, to invest or to plan for the future. Still less are they told by the Chancellor that their real incomes today have grown faster, and are now some 10 per cent. higher, than the economy can afford. We also need a strategy to get us out of the difficulties we are in and to keep us out.

I say to my right hon. and hon. Friends that there is no easy way out for us. The popular ideas of Keynesian demand management provided a workable rule for correcting small excursions from full employment in situations where there was a sheet anchor against inflation in the shape of Bretton Woods and a stable valued dollar. With the extreme imbalances that we have today of unemployment and the current account and public borrowing, we have to look deeper.

Nor, I say to my hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor through my hon. Friends on the Front Bench, is it sufficient for us simply to advocate the supply side measures of more investment and training, vital though they are. The arguments about the imbalances are not part of the detail that can be worked out only in the circumstances as we find them as we approach the next election. While politically it is right for us to point out that we are suffering from Tory errors and that it is a Tory responsibility to deal with them, we have to show that we know what the imbalances are and realise their full seriousness, and show ourselves more competent to deal with them when it comes to be our job to deal with them.

What, then, of the design of a viable strategy? What does it mean in terms of immediate policies? In general terms, the answer is obvious: it has to be aimed at restoring and maintaining the balances—unemployment, the current balance and public borrowing. It should be prepared to use all available instruments, down and up—direct and indirect taxes, interest rates, funding and public expenditure—recognising that they all have an economic and political cost. The strategy may express the policy priorities of the Government, but even with all the instruments, the freedom of movement for a Government to express their priorities is severely circumscribed, and the greater the imbalances, the less scope there is for indulging those Government priorities.

All that is so much waffle for politicians and economists educated in a purely verbal tradition, who have never been taught to add up, never mind multiply. What happens is that one verbal simplification is pitched against another, the one adopted inevitably meeting disaster, leaving the sponsors of the unadopted simplification claiming that they had the right answer and believing that they were right.

Despite the all-too-obvious weaknesses and failures of economics and economists, a great deal of progress has been made in technical analysis of economic management in the past 20 years. Technical analysis is a good servant but a poor master. It is in the interests of Ministers, journalists and gurus to rubbish it, because they find it difficult to master. It is difficult to master, but that is part of their job. What matters is whether it works. Does it point to practical policies that impress politically?

It is a measure of the Chancellor's stupidity that he has allowed the Treasury's capability for technical economic analysis to degenerate in recent years. Any half-sensible

[Dr. Jeremy Bray]

Chancellor makes sure that he is as well equipped as anyone else in the game. I welcome the panel of independent forecasters, but behind the scenes it only shows up the increasing weakness of capability within the Treasury.

Of the three principal instruments that the Treasury should have, the main one is the characterisation of the national economy and its behaviour—the Treasury model. That model has been stagnant now for five years. It has grave, well-known errors within it, and nothing is done to correct them from year to year. There is no treatment within the Treasury of the global economy. The work that was once done there has now been farmed out to the National Institute of Economic and Social Research and to the London business school, and they run the international model used by the Treasury. Therefore, the Treasury inevitably does not fully understand all its characteristics.

Finally, when it comes to characterising the efficiency and performance of industry, the DTI may bleat until the cows come home and officials in its innovation unit may produce a report—only a few weeks ago, those officials told me that they expected it to be published—but it is useless them bleating in that way if they cannot characterise the impact of the dire situation of manufacting industry on the economy as a whole. The Treasury has no means of listening to such arguments.

Modern economics treats economic management as a game between different players, with different interests and capabilities. Monetarist doctrine was built around ideas of expectations. That gave way to concepts of commitment, learning and credibility. My favourite is a recent Federal Reserve Board working paper on "Rational Addiction with Learning and Regret". I am not too sure about the rational bit for the Government, but otherwise it is a strategy that I should have thought would appeal to them.

It is not necessary to go into the technical arguments. What is necessary and possible is to point to the broad nature of the conclusions. The imbalances are so large that, if they are not corrected, they will get worse. They are also so large that it is irrelevant to argue whether unemployment should be 2 or 4 per cent.: it should be a great deal less than 10 per cent. It is irrelevant to argue whether the current balance should be allowed to stray over 2 per cent. of GDP: it should be in surplus in the depths of the recession. It is irrelevant to argue whether public borrowing should exceed the 3 per cent. Maastricht criterion: it should not be heading over 8 per cent., even in the depths of a recession. Inflation is a scourge, and if it is not kept low, it runs the danger of becoming south American. However, low inflation has no virtue on its own if it is achieved at the cost of wrecking the other essential balances.

The trouble with arguing that we must deal with those structural imbalances, but not yet, is that they will get more difficult and painful to deal with later. They cannot be corrected overnight, nor even within five years. We can make a start now and, by being seen to make a serious start, set going the virtuous circles of increasing investment, confidence and stability.

For each instrument, we must ask how much it can contribute to improving one balance without damaging the others more. It is a matter of analysis. Let there be argument about that, and let us hear the argument. The panel of independent forecasters could provide such material, and the Treasury could match it. However, having looked at the evidence, my judgment is that an increase in income tax on those in work would help public borrowing more than it would harm unemployment. A further reduction in interest rates would weaken the exchange rate, and the sheet anchor against south American inflation, more than it would help investment and employment. An increase in Government investment would help employment and competitiveness more than it would harm public borrowing.

Then the argument moves on to the detail of the instruments—whether they be tax rates or allowances, and what conjuncture of relative interest and inflation rates, and what kind of public investment, we should have. The dynamics of policy must be set out, showing how policies will adapt to changing circumstances while pursuing consistent objectives in a consistently maintained strategy. No such thinking goes on in the Treasury today. Treasury people do not even attend the conferences at which such policies are argued out.

At the same time, of course, vigorous supply side measures are needed—in the sense not of lower taxes but of greater skills, better quality, greater appeal and enhanced capacity. That is a matter not of subsidy and second-guessing, but of looking for the features of company finance, corporate control and competition that have so weakened British manufacturing, or have never allowed it fully to develop.

None of the tax measures that the Chancellor today announced to bolster the corporate sector, especially small firms, addresses the differences that are so inescapable when we compare the position of small and medium-sized manufacturing enterprises in this country with those in Germany.

The Select Committee on Science and Technology has just returned from an examination of industrial competitiveness in Germany—talking to the Government, and visiting firms and research institutions. The remarkable fact is that in Germany firms bearing names such as Bosch, Diesel, Zeppelin and so on are all still there today, but they are booming. They maintain high research budgets, and increase them when profits fall. In contrast, the Chancellor was trying to make it easier for the entrepreneur to sell out of his company. That is the last thing that a German industrialist would do; yet here we are facilitating precisely that weakening of control and commitment that underpins the strength of the German engineering industry.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): Is the hon. Gentleman not taking an over-rosy view of the German economy at the moment? Mercedes Benz has just announced that it intends to lay off 30,000 people, Porsche has suffered a reduction of about 80 per cent. in its exports, and the German machine tool industry is all but in a state of collapse. The rosy picture that the hon. Gentleman paints is rather inaccurate.

Dr. Bray: The German unemployment level is about half that of the United Kingdom, and the average income in Germany is a great deal higher than it is here. The hon. Gentleman is confusing the short-term situation with the underlying strengths of the German economy. The same goes for the Japanese economy. The hon. Gentleman really ought to go and look at those economies at first hand.

Judged by the criteria of what a strategy should be like, the Chancellor's Budget lacks perspective on the severity of our problems, and any sense of strategy. It is a rag-bag of expediency, put together in a futile bid to save his own political skin.

7.32 pm

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): I have been in the House for almost 20 years, and one of the coincidences over that time is that when I have been on the Back Benches, more often than not I have followed the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) in such debates.

I do not know whether I should reveal this, but the hon. Gentleman and I share what could be called a professional interest and experience in the rather tricky, if not dreary, business of econometric forecasting. I was involved with that many years ago, and I know that the hon. Gentleman was, too. Indeed, it was out of that experience that he created the requirement for the Treasury to publish forecasts, as it now does.

I admit that I have moments of enormous gloom about this forecasting business, but I have to accept what partly lay behind what the hon. Gentleman said—that it is still necessary to bash on with the forecasts, if only because it is self-evident that changes in monetary policy and interest rates have their full impact two years out. So, whether one likes it or not, one has to anticipate what the effect of a particular policy change will be two years out.

I begin what I want to say by agreeing—perhaps surprisingly—with the opening remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) in praise and support of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. My right hon. Friend has not only comported himself with great stamina today, but has dealt extremely courageously with the enormous torrent of criticism and personal abuse that he has suffered over the past few months. I put on record my personal respect for the dignified way in which he has responded.

I say that despite the fact that I am someone whom I believe the Chancellor has in the past called a "moaning minnie" and a "siren voice", for advocating lower interest rates, for reasons that I have mentioned, two and a half years ago. At that point it seemed to me that, two years out, high interest rates would have the effects that we see now. The hon. Member for Motherwell, South, too, said that interest rates should have been lower then, and I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West said the same. However, I do not believe that either of them gave any reason why interest rates were kept high.

The reason, self-evidently, was a policy of giving priority to exchange rate management, as opposed to the management of monetary policy in the interests of this country. That is the exact opposite of what my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West said. The problem was not too rigid a monetary policy but exactly the opposite—an abandonment of monetary policy.

Sir Anthony Grant rose——

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Spicer: I have prompted two hon. Gentlemen to intervene. I shall give way first to my hon. Friend, and then to the hon. Member for Motherwell, South.

Sir Anthony Grant: I remind my hon. Friend that interest rates reached their highest level before we entered the exchange rate mechanism. They then went solidly down, whatever other criticisms one may have.

Mr. Spicer: I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised that point. The process of informally shadowing the deutschmark and having an informal fixed exchange rate started two or three years before we finally formalised the situation by going into the exchange rate mechanism. We should have learnt by the mistakes of the previous two or three years where the problem lay.

For a while, interest rates were too low and we had inflation, which was caused by the fact that we were gearing up to the German economy and giving greater priority to our exchange rate policy than to monetary policy. That was a continuum of what had been going on for three or four years, and I am glad that my hon. Friend has reminded us that the process goes further back than our entry into the ERM.

Dr. Bray: I do not believe that I advocated lower interest rates two years ago. When the economy has been put into a grossly unstable situation, one has to take action to correct that. The mistake was made in 1987. Lord Lawson well describes in his book how the crash on the stock exchange led him to reduce interest rates at a time when all the signs were that both interest rates and taxes should have been increased.

Mr. Spicer: That may be one interpretation of events. Another—which has the merit of following the way in which the policy was pursued after 1987, through 1988 and 1989—relates that monetary policy, in so far as it existed, was determined to maintain a certain parity within exchange rates, especially against the deutschmark. I believe that that is how most commentators and historians now view that policy, which was maintained until white Wednesday last September, when we came out of it. I shall deal with that in a moment, if I may.

The Budget deals with two issues that I believe are interrelated—the deficit, and growing unemployment. Those two issues are related because they share the same derivative—low growth over the past two or three years. Indeed, so low has growth been that it has been negative by 4 per cent. over the past 30 months.

As I have said, that low growth rate has been caused by excessively high interest rates, which in turn were caused by a policy that placed greater priority on exchange rate manipulations for many reasons relating to Maastricht and the policy in Europe. Replying to what my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West said about confidence, one of the essential requirements now is continuity of policy.

We must learn the lesson of the past six years, of putting an exchange rate policy and a determination to move towards a single currency in Europe above the direct monetary interests of this country. We should perhaps have learnt that lesson by the 1930s, when we tried to link our currency to the United States' economy through the gold standard. That did not work. In fact, it was a disaster. However, we tried it again, although we have now stopped for a while. The greatest boost to confidence would be to state quite clearly that we are now going to manage our economy in terms of its own requirements.

At present, the British economy requires sustained economic growth. That growth, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, requires a relaxed and easy monetary policy. He said that his narrow money target was zero to 4 per cent., and that the target for M4 was 3 to 9 per cent. Most people would say that the narrow money target is within the band, although, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, at the higher end. However, in respect of broad money, which many people believe is the crucial factor in getting the economy moving again, most analyses show that it is still very low, if not still negative. It certainly was negative until very recently.

It is clear that the basic policy parameter and confidence factor to which my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West alluded requires an easing of monetary policy. The objective is also clear: to create such substantial, steady and progressive growth that unemployment will fall, causing the totality of benefits to reduce, the tax take to rise and the deficit to be addressed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) made a very interesting point earlier in that context. Indeed, the hon. Member for Motherwell, South may have alluded to the same point. My right hon. Friend said that one of the problems with trying to generate employment at the moment is that there is a discontinuity between output and its effect on employment. We may be going through a new industrial revolution, particularly affecting the services sector. Investment seems to be causing unemployment rather than employment. We need at least 2 per cent. growth simply to keep steady in terms of employment levels.

We are experiencing enormous strides in productivity at the moment. It may be argued whether that is because we are at the back end of a recession or because there are substantive industrial revolutionary effects, and that we are entering a new phase. However, it seems that we need about 2 per cent. growth just to stay steady in respect of employment levels. In order to bring down unemployment, we will have to generate growth levels that we have not been able to sustain in the past. The task is rather enormous. We must aim for above 2 per cent. simply to reduce unemployment from its present rate.

That requires an investment culture and a substantive investment procedure from now to the distant future which will create and expand jobs as opposed to just replacing labour for capital. I believe that such an investment culture has three ingredients. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, South-West and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer have already alluded to the first of those ingredients. The first ingredient is good labour relations.

Undoubtedly, one of the great gifts of the Conservative Administrations of the 1980s was to provide for stable, sound and good labour relations. The figures that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred to earlier are remarkable. We had a better strike record in the last year than we have had for 100 years. That is a tremendous contribution and of enormous importance to investors, particularly those considering investing from abroad. Foreign investment must be added to the massive investment that will be required to keep pace with the rate of unemployment.

The second ingredient is the continuation of a liberal trading policy, and this is where I become so concerned about our obsession with trading with Europe. Of course it is important that we trade with Europe. It is important that we have open trading relationships with Europe. However, as has been said several times today, Europe will, into the foreseeable future, be a rather slow growth place with which to trade.

Leaving aside the fact that we trade typically £10 billion per annum in deficit with Europe, the fundamental point is that, unless we are very careful, we will lock ourselves into a political union governed by a protectionist philosophy.

The great thing about Britain, our enormous advantage and the reason why we have had such investment in this country over the past 10 years is not that we were going to join a political union; in fact, quite the reverse. Our advantage has been that we stood on a bridge between Europe and the rest of the world, because we had a liberal trading policy. Companies could come here in the knowledge that they could trade both with Europe and with the growth areas of the world, which in the next few years may be the United States, and which will certainly include the Pacific basin.

We have the largest and the third largest international airports in the world because we happen to be at the crossroads of much international trade. The fact that this country is a bridge between continental Europe and the other great trading sectors of the world is an enormous advantage.

If we are to maintain in future the kind of investment from abroad that we have enjoyed in the past, we must maintain open trading policies and our relationships with the rest of the world. We must continue to act as a bridge between Europe and the rest of the world.

It is wrong, and the converse of the truth, to say that we encourage jobs by joining a protectionist, political union in Europe. Quite the reverse: the jobs come because we are a bridge between Europe and, outwith Europe, hopefully with the rest of the world.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Did my hon. Friend notice the quite extraordinary and outrageous survey by the CBI which it sent to Members of Parliament and to peers, which stated that inward investment to this country from the top Japanese and American companies would be adversely affected if we failed to ratify the Maastricht treaty? All the points that my hon. Friend has made so validly were completely undermined by the extraordinary parliamentary briefing, which bore very little relationship to the report actually submitted to the CBI. The CBI put its own spin on it and gave the impression that, by failing to ratify the Maastricht treaty, we would jeopardise inward investment. Those companies quite clearly stated in the report that that was not the case, and that it would make no difference at all.

Mr. Spicer: I am glad that my hon. Friend makes that important point. I saw the press reports at the weekend. Many canards have been spread about all this, not only in Britain. We are told that, through political union, every country will get more jobs. The Danish Government are using the argument that political union will create more jobs. It is suggested that every country in Europe will have more jobs as a result of political union.

Britain will get the jobs if we are part of a wider trading movement which pervades the world.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): I endorse my hon. Friend's point about the importance of trade with countries outside the European Community. Of the £1·3 billion of extra Export Credits Guarantee Department cover announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor today, a great majority will be in developing countries, in which we are up to our limits in terms of cover. Many major projects and export development opportunities lie in those countries. I am sure that my hon. Friend will join me in welcoming that.

Mr. Spicer: I certainly welcome the concept of putting ECGD on a par with other countries. I also welcome the proposal to make it cover other countries. However, unless I misheard him, my hon. Friend made a specific point about developing countries. Our relationship with developing countries is important, but I was referring to linking in to fast-growth parts of the world. I take my hon. Friend's point.

My third point is the real guts of what I want to say. The third and most important characteristic of a country which wishes to attract the massive investment which I have said we shall require merely to keep pace with the present rate of unemployment is low taxation. It is on taxation that I have some comments to make about the Budget.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has found it possible to focus more on indirect taxation than direct taxation. It is magnificent that he has set the target of reducing the base rate ultimately to 20 per cent. That has to be right. He is right to maintain the rate of direct taxation and to have various measures around it which relate to business.

I am worried about one danger. I do not say that the Government have fallen into it yet, but I have a lingering worry. It will be made clear when we relate expenditure and revenue in one Budget. Of course the Government are right to have combined the Budget and the autumn statement. Until we have one Budget, it will be difficult to say clearly whether we have allowed expenditure to get out of control.

I am concerned that, in our fiscal policy, we ensure that our expenditure meets the revenue that we have available and not the other way round. I want to see the revenue determined first; we should then fit the expenditure into what we can afford. If revenue starts to chase up expenditure—that is the danger—a dangerous ratchet effect can be created. Then more expenditure is chased by higher taxation in the interests of sound finance.

We reach a point that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor rightly said he wanted to avoid, at which the wealth-creating private sector is squeezed out. He was right to say that not Whitehall but the private sector ultimately creates new jobs. In order to allow the maximum private sector investment from which growth must occur, we must ensure that public expenditure is brought into line with what we can afford as a nation. That means that it must be brought into line with low taxation.

Once we have growth, of course, the tax take increases, and we enter a benign cycle. We have more money for hospitals and public expenditure. However, it must be that way round. We shall not know until the autumn whether public expenditure is properly under control, but it must be that way round. Therefore, the broad policy must be one of public expenditure related to what we can afford and in current circumstances an easing of monetary policy.

Above all, we must have a monetary policy which reflects the future requirements of the country, not a monetary policy which fits the requirements of other countries through a fixed exchange rate. We are now, at last, on the right track. There is the hope of recovery, but a massive and daunting task lies ahead.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I am following the hon. Gentleman's arguments on his third point closely. Does he accept that there is an alternative way of looking at public expenditure? If it is focused carefully on capital projects which generate demand in the private sector, it can be offset by the increased yield of taxation, which feeds back into public finances. There is a careful balancing act to be performed. Public expenditure can work in the reverse of the way he describes, provided that it is properly focused on areas of public expenditure which create demand from the private sector.

Mr. Spicer: Of course there is a relationship between public spending and private investment on occasions—I could not agree more. One wants to make sure that the mesh is correct.

I listened to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) said about distinguishing more clearly between capital and current expenditure. I have a little more difficulty than my right hon. Friend on that, because in the public sector there is a much closer connection between current and capital expenditure. If one spends money on roads, there is a blurring of money for repairs and so on, which is current expenditure, and capital expenditure. Of course I accept that there is a relationship between the public sector and the private sector in that context. It is important to get that relationship right and to establish proper contracting procedures and so on.

However, if we are to achieve the growth we require —for the reasons that I gave earlier, we require enormous and sustained growth—it must ultimately come through the private sector. That is what the Budget is all about. In that context, I wish it well. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and others have said, we shall look at it again when we come to match expenditure with revenue in the autumn.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): In Hackney we have the 11th highest level of unemployment in the country. So the test of the Budget for ordinary people in Hackney, as for ordinary people everywhere, is what it will do for unemployment. We are told that by this summer the total number of people unemployed in the country as a whole will be the highest since records began 100 years ago.

So if the Budget does not meet the test of addressing unemployment, it will have failed. Of course, the Chancellor did not ignore the subject. He revealed with a flourish a package of new schemes which are supposed to be what the Budget will do for the unemployed. So I wish to examine those schemes to determine to what extent they offer substantial help for the unemployed and to what extent they are merely window dressing.

Five main schemes—some of them new, some beefed up versions of old schemes—were revealed this afternoon: learning for work, community action, an increase in the business start-up scheme, a new scheme called TEC challenge and a proposal to give subsidies to employers on a pilot basis to employ the long-term unemployed.

The Chancellor tells us, with enormous pride, that the learning for work scheme will provide 30,000 places for the long-term unemployed to undertake a year's vocational training. First, 30,000 is not a huge figure; it represents a handful of places per constituency. Secondly, and more important, the provision of 30,000 places for a year's vocational training does not begin to meet a demand that has become increasingly loud in the months preceding the Budget—that the Government re-examine the rule that prevents people from studying for more than 21 hours without losing benefits.

It is heartless of the Government to puff up the provision of 30,000 places when hundreds of thousands of unemployed people who would benefit from the range of training and education opportunities that are available in our institutes of learning will continue to be thwarted. They will still have to face the fact that, if they return to educational training for more than 21 hours, they will lose their entitlement to benefit.

The rule is particularly heartless in the current circumstances. Whatever Conservative Members say, we shall face high unemployment rates for some time. For weeks, the Government have hinted and teased about the possibility of flexibility on the 21-hour rule; the learning for work scheme that they have offered in its place is a derisory response to our objections to a rule which continues to be unfair, and continues to penalise unemployed people who genuinely want to retrain and to improve their education.

We are told that the community action scheme will offer 60,000 places for unemployed people to work in the community. That figure, too, is not very high, compared with the unemployment figure of 3 million. More important, however, the scheme offers people a mere £10 on top of their benefits to engage in voluntary work. Ministers ought to stop and think. Ten pounds a week will not even pay for travel and lunch, and it certainly will not help unemployed women to pay child-care and creche costs.

Community action is crippled from the start. It will not meet the needs of unemployed women with children; and, certainly in London and the south-east, that extra £10 will not make it practical or feasible for people to consider voluntary work. Many of them will be unable to pay for travel, meals or the new clothes that they may need to do such work. I note, moreover, that community action is supposed to be delivered through the voluntary sector—the self-same sector that the Government have decimated for many years by cutting local authority funds.

The other part of this glorious package is the business start-up scheme. We were told that there would be 10,000 more places on that scheme. Ministers do not mention, however, that after three years only 58 per cent. of the businesses started under it are still going. I dare say that, after four years, the proportion will be even lower.

The Government's other brand-new scheme is the training and enterprise council challenge scheme, under which TECs across the country will bid for money from a central pool for job creation schemes. The schemes will be judged according to the extent to which they involve the private sector. The Government seem to have no idea about the reality of life in our inner cities. In areas such as Hackney and other parts of inner London, and Manchester and Birmingham, the private sector is virtually atrophied: in Hackney, the largest single employer is the local authority, followed by the health service. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may sneer, but schemes that depend too heavily on the involvement of the private sector necessarily discriminate against residents of the inner cities.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in constituencies such as hers, the slashing of the urban programme will have a bigger impact on jobs —or, rather, on the loss of jobs—than the Budget?

Ms Abbott: That is an important point.

Conservative Members jeered at the notion that local authorities were major employers in areas such as Hackney. It is not the fault of people in Hackney that traditional areas of employment—small businesses related to the docks, for instance—have declined since the war. The structural changes that have taken place in inner-city employment are not the fault of the inhabitants; they should be able to trust the Government to understand those changes and tailor job-creation schemes accordingly, rather than sneering in a way that suggests that the preponderance of local authority employment results from choice.

Mr. Duncan: Will the hon. Lady outline the measures taken by the glorious council in Hackney to attract private enterprise back into her constituency—if any such measures exist?

Ms Abbott: I know that the hon. Gentleman is not familiar with the problems of the impoverished inner city, so I shall forgive his ignorance. Let me tell him, however, that the Government have chosen Hackney council to participate in the city challenge scheme. It is working closely not with the private sector, because the private sector in Hackney is atrophied, but with housing associations and other voluntary organisations to help to improve and renovate housing in Hackney.

Hackney council is keen to work with the private sector in 1993. I invite the hon. Gentleman to accompany me any day of the week and to walk up Kingsland high street and Stoke Newington high street, to visit the industrial estates on the edge of the Lea valley and to see what has happened to industry and business in Hackney under the present Government. Hackney's last major employer closed down four or five years ago. It does not suit a Government who have done so much to smash manufacturing in areas such as London and the south-east to sneer at the people of Hackney because they rely on the local authority as an employer more than they would like to do.

Let me return to the Government's much-touted package of schemes. We shall have to see how the final scheme works—the scheme that will subsidise employers to take on the long-term unemployed. I do not wish to knock it before it has got off the ground, but such schemes are particularly heartless, in that they are promoted as a realistic answer to the problems of unemployment. We hear today that, even in the borough of Hackney, 58 people are chasing every job vacancy. That figure is not particularly high: in other London boroughs, particularly the outer boroughs, the figure is even higher. Surely it is heartless to promote and publicise such schemes, suggesting that only a lack of will or ability on the part of the unemployed prevents them from working. In fact, if the jobs are not there—and, for 57 out of every 58 of my constituents, they are not there—the most wonderful schemes in the world cannot return people to employment.

Listening to the Chancellor's annual speech is always interesting, but those who wish to know the truth must look at the Red Book. Given the amount that will go into the Government's schemes in the coming year, the package of schemes to which I refer will receive the equivalent of only £55 million in 1993-94. That is a derisory amount to spend on employment. I realise that it does not represent the entirety of Government spending, but it is the entirety of spending on the schemes that I have mentioned. It is particularly derisory and heartless given that we are approaching the summer, when unemployment will be at its highest since records began.

These schemes are simply window dressing. They are Mickey Mouse schemes, which offer a shadow of hope to the unemployed but do not begin to meet the reality of the unemployment crisis that faces people in Hackney, in other parts of London, in the south-east and internationally.

I am afraid that it is hard to escape the conclusion that the Government are interested in forcing people back into the labour market at the lowest possible wages. At least the Government now talk about putting people back to work, but they promote a low-wage economy. If I were a member of the Government, I would not be so enthusiastic about boasting about the amount of inward investment to this country, as the Government have been reduced to doing.

Part of the reason for the inward investment to this country is the fact that we speak English, which has nothing to do with Government policy. Another reason for that investment is that wages in this country are 44 per cent. of those in Germany. I do not believe that growth and a return to full employment in this country can be sustained by basing our competitive edge on low wages rather than skills, training and education. In the long term, it cannot be a viable course for this country to seek to compete on low wages and poor conditions rather than education and training. That is why it was regrettable that the Government did not see fit to re-examine the 21-hour rule for people on benefit as it stops them entering full-time education and training.

If one wants to find the truth of any Chancellor's Budget statement, one has to look at the Red Book. We should forget about the window dressing and see what the Red Book says about unemployment. It says that it will be "some time" before unemployment starts to fall again. What does the Government's panel of advisers—the seven wise men—say about unemployment? The panel prophesy that unemployment will continue to rise and that, by the end of the year, it will be between 3·1 million and 3·4 million.

The Budget offers nothing for the unemployed in the short term apart from window dressing. The Government know that, and the presentation and content of the Budget are heartless. The Budget does not begin to meet the concerns of ordinary people in Hackney and the country as a whole.

One aspect of unemployment which, sadly, will probably not be raised during the entire five-day debate is black unemployment. Recent research has shown that black unemployment in this country is twice as high as white unemployment. In my constituency, the unemployment rate among young black males is as high as one in two. Those frightening figures for black unemployment are a tragedy for the black community because the generation of black people who came here from the Indian sub-continent, the Caribbean and across the old Commonwealth in the 1950s and 1960s came specifically to work. It is a tragedy for those in the black community that their children and grandchildren are being thrown on the economic scrap heap.

Specific factors affect black unemployment in this country. They include the shake-out of labour in public services, health and transport, which have traditionally been high employers of black and ethnic minority people. Black people are affected by discrimination and by what Americans call the "last to be hired, first to be fired" philosophy. The loss of jobs in local government affects black people, who had a choice of fair employment opportunities in local government, certainly in big cities.

What are the Government doing about unemployment in general and black unemployment in particular? They are doing nothing. The Government talk about employer-based training schemes. Statistics prove that such schemes discriminate against black and ethnic minority trainees. It is cruel for the Prime Minister to talk about a nation that is at ease with itself when the Government are prepared to let unemployment rip and bear most heavily on some of the most vulnerable sections of the community.

What the black community—and, indeed, the rest of the community—demand from the Government is action on unemployment and policies to generate full employment. The black community want the Government to take the lead as an equal opportunity employer and to ensure that their training schemes are not discriminatory and are equally accessible to white and black trainees. They want the Government to show some concern, and support and devise specific schemes to address the problem of black youth unemployment in inner cities. I know that not many people are concerned, but black workers from all over the Commonwealth helped to rebuild this country after the second world war. I believe that their children and grandchildren deserve better from the Government than the studied indifference that they have encountered in previous years.

Unemployment has affected the housing market in the south-east. There can be no return to business confidence in London and the south-east without a revival in the housing market. I cannot talk about conditions in the north, Wales or Scotland, but I know that the rise in the housing market helped to promote a feeling of boom conditions in the late 1980s in London and the south-east. That feeling may have been unrealistic, but there was a feeling that we were experiencing a boom. We will not have a revival of confidence unless the Government do something about the housing market.

Today the bankers Morgan Grenfell have issued a report showing what those of us who are home owners living in London already know—house prices in London have fallen 25 per cent. in the past four years and the council tax will further depress house prices in London. There are more people in London living in houses worth less than their mortgage than anywhere else in the country. The stamp duty changes will do little to help home owners in London and the south-east. One cannot get much in inner London for £60,000, which is the top limit for those who will be helped by the stamp duty changes. Unless there is a revival of confidence in London and the south-east so that people believe that they have a chance of obtaining and retaining jobs, the housing market in London will not start to move again.

Even on the Government's own figures—which, as we know, have been adjusted and massaged to put the best possible face on reality—there are more than 10,000 unemployed people in Hackney. One in four males is unemployed and almost one in five women is unemployed. What is worse is the fall in the number of unskilled people in the labour market because they are not even bothering to register as unemployed. The cuts in local authorities and health authorities that will take place this year as a direct result of Government policy will make the unemployment rate in Hackney even worse. Local authorities and health authorities are the major employers in inner city areas. People in Hackney, and, I suspect, all over the country, want a return to full employment.

When I was a sixth-former almost 20 years ago, my contemporaries—young people of 16 and 17 who were thinking of leaving school or going on to further education—and I had discussions and thought about what jobs we would do. It never occurred to people leaving school in the late 1960s and early 1970s that they would not work at all. One of the harshest results of the Government's mismanagement of the economy over the past decade has been that a generation of children have left school in Hackney and elswhere who feel that they will never work. They believe that it is not worthwhile getting an education or training because the jobs are not there. To blight the hopes of a generation in that way is one of the cruellest things that the Government have done.

It is all very well for Conservative Members to weep crococile tears now——

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): They are sniggering.

Ms Abbott: Yes, they are indeed sniggering, which shows how little the problem concerns them. It is all very well now—in the 1990s—for Conservative Members to weep crocodile tears about the unemployed and to wring their hands in anguish over the issue, but Labour Members and people in the country know that throughout the 1980s the Government deliberately used high unemployment as a weapon to smash the trade unions and keep down wages. Nobody takes those crocodile tears seriously now.

The test of the Budget for ordinary people—not journalists and political professionals—is what it will do about the central tragedy in economic life: the unemployed. The unemployed are offered Mickey Mouse schemes, window dressing. This is an exercise in public relations. The statistical and economic data behind the Chancellor's speech indicate that the Budget is based on the assumption that unemployment will continue to rise in the foreseeable future.

What has been presented to us today is failure. The Budget fails my constituents. It fails the unemployed people of Hackney and in the rest of the country. It will be seen for what it is. When, in a few years, the Government go to the electorate, the way in which they have cheated, deceived and failed the unemployed will not be forgotten or forgiven.

8.20 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): If there is anyone who has failed, it is the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), who has not addressed the question of how to reduce unemployment. All hon. Members would very much like to see full employment. On that question, there is no difference between us. The differences between us relate to the means of achieving and maintaining full employment. That is the aspect of the matter which the hon. Lady and, indeed, the rest of her party need to address. We heard a short, jolly, churlish and negative speech from the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith).

I simply do not understand why Opposition Member after Opposition Member failed to welcome the strategy behind the Budget. The purpose is to create a medium-term and long-term framework for industry and the rest of the economy—

"the only way to achieve sustained growth and high levels of employment."

What we need is a framework within which to stabilise the economy and encourage and strengthen businesses that invest in Britain's future. That is what we heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer this afternoon and what the country wanted to hear.

The words that I quoted a moment ago are from a document issued by the Labour party last week. It is described as Labour's budget for jobs and I have scanned it with great interest. Having looked at the strategy, I am puzzled by the fact that Labour Members have not welcomed the Chancellor's speech. What is the great difference between that speech and the speeches of Opposition Members? The Chancellor has dealt with the practical reality of how the objectives are to be achieved and how the framework strategy is to be met. This Labour document does not put forward one idea about how to raise the money to tackle the problems that we all know are to be found in the economy. It is a false prospectus of the worst sort.

I welcome the strategy that has been set out by the Chancellor, whose speech almost enters the record books as perhaps one of the longest Budget speeches this century. I am not very strong on the history of Budget speeches, so I cannnot be certain about that. In any case, the two-hour speech that we heard today contained a great deal of meat, which will be considered in detail during the Committee stage of the Finance Bill. My right hon. Friend addressed several key issues at the macro-economic level, some of which I wish to refer to.

I was delighted to hear my right hon. Friend emphasise why membership of the exchange rate mechanism had been very important. Hon. Members differ as to whether the day of our departure was black Wednesday or golden Wednesday or white Wednesday. I regard it as black Wednesday, but let us not be pedantic. There can be no doubt that the Government's attempt to adjust the inflation expectations of people in this country once and for all was worth while. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), who is not in the House at the moment, attached too little importance to the effect of our entry into and membership of the ERM in breaking the traditional British habit of inflating our way out of difficulties, of preferring high levels of inflation to the tough decisions that are necesary to proper management of the economy. Given that there were high levels of inflation under the last Labour Government and that, by and large, high levels of inflation are associated in the long run with high unemployment, I am perplexed by the Opposition's attitude. The ERM did indeed reduce inflation expectations. At some point we shall have to look again at the whole question of managed exchange rates within the open capital market of the European Communities. However, that is not a matter for this speech, although it will undoubtedly come up at the Committee stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

We should be cautious about the effect of our leaving the ERM on black Wednesday. That event provoked a fall in the value of sterling. The fall appeared to be very welcome in that it made our exports more competitive. However, we rely rather heavily on trade—particularly on imports, which make up one quarter of final demand. The potential danger is inflation of imports and, therefore, the return of inflationary pressures to the economy. That has yet to be seen, partly because United Kingdom manufacturers have not increased their prices. They realise that demand is still rather flat and, as overall inflation expectations are still low, wage settlements have been very modest. However, hon. Members should not believe that we have conquered the dragon of inflation. It is still there, writhing on the floor. A weak pound is not something that any Government want to see. Even if we are not in the ERM, economic policy must take into account the position of the pound vis-a-vis the currencies of our competitors.

Nevertheless, we have witnessed an ability to adjust, to weaken monetary policy. Interest rates have fallen and the fall in the value of sterling itself has weakened monetary policy further. I am very pleased that this has given us an opportunity to tackle the problems of asset deflation. It is an opportunity that we must grasp. But the way in which some of us regard the montary aggregates as already indicating the return of a good degree of buoyancy to the economy should not be underestimated. M0 is pushing at the upper end of its set range and there is quite a hidden impetus, which will be revealed in the months ahead. I know that M4 has been criticised as being rather flat on its back. I suspect that one of the Chancellor's reasons for giving slightly more buoyant figures for M4 is that he is adjusting the full funding rule by allowing the banks' and the building societies' purchases of gilts to be taken into account. If that is the case, we are witnessing an overall loosening of monetary policy. That will be welcome on one condition—that we tighten up on the fiscal side.

On the question of balance in the economy, there is no doubt that, as we have had significantly weakened monetary policy in recent months, we should pay attention to the fiscal side of the equation. The Chancellor has very graciously set forth a long-term strategy to that end. Too seldom do Chancellors set out their intentions with regard to taxation over a number of fiscal years. My right hon. Friend is to be commended on that score. My caveat is that the incidence of tax biting has been delayed to the beginning of 1994-95. In effect, there will be a generally neutral effect next year. I will not be critical of the Chancellor's endeavours because he has moved in the right direction, but I put down a marker: given that the medicine has been dangled before us, it would be better that we took it quickly. I make that point to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary.

Mr. Wolfson: My hon. Friend has given a balanced view, but does not he agree that if action such as he suggests had been taken sooner rather than later, it could have had a dampening effect on recovery? That is the key.

Mr. Taylor: It is a complex argument. I do not wish to prolong my speech, but there are many factors which impinge upon confidence. If it were felt that the Government would have difficulty funding the deficit at any reasonable level of long-term interest rates and that the debt-to-GDP ratio would get out of hand, that would be damaging for confidence, in the widest sense of the word, and might snuff out a revival which, in other circumstances, monetary conditions might already have safeguarded.

The issue is complicated. My point is that the funding of the deficit and the belief that the Government have a credible long-term strategy, including an early move to increasing taxation, would have been on balance a better judgment. Far be it from me to know whether that is likely to be the case. Time will tell. The great point about making speeches in the House is that, although very few listen at the time, plenty of people are prepared in a year's time to check on what one said. So Hansard has my fate in its hands, so to speak.

Even the excellent recent survey on inflation by the Bank of England—the report which the Chancellor instructed it to make—indicated clearly that fiscal policy is important in influencing expectations of future monetary policy and for that reason may affect current long-term interest rates. We cannot disentangle the relationship between fiscal and monetary policy in those circumstances. Those who would like low interest rates at the short end and lower interest at the long end have to face up to the fact that they may achieve that only by a much more aggressive fiscal policy than Conservatives have been accustomed to.

Fiscal policy covers spending and tax raising. I would welcome cuts in spending plans, and I am delighted that the Chief Secretary is studying that closely. I am not sure where I stand on that in the Conservative party; it is always confusing, but as someone who believes that there is a role for public exenditure in important parts of the economy, I must point out that 56 per cent. of all Government expenditure is represented by education, social service payments and health—areas in which it is difficult to make dramatic cuts in the short term.

With a public sector borrowing requirement of £50 billion, cuts would need to be dramatic. Therefore, I hesitate slightly on taking the view, "It will be all right on the night because we will cut public expenditure." I suspect that we will restrain public expenditure. One way in which we might force ourselves to do that is to take away the GDP deflator from the calculations on spending plans; in other words, we should remove the concept of increasing public expenditure for the incidence of inflation. That would be a welcome change in the way in which the Government address the figures in the Red Book. I commend it to the Treasury team, but it will not save us from addressing the incidence of taxation at some point.

[Mr. Taylor]

It is misguided of the Labour party to criticise the introduction of VAT on domestic fuels. That is a significant fund raiser. Zero rates have always been an anomaly and would be better tackled in other ways. The Chancellor rightly mentioned that the Secretary of State for Social Services will need to review these matters in subsequent statements because of the impact particularly on the lowest paid and those in receipt of social service benefits.

About 24 per cent. of all our goods are zero-rated or are exempt; that is an imbalanced VAT network. I have already said in the House that I favour the removal of zero rating, possibly with the introduction of a lower rate than the standard rate, which would be consistent with the rules of the European Community. I welcome the two-stage introduction of the standard rate on domestic fuels, with 8 per cent. to begin with, followed by 17·5 per cent.

If all zero-rated items were subject to a standard rate of VAT, the standard rate might be reduced. That might be a simpler way of dealing with the matter and it would yield £5 billion or £6 billion extra to the Exchequer in a full year. I do not want to go further into such matters. I am happy to put it on the record that if we need to raise taxation, I am uncomfortable with the zero rating of VAT.

The Chancellor hinted at something that I should like to examine more carefully. He did not imply, because no Treasury Minister would do so, that there would be hypothecated taxes, but in his comments on road fund licences, fuel taxes and road pricing there was a hint of hypothecation. I welcome that because it would give greater accountability to the Treasury. Perhaps it would not give much flexibility, but the Treasury has always been known to be as flexible as it wants. From the point of view of the public, I am happy that we get a better understanding of why taxes are being raised.

The Budget contained welcome measures. I should disclose, because it is in the Register of Members' Interests, that I advise Commercial Union and Barclays de Zoete Wedd Investment Management. Therefore, I take particular interest in some of the measures. Perhaps in a strange order, I welcome the measures in regard to Lloyd's names. I am not a name at Lloyd's, but I attempted to raise the subject in the debate on the Finance Act 1991. The Financial Secretary is to be commended for examining the whole system of the reserving of Lloyd's. That will be welcome to an important institution in the City, regardless of the comments of Opposition Members about individual names. As an institution, Lloyd's is important to the stability of the City and to invisible earnings at the time of a balance of payments deficit.

I also welcome the freezing in real terms of the increase in the uniform business rate. That will go down well with businesses in the south-east and elsewhere.

The Chancellor has been clever in making more use of the 20 per cent. band in taxation. I also welcome the fact that we appear to be moving towards using the 20 per cent. rate only as an allowance. That is sensible. It will give greater justification for that rate ultimately to become the standard rate. That does not necessarily mean that I think that taxation should be reduced; I merely believe that it is a better balance of the tax structure. It will benefit the Treasury if allowances are set off at the 20 per cent. rate rather than 25 per cent. So people will benefit from the level of taxation and the Treasury will benefit from the fact that allowances are not as generous.

Many of the Budget's measures should be welcomed. Britain has a considerable problem. Our balance of trade deficit is worrying at this stage of the cycle, given our propensity to import. Our European export markets are going into or are already in recession, at a time when we are most likely to be selling to them. That has an adverse effect on us, because British manufacturers are more likely to believe that they can increase prices in the domestic market rather than in export markets. Again, we shall have to watch that from a domestic inflationary point of view.

Although we have relaxed full funding to a small extent, our PSBR will lead to high long-term interest rates and the Government will have to fund the deficit. That is why I am concerned about the revenue-raising side of the Budget. If the PSBR for a full year is £50 billion, with interest rates on gilts at 8 per cent., the Government will accumulate an additional £4 billion debt and debts are cumulative. The net effect, therefore, of postponing revenue raising for a year means that it starts at a higher level than otherwise would apply. We must keep a close check on that.

I hope that the Budget restores confidence in the Government's long-term strategy. I hope that it encourages unemployed people to believe that we are endeavouring to help them, and a large portion of the Budget offers assistance to industry. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where?"] Opposition Members should not shout "Where?" when they know that Governments do not create jobs out of a hat. Governments create jobs by giving other people the opportunity to expand. Unless industry flourishes, there is no long-term hope for those who are unemployed.

That is why one of the longest sections of the Budget speech targeted help on industry, which I welcome. I may have said that the Budget was wrong to be neutral, but it is neutral because tax raising is being retargeted on industry. I hope that industry realises that it has been highlighted for particular assistance this year and I hope that the CBI, the Association of British Chambers of Commerce and the Institute of Directors will pay tribute to the Chancellor for listening to some of their requests. It is up to British industry to create the job opportunities to which we aspire and, if my judgment of the effects of monetary policy is right, the economy will probably recover slightly faster than some of the pessimistic forecasts suggest.

I would not have raised our involvement with the European Community if it had not been mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Worcestershire, South and for Stafford (Mr. Cash). This is a very serious matter because all our efforts to get our economy going and to emphasise the competitive instincts of British industry and the British economy could be put out of joint if we do not make further progress on the Maastricht treaty. I have a copy of a letter dated 15 March from the Association of British Chambers of Commerce to the Prime Minister, which was released to the press. Its chairman states that it represents 240,000 businesses and that "those who suggest that we have gone far enough with the Single European Act are making a mistake that British businesses cannot afford . . . Any continuing uncertainty or delay as regards UK ratification can only undermine business confidence, which will in turn endanger economic recovery . . . Against this background we urge you to press ahead with the ratification process which has our full support."

The association represents the 240,000 businesses that were targeted today in the Budget. Through their national chairman, they have addressed the problem that will arise if Britain appears to isolate itself within the European Community, appears to downgrade the importance of inward investment and appears to leave other people to determine the rules of the club to which we belong and of the single market, of which we are important members.

I appeal to Opposition Members to join the vast majority in the House, as was shown on Second Reading, who understand the importance of creating jobs and assisting British industry to damn well get on with ratifying the Maastricht treaty as soon as possible.

8.47 pm

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): I understand the comments of the hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) about the need for a strategy, on which I shall comment myself, although I am not sure that I will agree with him on some aspects.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about inward investment. I have visited Japan several times seeking inward investment on behalf of a number of companies in the Yorkshire and Humberside region, and I have never met a company that did not see us in the context of the European Community. Our active membership of the Community is undoubtedly important to them.

The working conditions of most Japanese companies are far better than those proposed in the social chapter. I find it hard to believe that companies that have been attracted to Yorkshire would have been put off by the social chapter. One of the unions that negotiated an agreement with Pioneer in Wakefield said that, if it could secure the same agreement for each of the companies with which it is involved, workers in almost every British firm would be a good deal better off. Conservative Members make many false points about the dangers of the social chapter to inward investment. I therefore agree with the hon. Member for Esher about the significance of our membership of the Community.

I found the strategy employed in the Budget, so far as we got a glimpse of it, very threatening. It threatens many low-paid workers. It will increase their taxes now, in April 1994 and in April 1995. I listened to the Chancellor for 112 minutes, waiting for ideas to deal with the scale of our unemployment and with the real fear about the future of our economy. Labour Members are not anxious to see a continual decline in the economy. We are anxious to see recovery and to ensure that measures are being taken to bring about recovery. I saw some ideas which will have some effect, but I did not see those ideas that I believe will get the economy moving forward. I do not see this, I am afraid, as a Budget for jobs, even though it was boosted as such in advance.

I was in some agreement with the hon. Member for Esher on the very curious way in which the Chancellor, in an oblique—sometimes, indeed, in a direct—fashion, referred to black Wednesday. He did not label it with an adjective, but he was referring to that day. One had the impression that he was very much on the side of those who believed that it was golden Wednesday, because he gave all sorts of illustrations of its benefits to the Government and the Government's financial planning. He did not refer, as did the hon. Member for Esher, to the downside of that day.

I remember the way that we moved up to that Wednesday, the statements made in advance and the statements made immediately afterwards when the House met on 24 September, and I contrast them with the way in which the Chancellor today used those events as having enabled him to turn around aspects of the economy. I felt that we were talking about Government by accident, and that is a matter of considerable concern.

One aspect of the Budget is not an accident; that is the way in which, in terms of its strategy and the need to raise money, the Budget is focused. I believe that it is focused on raising funds from ordinary families in this country, and that can be illustrated very easily.

There is in this Budget a tax reduction in terms of the 20 per cent. band that is in reality a tax increase. None of us would pretend that national insurance contributions are not a form of direct taxation. One of the points made by many hon. Members before the general election was that national insurance contributions were a form of taxation, and they wished then to treat them as such. We are right to treat them as such now.

What benefits do people get from the 20 per cent. band changes? They are described as 50p a week and, by April 1994, £1 a week. However, allowing for the fact that people might have expected allowances in line with inflation, I believe that they will be worth only 84p a week in April 1994 to the average family. The increase in national insurance contributions, on the other hand, will cost the average family £3 a week. That is a staggering difference between what is presented to us as a benefit and what is, in reality, a penalty. There is no doubt that the increase of 1 per cent. is in effect a 1 per cent. tax increase and will have the effect on the average family of an increase of £3 a week.

The hon. Member for Esher said that he was quite happy about the imposition of value added tax on domestic fuel. I think that it is an appalling decision. Interestingly, none of the letters that I received from constituents before the Budget referred to that, although they referred to many other aspects. For instance, there was much lobbying mail on the subject of VAT on newspapers and books, and I am very glad that there is not to be that tax on information. We also had a great deal of propaganda and pleas about VAT on public transport, and I am glad that that is not to be imposed; it would clearly be nonsense.

Why did we not get a great deal of correspondence on the subject of VAT on domestic fuel and power? It was because people were not looking for it, and they were not looking for it because, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition made quite clear, it was a matter on which the Government had been absolutely specific prior to the general election. They said specifically that fuel would not be subject to VAT and that there would not be changes to VAT. That is why we were not lobbied on this issue. This shows that people placed completely unjustified trust in the Government. They believed what the Government said before the election about VAT on domestic fuel, but VAT has been applied; and the cost to the average family, when the full 17·5 per cent. VAT is applied to domestic fuel, will be over £2 a week.

[Mr. John Gunnell]

Then we have to take into account the mortgage changes. The Chancellor made it clear that we are talking about £10 a month, or £120 a year, which is another £2·31 a week for the average family. We also have to take into account the freezing of the married couple's allowance and the fact that it is not to go up with inflation as has been traditional for much of the past. That amounts to another about £1·80 per family per week.

If we add all these figures together, we find that the average family in this country will be £8, or a bit more, worse off as a result of this Budget.

So who will be paying for the fact that the Chancellor is rightly concerned about the £50 billion of debt? It seems to me that it will be principally ordinary families in this country. Therefore we should be very concerned about these taxes.

I will put a question to the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell), since he is here, about VAT on fuel. There has been a lot of controversy about standing charges and whether they benefit or disadvantage pensioners. I have sent pensioners in my constituency the erudite letters which the Library has on this, stating that it can be argued that standing charges are no handicap to the worse off, but help them. But people still feel that they should not be paying standing charges. I should like to know whether VAT will have to be paid not only on the cost of the fuel that is used but also on the standing charges. We are entitled to an answer to that question.

I have been, and am, involved a lot in Yorkshire Enterprise, which is a regional venture capital company. We work with financial institutions which operate the loan guarantee scheme. I have said in the past that I would like to see changes to that scheme. Some of the changes that are made are to be welcomed, but the job has not been completed; it has been half done. It is right to extend the small firms loan guarantee scheme over a larger range and to make it possible for the borrowings to be higher than £100,000, and I am glad to see that limit extended to £250,000. I am glad to see the changes with regard to interest rates, making it possible for a smaller margin to exist between the base rate and the rate at which these loans are made.

I am glad that there has been an increase in the guarantee, because we found that institutions do not want to operate the scheme, as their position is so uncertain at the moment. They do not want to take the 30 per cent. risk, so I am glad that it has been reduced to 15 per cent. and that 85 per cent. of the amount is to be underwritten. Will there be takers as a result of the changes? Will a small firms loan guarantee scheme have a better effect?

To carry out investment appraisal properly—whether we are talking about lending a company £100,000 or far more—one must employ the same due diligence to ensure that the management of the company involved are capable of managing the company successfully, that the business plan is sound and that there is a market for its goods and services. In other words, one must ensure that the company is viable and that it is safe to lend it the money. The amount of work involved is not directly proportional to the size of the loan. An enormous amount of due diligence is involved even when dealing with small loans of £100,000.

One of the proposals by David McMeekin of the Midland bank, who has taken some responsibility for the Midland enterprise fund which operates in Yorkshire and Humberside, is that, if we want investment appraisal, which enables the small firms loan guarantee scheme to work, to take place, the companies carrying out the investigations should get tax relief on the costs of those investigations. The costs are usually extremely high in relation to the amount of the loan. That change has not been made. One can give a partial welcome to some of these loan guarantee scheme changes in the Budget, but I wish that the job had been done more thoroughly.

It is unusual for the Chancellor's speech to be the occasion for a major announcement on the channel tunnel. Many of us have followed the progress of the tunnel for many years, and have been concerned to ensure that its benefits are national and not confined to London and the south-east. Those of us who have been concerned about northern links to the tunnel expected any announcements about the tunnel to be made in a national context. It should be made clear that any decisions about routeing, stations and termini in London are enormously important for links to the north.

We wish to ensure that there are through passenger and freight trains on the west coast main line and the east coast main line direct to the channel tunnel. The decision announced today clearly means that there has been a change of plan. We are forced to ask what will happen to the King's Cross Railways (No. 2) Bill. We have been promised links to the north. I have received promises from successive Secretaries of State for Transport and from successive Ministers for Public Transport, including the right hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo), who is now the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman and I appeared on so many platforms together talking about the channel tunnel that he called us part of a travelling circus. In answer to our questions, he always said that there would be links to the north. It is the Government's responsibility to ensure that there are. It is very disturbing to hear about changes to the King's Cross scheme, for which we have planned for a long time, being announced in anything other than the full context.

Investment matters to the north for the regeneration of industry. All the Japanese companies interested in investing in Yorkshire ask questions about our links with the channel tunnel. They may prefer to use the Humber ports, but they still ask about the tunnel. We need to be assured that, in any transport changes announced, curiously, in the Budget, the interests of the north are taken care of. It is important that the announcement is clarified.

We must recognise that the Budget means choosing where the money is coming from because of this country's enormous debt. In my view, the costs have been imposed to an inordinate extent on ordinary families, in the same callous way that the 13½ per cent. increase in prescription charges was announced last night. There have been mistakes in the Budget, which will cost families in my constituency dear, and which will, in the end, cost the Government dear.

9.4 pm

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I am happy to follow the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell), and I should like to focus on two points on which I directly agree with him. The first is his earlier reference to the experience he had had in Japan of finding all those companies and other organisations that were interested in development in Britain, linking us with their expectation of our being full members of the European Community. That was a practical example, for the benefit of the House, of the importance of getting on with Maastricht and continuing to play a full role in Europe.

The second point is on the hon. Gentleman's final remarks about the channel tunnel. I have an interest in the tunnel from the point of view of the south-east, but I have argued from the beginning that it was of key importance that the tunnel and the rail link should bring benefits, not just to London and the south-east but also to the north of England. I agree with the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South that planning on the tunnel, which has been seriously delayed, should continue to take account of the importance of the north of England and the links to the north right through Europe via the tunnel.

The hon. Member referred to the iniquities of the increased charges for national insurance, but if one accepts that national insurance is a fund and that it is currently in deficit it seems to me not to be wrong for the Chancellor to take steps to try to correct that.

The Budget speech was long, detailed and highly technical. I pay tribute to the consultation which the Chancellor and his team of Ministers has carried out with hon. Members of his party. That was well done. One of the reasons that the Budget has been well received by our party is that prior consultation. That has not always happened. It is happening more effectively now, and that is beneficial.

The Chancellor had a difficult task, both in personal terms and in dealing with the economic problems of the country in this Budget. The Budget is being well received because it addresses the two key issues of the economy: first, the essential need for growth now; and, secondly, in the medium term, the need to minimise the Budget deficit. It was those two factors which the Chancellor had to try to keep in balance, and he has done that effectively.

I welcome the focus on industry, just as I welcome the Prime Minister's recent emphasis on the importance of manufacturing. That is not before time. I welcome the measures to help business because there is a positive story to tell on the record of British business which has not always been getting the headlines that it should. I welcome the measures that have been taken on employment, and I say yet again that the level of unemployment is unacceptable to me as it is to many other hon. Members on these Benches. We in no way play down the human and family cost, and the cost to the country, of unemployment, but, as other speakers have said, the argument is about how, in the longer term, one can overcome that problem.

I welcome the measures on infrastructure projects and joint ventures. I will say something later about that and about my views on the imposition of VAT on road fuel duty and on fuel and power.

I want to say something more about the background of this Budget and the help it gives to business. The Budget assists recovery by not increasing taxes overall on business in 1993-94. It makes recovery sustainable by laying out a strategy to reduce Government borrowing over the next three years. It increases revenue without raising income tax rates. To have done otherwise would have dampened incentive, and I am relieved that such dampening has not occurred.

The Budget raises revenue and, by increasing taxes on fuel and power, takes the Government two-thirds of the way forward on Britain's Rio commitments on the environment. That is essential because sooner or later we would have had to move on that front. We have been unreasonably criticised for not giving enough priority to environmental issues. If Labour Members claim that we have been wrong to take those measures, what steps would they have taken, bearing in mind their support for the Rio agreement?

The Chancellor has been right to address the problem of excessive borrowing because we could not in the long term allow large borrowings to continue without action being taken. Being something of a Keynesian, I have always accepted that during a recession it is permissible to allow the PSBR to rise. It is, in any event, inevitable because much of the deficit goes to support the unemployed and those in greatest difficulty as a result of the recession.

In trying to take a balanced approach, the Chancellor has given advance warning of the revenue increases that are to be made. It is important to keep the money markets satisfied that the Government have a medium and longer-term strategy to bring fiscal rectitude back into the Budget. We have seen the benefits of doing that, and I do not want them to be lost. Equally, in contrast to my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), I believe that it would have been wrong to move on personal income tax at this stage in the recovery.

The industrial picture is good. Retail price inflation has been below the EC average since August 1991, putting us in a better competitive position. Interest rates are the lowest in the EC and the lowest in Britain for 15 years. Productivity growth at the end of last year was the fastest for five years. The transformation of industrial relations is history, but it has made a significant difference to what British industrial managers can now achieve. They can concentrate on design and marketing without always having to look over their shoulders, fearing the need to put out a bush fire, as it were, in their factories.

We would like to see more being done in the Budget about employment, but we cannot spend our way into full employment by way of Government expenditure. We must set the framework for business to create new jobs. With the continuing trend of increased technology in large industry, increased employment will come from smaller businesses, not just service businesses but smaller companies springing up to meet the demands of a buoyant economy. The new community action programme is welcome, as is the business start-up scheme and the pilot schemes to encourage employers to engage the long-term unemployed.

This Budget provides a clear strategy. After black Wednesday, and for the weeks until the autumn statement, the Government were continually under fire for having no replacement for their strategy of membership of the ERM. I was not one of those who foresaw the damage that membership of the ERM could do when our economy was unable effectively to compete with the high interest rates of Germany, but I am now wise after the event. I do not believe that we should return to that arrangement in the foreseeable future as it would be highly dangerous.

[Mr. Mark Wolfson]

British business has felt the benefit of the freedom in which we have been able to operate since we left the ERM. The turning point for me was the focus in the autumn statement on growth rather than on merely keeping down inflation.

I was exremely glad that the Chancellor made clear his priorities after the autumn statement. He is now following through the autumn statement with further measures focusing strongly on help to business, particularly small business. He has also demonstrated that he has a policy to ensure that Government borrowing will not spin out of control. I hope that we shall have lower interest rates as soon as possible, but I understand the difficulties and the necessity of balancing various Government measures on taxation and budget deficit while still paying some attention to the standing of the pound. We should not lightly throw away the benefits that followed the freeing of the restraints of the ERM which had become extremely damaging.

My final point concerns the infrastructure projects, in particular the channel tunnel high-speed rail link. I take some satisfaction from the fact that I have argued from the beginning, when very few hon. Members in my party argued that way, that it would be necessary for Government money to be invested in the high-speed rail link. The Chancellor told us that today for the first time. He did not give us details of the route. The fact that the route would be announced shortly was no news for those of us who have been involved in channel tunnel discussions for the past four or five years and who have gone through hell in our constituencies because of that worrying problem. The news today was the Government's clear commitment to put up some of the money in a joint venture. That is right, and I welcome it.

9.17 pm

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I shall make my speech in the first day's debate on the Budget in a slightly different order from the one I had originally intended because I want to question the Minister on one or two issues on which I did not fully understand the Government's position.

I do not necessarily agree that mortgage tax relief needs to be abolished, but I accept that it needs to be addressed and considered. I hope that the Minister can assure us that today's announcement of its reduction to 20 per cent. is not the first step to phasing it out completely.

The Government must be prepared to consider in a positive way whether the present tax relief on mortgages is the best way to use the considerable amount of money involved. I am not arguing that the money should be used to help people who are renting property, but I am not certain that the way in which tax relief is given to people buying property is the most appropriate method as the people who are most in need do not necessarily get the tax relief. We all know that the present MIRAS system was an extension of the option mortgage scheme that was introduced by the 1964-70 Labour Government.

I welcome the increase in charitable giving through the payroll system which should be encouraged. The Minister will be aware that there has been overwhelming pressure from both sides of the House in favour of changing the system of charging VAT on charities. Outside the House, there is widespread concern over the way that certain moneys are drawn off charities through the VAT system. Among all the announcements that the Chancellor made about VAT, I did not hear anything to address that problem.

Another aspect is important to football supporters. I have a vested interest here as I support Burnley, and have done for many years, and am anxious to learn whether it has won tonight's game; I should have been at Turf Moor watching the team play. Under a concession, money from the football pools went to the Football Trust to allow ground improvements to be made to meet the Taylor report recommendations on safety. Many clubs that want to make those improvements—Burnley is one of them—are dependent on getting sufficient grant to enable them to do so. We want to know whether those arrangements will be extended so that the Football Trust can receive that money for a further period.

The Budget speech lasted for an hour and 50 minutes. The Chancellor called it neutral, but in my view it was a long-drawn-out tinkering Budget that will achieve little or nothing. With, on the Government's figures, 3 million unemployed, and probably in reality 4 million, it is a scandal for the Government to introduce a neutral Budget. Many people will feel that the Government have failed them. With 14 years in office, the Government have had time to lay the foundations for industrial and economic recovery. I am glad that, at least, it was not called a Budget for jobs. We have had several of those over the past 14 years, but unemployment has remained unacceptably high.

In many other Budget debates, I have spoken about the north-south divide, which is a major problem. Tonight, the Government are narrowing that divide, but are narrowing it in the wrong direction. Rather than improving the situation in the north, they are making the situation in the south worse and increasing unemployment there.

I visited Aldershot a couple of weeks ago and went around the town centre. I was amazed to see the number of shops that have closed as a result of the recession. A new town centre has been developed, with a new precinct and a second phase in the Wellington centre. Not a single unit has been let; all are boarded up. Next to it, there is a new shopping arcade, which has been built for a fair while, with only two units let. People do not realise that because the shop fronts have been painted and it looks as though there is a florist, a hairdressers and other shops. Tory economic policy is failing, and that is a sad reflection of it.

It took the Chancellor an hour and 37 minutes to get around to announcing any measures to tackle unemployment. He spoke of 100,000 jobs. He said that he wanted to get 10,000 people into businesses and job-start schemes at a time when we have the highest-ever rate of bankruptcies and people going out of business. We all support the objective, but it only scratches the surface of that major problem. He wants 60,000 to go into the community action programme with a scheme of payment of benefit plus £10 a week. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) highlighted the problem for such people, who will have to pay for fares and meals out. Who will be attracted by benefit plus £10 to go into community action? What nonsense that is.

The voluntary sector is being asked to launch the scheme, yet in the deprived areas—the 57 urban programme authorities—urban programme money has been axed and the voluntary sector has been squeezed.

Difficulties are increasing. In my constituency, not only have we lost £2 million in urban programme money, but we bid for one urban partnership scheme—that is the new scheme for which the Government are asking councils to bid—the Government turned it down, although it would have created 500 jobs. Four of our seven schemes were successful, but one that would have created 500 jobs was turned down, not because it was a bad scheme but because there was a ceiling of £20 million for all the authorities in the country.

The Chancellor highlighted at the outset the type of speech that he intended to make when he said that the Government would never sign the social chapter. The Government's failure to accept the social chapter shows that they believe that we are a second-class nation. They are not prepared to have wage councils or a national minimum wage, and they say that the other 11 countries can have the social chapter but it will never apply to this country. That is an absolute disgrace.

In so many places in this country manufacturing industry is hanging on by its fingertips. There was nothing in the Budget to encourage sufficient investment in training. What a waste of assets, when so many people are not contributing to the economy because they are unemployed. There were no tax incentives for industry to invest more in new equipment and machinery, or in research and development on a bigger scale. Research and development is going away from this country. It is no good simply having Japanese and other investment in this country—although we all welcome it. We want research and development to be carried out in this country, because we want to be at the sharp end, at the forefront of high technology and new industries.

Several tax increases were announced in the Budget. There was a tax on domestic heating and other energy—first 8 per cent. and then 17·5 per cent. I have constituents who cannot afford to run their heating or to put the gas fire on at weekends, because they do not have enough money. The Government fail to recognise how many people suffer from real poverty in Britain after 14 years of Tory rule. It is a sad reflection. Let them go round London—and all our other cities—now and see the people begging on the streets. That is the scandal and disgrace of Britain after 14 years of Tory rule.

The personal tax allowance is being frozen. That is another tax increase. National insurance contributions are to rise by 1 per cent. from April 1994. That is yet another tax increase—and it comes from a Government who were pledged not to increase taxes.

Towards the end of his speech the Chancellor referred to the fast rail link to Heathrow as if it were something new. But it is a regurgitated scheme. Yes, we need it badly—we should have had it years ago. Anyone who travels to Heathrow realises that the Piccadilly line is totally insufficient to cope with the number of people who use the airport. The crossrail link, too, has been regurgitated after 14 years. We are not against it; it is much needed—but it is long overdue.

As the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) said, at last the Government have realised that they must invest in the channel tunnel rail link to St. Pancras, and that it cannot be built by the private sector alone. But on the other side of the channel, in Calais, the rail link is nearly open and the new motorways are there. After 14 years of Tory rule we are still not ready for the channel tunnel.

The Tory Government have created a trade deficit of £17·5 billion this year. The public sector borrowing requirement is £35 billion this year and will be £50 billion next year. As the hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) said, the Government intend to review spending. We know what spending reviews and "better targeting" mean. They always mean cuts—and it is always the deprived and poorer sections of the community who suffer from the cuts.

We want the Government to say that councils can use their capital receipts in a sensible and phased manner to build council houses. That would get the economy moving in the right direction. It would get construction workers back to work; people would be making windows, doors and other such things; people moving house would buy curtains and carpets. That would start things moving in the right direction. The Government's dogma will not allow them to recognise the way in which they could tackle the housing problem and the economy at the same time.

Today's Budget was the last Budget to be presented separate from the announcement of the Government's expenditure plans. The two will be combined later this year. Time after time, the Government have revealed in their expenditure plans the sums from the sale of assets that they will use to supplement their spending. What will the Government do when there are no more assets to sell?

We know that the Government propose to bring forward the sale of the final part of British Telecom and to sell it this year. The Government can also sell sections of National Power and PowerGen. In theory, they can sell Nuclear Electric. However, once those assets have gone, the Government will be in a cleft stick. They will either have to savage their expenditure or raise taxes. The only other route is to get the economy moving in the right direction and so achieve growth. After 14 years of Tory government, I do not believe that we will ever see that.

9.30 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): At such a crucial stage in our economic fortunes, the most important judgment that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and his team had to make in drawing up today's announcement was to assess the macro-economic context in which today's Budget has been set. At the end of several years of recession, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had to ask himself whether it was right to stimulate demand further or whether, in anticipation of a recovery that may already be under way, it was more prudent to claw back some of the borrowing that he had already undertaken.

To appreciate the importance of that judgment, we must appreciate the historic structural problems that have beset the United Kingdom economy since the war. Since 1946, we seem to have failed to escape from the stop-go cycle of economic activity. Whenever it has moved from stop to go, all our economic activity contained a bias towards housing and property rather than towards long-term investment in industry. We have lacked long-term finance in industry and those structural problems have for ever drawn us downwards.

I hope that the House will allow me to flash back in history and refer to the late 1980s. As a new, green and perhaps naive young Member of Parliament, I am still able to admit that the Government are capable of making an occasional mistake. In the time available to me, I want to analyse that mistake.

[Mr. Alan Duncan]

At a crucial stage in the economy's cycle, we needed to raise interest rates. However, because that crucial decision was about to be made in the aftermath of the 1987 stock market crash, we did not take the necessary steps to raise interest rates then for fear of the slump that some predicted might follow. Indeed, that coincided with a complete surreptitious change of policy which many people did not realise was taking place: we shadowed the deutschmark and forsook monetary indicators as our guide and discipline in favour of an exchange rate regime.

When it dawned on her that it was happening, the then Prime Minister, now Baroness Thatcher, wanted to increase interest rates. However, she did not do that because the political circumstances then raging in the House made it almost impossible for her to work with her then Chancellor and take the necessary steps.

We are now paying the price for Baroness Thatcher's failure to take that decision. What followed was an enormous expansion of credit. For the benefit of some our critics on the Opposition Benches, I should add that that was not caused by the decision to lower the rate of personal income tax. It occurred because monetary discipline was allowed to slip. The banks wantonly allowed people to borrow something like four times their incomes. People mortgaged up. Businesses borrowed. We built a mountain of debt which individuals and companies alike are still paying off now. We were also consumed by an infectious mood which suggested that the boom would go on for ever and perhaps even that the business cycle had once and for all been abolished. But, of course, it did not.

Something else happened, too. We joined the exchange rate mechnism of the European monetary system in October 1990. In my view, the rate at which we joined did not particularly matter. A one-off adjustment could have amended that. Indeed, I am not pathologically opposed to the exchange rate mechanism so long as it remains an adjustable system. We faced the unfortunate coincidence that Germany was reunited. Instead of showing the fiscal discipline which had dominated European economies in the decades before, Germany dramatically increased its borrowing as a result of that unification and had to adopt a high interest regime within its domestic economic management.

When we later wanted our rate of interest to fall, our links within the exchange rate mechanism kept it high. Something else happened too. We converted an adjustable exchange rate mechanism into a fixed parity system. We believed that if we were courageous we could vest in the pound sterling the qualities, discipline and strength of the deutschmark. But it was ill-judged to believe that we had the economic muscle to sustain such a fixed parity against the deutschmark. Therefore, I fear, we created our fault lines in the exchange rate mechanism and treated it in a way which invariably led to its collapse.

Some claim that the exchange rate mechanism brought down inflation. In many ways it did, but I contend that any regime of ultra high interest rates would have brought down inflation and that the exchange rate mechanism also contained some dramatic qualities which were to the detriment of our economc management and exacerbated our economic ills at the time. The ERM is not an independent discipline, as people hoped that it would be. It repoliticised, and we made it do so even more, every movement in the exchange rate and put the focus of attention on the Chancellor of the Exchequer. An independent discipline would have removed such attention if it had been working properly.

Our short experience of the fixed parity system, with the divergent economies which were evident at the time, showed how domestic economic management can become a perverted exercise in regional policy. It showed how economic and political control is sacrificed when there is a single currency. As you may have rumbled by now, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am against a single currency. Indeed, I believe that the imposition, although not necessarily the evolution, of a single currency is the ultimate socialist measure.

So where are we now? I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), who has left the Chamber for a moment, that we are emerging from the recession at long last. Indeed, in the same way as we thought that the boom would last for ever, we are perhaps too prone to the feeling that the recession might last for ever, too.

The challenge which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor addressed in today's Budget is not to repeat yesterday's errors. Instead he has taken a long-term view, as I would have wished him to do. If the cycle has not been abolished, as indeed it has not, the recovery will come inevitably, but it is as well to nurture it in the best interests of everyone in Britain.

I judge the PSBR to be dangerously high. The risks that we face in keeping it that high over several years are that we shall go straight back to the cycle of stop and go and go and stop. What we do not want is the creation of artificial demand, leading to an artificial recovery. If we were tempted to adopt such a course, we would merely suck in imports, creating illusory jobs that would soon disappear. We would return to the stop-go cycle: whenever we stopped again, the recession would become even worse and we would build an even larger deficit on our balance of trade.

The overriding guidance offered by today's Budget is that fiscal rectitude is of the utmost importance. If we borrowed excessively over a number of years, we would succeed only in increasing the interest rate; that, I think, would be the most disastrous possible event in regard to recovery. If we are to create long-term jobs rather than jobs built on yet another burden of Government debt, we must take long-term advantage of low inflation nurtured by the present Government and of the competitive exchange rate that now allows us to export. As well as reducing the public sector borrowing requirement, we must reduce expectations. Promises of excessive growth will not be met; they will simply provide an artificial path leading to the return of economic collapse.

At dawn today, I was in favour of reducing the PSBR —immediately, even, and by billions of pounds. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor, however, has before him many facts and figures that I do not possess. I note that my right hon. Friend has decided to allow the PSBR to remain more or less neutral this year. He has the figures and I accept what he has done. He also announced that, in 1994-95, the PSBR will be reduced by £6·5 billion and that it will be reduced by a further £10·5 billion in 1995-96. We should bear it in mind that, by then, the Treasury will be enjoying improved revenues from the tax take. Furthermore, my right hon. Friend has committed himself to putting the PSBR back into balance in the medium term. I believe that we should applaud that schedule for restoring fiscal rectitude: my right hon. Friend has made the responsible decision that we need.

I am delighted that my right hon. Friend has clarified the workings of petroleum revenue tax. Contrary to the opinion of many Opposition Members, the money that we have gained from the remarkable enterprise displayed by those who found oil in the North sea has not been squandered. If Opposition Members wish to say that spending on schools, hospitals and the needy is squandering our oil revenues, let them say it as loudly as they wish; the fact is, however, that the use of those revenues, and the stewardship of the economy, has been thoroughly responsible. The regime announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will ensure that further investment takes place in the North sea and that we continue to experience flows of oil—and, indeed, tax—to the benefit of the Exchequer.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend has improved the conditions relating to export credit guarantees, which he improved once before in the autumn statement. I am also pleased that he has tightened the little loopholes in the business expansion scheme, which enabled it to be used to provide loans; that is long overdue.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) criticised my right hon. Friend for doing nothing about research and development. The reforms announced by my right hon. Friend in relation to advance corporation tax, however, are crucial to ensuring that large companies choose the United Kingdom for their headquarters and opt to carry out research and development here. The hon. Gentleman cannot claim that my right hon. Friend has done nothing for research and development.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said that companies should no longer purchase other companies in order to cash in on their recorded capital loss. That announcement marks the long-overdue closure of a loophole. For those business men at present eligible to pay VAT, my right hon. Friend has raised the threshold to £37,600, which will be of particular advantage to small businesses up and down the land. It will remove the necessity for such businesses to have to fill in a quarterly VAT form.

One Opposition Member has today criticised my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for alleviating some of the capital gains tax provisions for those who want to sell a company. What could be more beneficial to the economy now than for someone who has been successful in one enterprise to be able to dispose of that on a fair basis of his taxable obligations, start again in another company and make a success out of that? How on earth can anyone see fit to denigrate that sensible measure?

I was also particularly pleased that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced that those who conduct a business in the purchase and sale of bloodstock may now register for VAT. It is a tribute to the energy of many hon. Members, notably my hon. Friends the Members for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) and for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring), and to my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, that such a sensible agreement has now been reached to alter the tax regime for that industry, which would otherwise be facing blight.

I am sure that everyone in the House would also want to pay tribute to the late Judith Chaplin, who quietly but diligently worked behind the scenes with great energy to ensure that the issue was properly understood in the Treasury. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General can attest to that by citing many examples of when she went to see him to argue the case for those affected by the VAT provision. Her death was sad and she will be sorely missed in the House. Those who knew her well in Newbury will not forget the work that she did on their behalf.

To return to my original theme of the structural deficiencies in the economy, I welcome what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has done to improve some of the structural distortions. I am pleased that he has changed the regime of mortgage interest relief so that it is given only at the 20 per cent. rate. I was also pleased that he improved both the scope and the size of the small company loan guarantee scheme for fixed rate finance. I think that that will turn out to be a major step to ensure that long-term finance is available for small and medium-sized businesses. He announced an export guarantee scheme and today announced a domestic credit guarantee scheme, which is to be applauded.

All those proposals sit in dramatic contrast to everything that we heard from the Opposition. We have heard the incantation of platitudes about creating jobs, making promises and the insufficient support given to the constituency of Hackney, but we have not heard from the Opposition a single positive detailed policy for economic recovery which they think that they could run with and present to the electorate. Nothing that the Opposition have said has been costed—it was all words, words and no detail. In addition, they even promised not to raise taxes. They make promises that add up to billions of pounds, but somehow believe that those billions will appear from thin air. They are not prepared to show any integrity and state by what means they intend to raise those billions from the economy.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): No doubt, like me, my hon. Friend has been to the Library to see the Labour party proposals on the subject. No doubt, like me, he was shocked to find that nowhere in those proposals—which are designed to advise constituencies on what they should be doing to help employment—is it suggested that the workers in Labour party constituencies might start a business. Nowhere do they suggest that they might take advantage of the extension of the Government's loan guarantee scheme, which my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) so eloquently supported tonight.

Mr. Duncan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Opposition Members do much intoning about business, but it turns out that every step they take destroys business. The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) has complained that there are no businesses in Hackney. With the local authority that Hackney has, it is not surprising that business men do not wish to go there. I openly and readily accept the hon. Lady's kind invitation to visit Hackney with her. She is not present at the moment, but I can assure the House that, when I go, I shall tell her a thing or two. I hope that she will learn what could be done in Hackney to improve employment prospects and restore the economy of that sad constituency.

Labour Members have criticised the decision to levy VAT in a staged manner on domestic fuel. This attitude sits ill with the Opposition's repeated contention that there should be a carbon tax and that the Government should adopt policies that Labour Members would describe as green. They say that they want green policies, yet they do not want to pay the cost of environmental improvements. They must unravel their inconsistency. I await an announcement from them of measures to link green policies with tax policies to secure their implementation.

In conclusion, I offer my congratulations to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his team. My right hon. Friend continues to have my vigorous support. Indeed, I look forward to his stepping out of No. 11 Downing street on his way to the House to present his fourth Budget in November.

9.51 pm

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) is all heart. My withers were wrung by his speech about financial rectitude and structural efficiency. He really is all passion for England. It is a shame that his speech developed as it did, as he started off quite well. Having dealt with 1946, he embarked upon the story of the decline of the economy. The trouble is that he jumped from 1946 to 1988-89—a very swift transition. I should like, in the few minutes available to me, to fill in some of the history.

Let us look first at what happened in the 1970s. Under successive Governments, including those of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir Edward Heath), Lord Wilson of Rievaulx and Lord Callaghan, oil prices gave rise to tremendous difficulties. Lord Wilson and Lord Callaghan had to deal also with the Barber boom—a mistake which, as has just been said by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, was repeated by Lord Lawson. Let us take into account the real world difficulties that existed at that time and the fact that there were none of the advantages of the tax from oil that the current Government have enjoyed and the huge sums of money that were generated by privatisation—illegal gains, in my view, but, none the less, moneys that came to the Government. I use the plural "moneys" advisedly, in its true Oxford English Dictionary sense.

What use have the Government made of those moneys from the point of view of long-term employment? The record of 14 years of Conservative rule is one of constantly rising unemployment. The north has always been hit because the Government care very little about what happens outside the south-east. The south-east is where the strength is, where the power comes from and where the snouts are.

I would not sit complacently on the Government Front Bench after today's Budget. If a private company had gone for a contract, had put forward a prospectus and had spoken about that prospectus in the way the Government spoke about their manifesto at the general election and then produced today's Budget, they would have been called fraudsters and hucksters. That is what the Government are.

No matter what claims they make about VAT on energy, the Conservatives said clearly during the election campaign that there would be no rise in those taxes, "Trust us," they said; we heard from a soapbox the equivalent of "Read my lips." The majority of the people did not trust them, but enough trusted them to put them in power. They trusted the statement that there would not be an increase in taxes. Yet today we have a record increase. The Government have turned round the old saying, "Jam tomorrow but no jam today." It is a case of, "You will not suffer today but, by God, you will suffer tomorrow and even more the year after."

There are other ways of controlling pollution, as Conservative Members know if they have an atom of sense. To put VAT on fuel bills in the way proposed by the Government is outrageous. It will hit the poorest section of the community. The tragedy is that this passes for the Government's energy policy. We have been beseeching them for a long time to produce an energy policy. Suddenly they come up with one—to slap 17·5 per cent. VAT on energy costs.

The Government have challenged us. While they have been clinging to strange little ring-o'-roses arguments about the ERM and all the factions in the Conservative party have been giving different interpretations, I will tell them what they should have been doing. They should have been putting forward in the European Community a policy for energy. The Commission has produced a paper and the subject has been talked about in the European Parliament. There is no parliamentary report on it. What response has been made by our Government? Their only response is to try to put 31 pits out of existence. That is a disgrace.

In the short time left, I should like to refer to a gross failure of the Government in the case of Grimethorpe colliery. As we have been telling the President of the Board of Trade since last October, that colliery was making a considerable profit up to the time that it was closed. On closure the industrial firms that it supplied were nearly put out of business. They had to find alternative supplies and pay more for imported coal.

A report was published yesterday; actually, it came out a considerable time ago but, as with everything with the Government, it was kept secret until the last minute. In clear, unequivocal terms the Government's own specialist said that Grimethorpe has a long-term future and can make a profit because there are customers for it. Why do not the Government reopen it instantly? What is the grand strategy that means that pits like Grimethorpe should close? The Government's only strategy is laissez-faire. That is no strategy in these days. It is not the sort of strategy adopted by the Japanese. The Government are fond of talking about the Japanese, so we should see how they conduct their capitalist system. They have a partnership between the capitalist institutions, the trade unions and the state under which they proceed sensibly in the long term.

My final point is about the heedless way in which the King's Cross announcement was made. For my part of Yorkshire, the rejection of King's Cross was an absolute disaster. For Port Wakefield, to which the Government have given their permission and backing, it was appalling. The Government must reconsider their decision, otherwise it will lead not to sudden death but to strangulation by degrees.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Billy Harris

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

10 pm

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Less than 24 hours ago, Grampian Television broadcast a TV special called "The Open (and Shut) Case" on the as yet unexplained death of Billy Harris in Glasgow on the evening of 3 August 1989. The programme was produced by Michael Mulford, who, with Billy's family in Dundee, has spent the past three years painstakingly and determinedly pursuing the truth about what happened to Billy that night.

The Minister, like me, has benefited from seeing the Grampian TV special and from discussing the case directly with Michael Mulford. I am sure that I speak for both of us when I place on record our heartfelt thanks to Grampian Television and to Michael Mulford, but above all to Benny and Marie Harris and their family, without whose courage and unfailing determination the search for the truth about what happened to Billy would have been abandoned long ago.

What little do we know about the truth of what happened to Billy? We know that he died of severe head injuries. We know that his body was found in National Bank lane, Glasgow. We know that his body was first seen on the night of 3 August but not officially found or reported until the morning of 4 August. In all honesty, after that we know very little with any certainty.

Billy's case has variously been described by the authorities as murder, potential murder, suspicious and an accident. Naturally, the family have been totally bewildered by such official inconsistency and confusion —and no no wonder, given what they have been told by the authorities.

Will the Minister confirm that Strathclyde police initially passed a message to Tayside police within hours of Billy's death, which read:

"William John Harris had this morning been found dead in a lane in city centre of Glasgow. He apparently had head wounds. No money or other valuables in his possession. Locus where he was found known for assault and robbery of homosexuals. Case is being treated as a murder inquiry although the post mortem came up with nothing helpful."

I should be grateful if the Minister would confirm that Strathclyde police passed that message to Tayside police, who in turn passed it on to the family.

In a letter dated 23 May 1990, the then Lord Advocate, Lord Fraser, wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) indicating that the case in its early stages was being treated as "a potential murder". Will the Minister confirm that that was so in the early stages of the case?

The Crown Office, in various letters, has repeatedly referred to the case as "suspicious". Would the Minister say whether it still takes that view?

Strathclyde police have told the family on two occasions that it believes that Billy's death was an accident. On the first occasion, Detective Chief Inspector Val Gryzbeck telephoned Billy's mum in November 1989 to tell her that in his view it was an accident.

On the second occasion, in March 1990, two Strathclyde officers visited the Harris home in Dundee. An account of what they said was shown on the Grampian TV special, in which Billy's dad described how an officer explained to him how the accident came about. The officer described how Billy, who at the time had a blood alcohol count of 345 mg/ml and was very drunk, was supposed to have fallen back four or five times on to the same stairs, hitting his head in the same way.

The Minister has seen the programme and will remember how Billy's dad described the way in which the officer described the accident to him; how Billy fell over once, then twice, then three times, then four times, then a fifth time. The officer thought that it was on the fifth occasion that Billy sustained the injury that caused his death.

Does the Minister really believe that version of an accident? Does he not agree that a man as drunk as Billy was would have done well to stand up at all, never mind repeat four or five times a fall which even once would have rendered a sober man unconscious? Is it not a much more credible explanation that we are dealing with a murder, not with an accident?

How does the Minister explain the changes in the police view of how Billy died? They first of all tell Tayside police that it is a murder inquiry. They then interview potential witnesses in the local pubs in the Glasgow area, explaining that they are investigating a murder. Then, suddenly, the accident theory begins to emerge. Can the Minister suggest any reason why this should be so?

For example, the annual report for 1989 by Strathclyde's chief constable reads:

"The reduction in murder inquiries I welcomed in my last report was not sustained in 1989, with 63 murders and culpable homicides investigated, nine more than in 1988. This increase inevitably strained investigative resources, and it is therefore of considerable satisfaction that a 100 per cent. clear-up rate was achieved."

That is fine, but will the Minister therefore confirm that the official view now is that Billy's death in 1989 was neither murder nor culpable homicide, but an accident?

Detectives who investigated the case put it to the family at an early stage that Billy was homosexual. They produced no evidence whatsoever to support this allegation, which naturally shocked the family, who continue to reject this allegation. They point out that Billy was living with his girl friend, Elizabeth Lees, in Clydebank at the time of his death. Elizabeth Lees has called into question the accuracy of police judgments by confirming that on one occasion she and Billy were at home watching television when the police claimed that Billy was seen in Glasgow.

Billy was not known to the gay community who were interviewed by television researchers. There is simply no factual evidence to support the allegation of homosexuality. So will the Minister reveal whether the post mortem showed any evidence of homosexual activity? Did it show either anal or penile damage? Does the Minister not agree with the family's lawyer, Bob Vaughan, and with Carole Ewart, director of the Scottish Council for Civil Liberties, who say that the investigation could have been sidetracked unnecessarily by unsubstantiated allegations of homosexuality?

Where is the police evidence that Billy was homosexual? Will the Minister give the sources for this evidence? The family are prepared to face the truth about Billy, but they cannot be expected to tolerate unsubstantiated allegations about their son and their brother, particularly when those allegations come from the official authorities.

Then there is the suspect who was questioned at an early stage of the inquiries. This suspect was identified by a Mr. Gary Hall, a doorman at the Maison Guy's pub in

[Mr. John McAllion]

Glasgow. He refused entry to Billy and another man at 9.45 pm on 3 August because Billy was drunk. He described the other man as 6 ft 2 in tall and of substantial build. This man has been traced by the programme makers, but they have not named him, in the interests of justice and fair play, and I agree with them.

The suspect was picked out in a police identification parade. He was remembered by witnesses because of his unusual dress on that evening of 3 August. He wore a grey suit with trousers and jacket that did not match, a tee-shirt and trainers. Gary Hall, who is an ex-soldier and a trained observer, had no problem whatsoever in remembering this suspect, because of the distinctive way in which he was dressed. Gary's sighting of the suspect with Billy was just one hour before, and 500 yards distant from, the first sighting of Billy's body in National Bank lane.

A number of questions arise out of those circumstances. Was the suspect interviewed under caution by the police? If so, for how long? Why was the suspect never charged, and did the alibi provided by the suspect's wife and male friend bear up under police examination? Is it still the Crown's position that Gary Hall was simply completely wrong in his identification of the suspect with Billy Harris on the evening of 3 August in Glasgow?

The Grampian researchers have now handed to the police and to the procurator fiscal evidence which casts doubt on the suspect's alibi. Will the Minister acknowledge that Grampian Television and Michael Mulford have acted with commendable responsibility by not publicising the evidence, and by allowing the authorities the time and opportunity to follow it up? Will the Minister say what progress the authorities have made in following up the evidence? Have the suspect, his wife and his male friend been re-interviewed? It would be very good to have such facts on the public record.

I should like to comment on the evidence of Dr. Jim Thorpe of Strathclyde university, who carried out an independent forensic examination of Billy's clothes at the request of Grampian Television. He discovered that Billy had been injured in one location and was then helped by someone else along the road to another location. He found bloodstains on the inside of Billy's jacket pocket and elsewhere on Billy's clothes. He concluded that death could have resulted from an accident if someone who was being half-carried had slumped to the ground several times. However, I shall quote from the transcript of the television special. On the record, he said

"it is of course possible that the injuries were inflicted deliberately—whoever was with Billy banged his head off the ground in pure exasperation at no longer being able to support this dead drunk person and inflicting more severe injuries than were intended. Of course I cannot exclude the possibility that the injuries were intended to kill."

Will the Minister say what the Crown concluded after examining the evidence found in National Bank lane on 3 August 1989?

Of course, we might have understood much more if the family could have been given access to the post mortem report, which so far has been denied them. Their lawyer, Bob Vaughan, made arrangements through the procurator fiscal and the Crown Office to precognose Dr. John Clarke, the pathologist who examined Billy's body. Airline tickets were booked to travel south to see Dr. Clark. Mr. Vaughan was practically on his way when the Crown Office banned the interview.

Will the Minister say why the Crown Office banned the interview? What secrets could justify the withholding of post mortem results from the family? Do the family not have a right to know what the post mortem results were? What were the results of the forensic tests carried out on Billy's clothes and on the suspect's clothes? Are they also to remain secret for ever?

The family have asked me to raise a serious matter relating to their interview with Mr. Tom Dysart, senior depute fiscal in Glasgow, on 8 March 1990. The family understood Mr. Dysart to have told them that the pathologist believed that Billy had been murdered, that Billy's injuries were consistent with having his head banged on the steps, that Billy was known to have frequented gay bars, that that information was confidential, and that, if they revealed it to anyone else, it would be said officially that Billy had died from an accident and the case would be closed.

Subsequent to that interview, the family granted an interview to a Sunday newspaper—they believe that it was the Sunday Mail—and, two weeks later, two Strathclyde officers appeared in Dundee to tell the family that, in the view of the police, Billy's death resulted from an accident. Was a minute kept of the meeting between the senior depute fiscal and the Harris family in Glasgow on 8 March 1990? Will the Minister make that minute public so that we know what happened at that meeting?

The family's campaign for a fatal accident inquiry has been consistently resisted by the authorities. The Crown Office has taken the view that an inquiry would substantially prejudice any future criminal proceedings, but is that credible when the police have twice claimed that Billy died as the result of an accident?

Is it credible when the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board refused compensation only last month to the Harris family because their Queen's counsel was not satisfied, on the evidence available, that the deceased Billy Harris was the victim of a crime of violence? Is it credible, three and a half years after the event, with no sign of consistent police inquiries or an arrest on the horizon, to continue to resist the family's call for a fatal accident inquiry?

The Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976 allows the fiscal to hold a fatal accident inquiry if a death is sudden, suspicious or unexplained, or gives rise to serious public concern. Surely the Minister will concede that Billy Harris's death meets every one of those criteria and that surely there should now, at the very least, be an announcement by the Minister that the procurator fiscal is prepared to hold a fatal accident inquiry into the events of 3 August 1989.

May I raise one or two other concerns? Does the Minister agree with Carole Ewart, the director of the Scottish Council for Civil Liberties, who says that the system has simply failed the Harris family, and who has now called for an independent inquiry into the whole criminal justice system in Scotland? Why was it that the present procurator fiscal banned Strathclyde police from appearing on the Grampian Television programme about Billy's death, when the police were prepared to consider appearing?

Why was it that Billy's body was kept for 42 days in Glasgow mortuary at temperatures that allowed his body to decompose, so that, when it was finally released, Billy's family were not allowed to see it and Billy Harris was buried in a disinfected body bag? Experts have said that the practice when keeping bodies at such temperatures is to do so for only three to four days at the most. Why was the body kept in Glasgow mortuary at those temperatures, not for three to four days, but for 42 days? I think that an explanation and an apology are due to the family for that.

It matters not what is said about the kind of man that Billy Harris was. He was, after all, a human being, who deserved to be treated with the same dignity as every other human being. Certainly, after his death, the authorities seem to be more concerned to defame him than to find out what happened to him. Both he and his family deserve better from those same authorities. If he died by accident, we need a fatal accident inquiry to explain how he died. If he did not die from an accident, we need a murder inquiry to find out who did it, why he did it and how.

Above all, his family cannot be left in their present state of uncertainty. They have contemplated exhuming their son's body in an attempt to discover the truth of what happened. They have decided not to erect a headstone on his grave until they know the truth about their son. All this tragic family want to know is the truth of what happened to Billy Harris. I appeal to the Minister to listen to them and to help them in any way he can, and to allow them at last to be able to lay their son Billy Harris finally to rest, and in peace.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I note the suggestion by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) that a fatal accident inquiry should now be held, and I shall pass that suggestion to my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate.

I thank the hon. Member for passing to me the video of Grampian Television's documentary this morning. I have studied it twice and with great care. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the clear and careful way in which he outlined the sad circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Harris. I would ask the hon. Member to convey my sympathy to the Harris family.

I welcome the opportunity provided by this debate to respond to the points raised by the hon. Member, as this has obviously been a source of grave concern to the family. For Mr. and Mrs. Harris to lose their son at an early age in such distressing circumstances must, of course, have been very upsetting for them. The hon. Member has outlined in some detail the events immediately preceding the discovery of his body in Glasgow city centre in the early hours of 4 August 1989, as well as certain developments that have taken place since then. In particular, the hon. Member raised the question of the timetable for the release of Mr. Harris's body to the family for burial, as well as the question of the storage of his body at the city mortuary. I shall deal first with that matter.

By way of background, I should explain that it is, and has always been, the police view that this is a potential murder case. I fully recognise Mr. and Mrs. Harris's concern about the delay. The hon. Gentleman will bear in mind the fact that the case was, and still is, being treated as a potential murder, so the body had to be retained for a reasonable period pending the possible arrest of any person or persons in connection with the death.

As the House may know, any person accused of murder in Scotland is entitled to have an examination of the victim's body carried out by an independent pathologist, so the body cannot be released until an independent autopsy has been conducted, or the accused indicates that he does not wish to instruct independent examination. In this case, the police inquiry did not identify any person as responsible for the death of Mr. Harris, although a man was interviewed under caution and inquiries have been on-going. In those circumstances, Mr. Harris's body was kept in the city mortuary for some six weeks, until the procurator fiscal instructed its release to the family on 7 September.

Members of the family have had the benefit of two full meetings with the senior procurator fiscal depute in Glasgow, Mr. Dysart, who dealt with the matter. At the first of those meetings, Mr. and Mrs. Harris explained that, when their son's body was released to them, the undertaker had refused to allow them to see the body because of its decomposed state. It was suggested to them that they should invite the undertaker to write to the procurator fiscal with further details about the matter so that he might pursue the issue with those responsible for the storage of bodies at the city mortuary.

The Lord Advocate has responded, making it clear that, while the retention of a body pending criminal investigations is subject to the procurator fiscal's direction, the question of the means of storage of bodies is not something for which the procurator fiscal is responsible. That matter is at the sole discretion of the mortuary staff.

I should perhaps reinforce the position by repeating what the Lord Advocate said to the hon. Gentleman, who wrote to him. He said that Dr. McLay, the chief medical officer of Strathclyde police, responsible for the mortuary, wrote to the solicitors acting on behalf of the Harris family in March explaining what had occurred. He also wrote to the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. McLay explained that Mr. Harris's body had been stored in non-deep freeze conditions because of the expectation that further examination would become necessary. In the event, such further examination was unnecessary. Dr. McLay frankly conceded that it was regrettable that the manner of storage led to certain decomposition of the body. He offered personally to meet the family to discuss matters, but, as the hon. Gentleman may know, that offer was not taken up. I am not aware that any reason for that has been given, but in view of the serious complaint that has been made, I will pass it to the chief constable for his personal consideration.

In addition, the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) also wrote on behalf of the family to my right hon. Friend about the circumstances surrounding the death, and received a detailed reply. Following his untimely death, Mr. Harris's body was discovered by a young man, who immediately alerted the police. That was at about 5 o'clock in the morning of 4 August 1989. Subsequent inquiries revealed that a young couple had seen a body lying where Mr. Harris was ultimately found at about 11 o'clock the previous evening, but they had not reported the matter to the police. That fact was pointed out to the hon. Member for Dundee, West.

A casualty doctor was summoned to the scene, and Mr. Harris was pronounced dead. In accordance with normal practice at suspicious deaths, a senior member of the procurator fiscal's office was summoned to the scene, along with a pathologist and a forensic scientist. Serious crime officers were also in attendance, and a detailed examination of the scene, at which a series of photographs was taken, was completed. Mr. Harris's body was then removed to the mortuary, where an autopsy was carried out.

As the hon. Gentleman will know, following the post mortem examination, the pathologist concluded that injuries to the back of the head were the major factor in Mr. Harris's death, although they were exacerbated by the high level of alcohol in his system. In due course, the family were informed of the causes certified on the death certificate.

The case was treated as a murder inquiry from the outset, and a full investigation was launched under the charge of a senior detective officer. A thorough investigation of the circumstances surrounding the death of Mr. Harris was carried out by the police, which included interviewing a number of witnesses who either knew Mr. Harris or associated with him, including those in whose company he had last been seen alive.

Members of the Harris family were also interviewed to try to build up the fullest possible picture of Mr. Harris and the events which preceded his death. For reasons which will become obvious, it will not be appropriate for me to go into great detail as to what those inquiries revealed, or to name all the witnesses that were interviewed. Following the inquiries, a detailed report was submitted by the police to the fiscal's office in Glasgow.

In accordance with normal practice, after the procurator fiscal's office had carried out its own inquiries —liaising closely with the police—a full report was submitted to the Crown Office for the instructions of Crown counsel. On the basis of the information contained in the procurator fiscal's report, Crown counsel took the view that it was not appropriate to instruct a fatal accident inquiry into the circumstances surrounding Mr. Harris's death. As the hon. Member will appreciate, no one has been identified as being responsible for causing the injuries from which Mr. Harris died. However, the possibility remains that a person may yet be arrested in connection with the death and, accordingly, public disclosure of all the facts could very well prejudice any future criminal proceedings.

Mr. McAllion: Does the Minister accept that a precedent exists in the case of Mr. Sandy Drummond of Fife, who died in suspicious circumstances? The case became a murder inquiry, yet the procurator fiscal allowed a fatal accident inquiry to go ahead, and that opened up new lines of evidence that helped the murder inquiry.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes, it is indeed a precedent, but the circumstances are not exactly the same. However, as I said, I shall pass on the hon. Gentleman's request to my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate, and it will then be a matter for him.

I should make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that, at the meeting between Mr. Dysart and the family, the fiscal explained the position to Mr. Harris's parents. It is quite misleading to suggest that Mr. and Mrs. Harris have somehow been denied information by the authorities.

Turning to the police investigation, inquiries revealed that Mr. Harris had been drinking in bars in the Glasgow city centre on the evening before his body was found. He was last seen at about 9.45 pm on Thursday 3 August in 1989 in the company of another man, at which time they were refused entry to a public house which has been frequented by homosexuals.

The question whether the deceased was homosexual was a possibility to which the police felt they had to have regard, but there is no conclusive evidence either way. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's question as to whether there is any evidence from the post mortem suggesting any homosexuality, the answer is that there is none.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether a minute was kept of the meeting between Mr. and Mrs. Harris and Mr. Dysart. The answer is that there was no minute.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the terms of the post mortem report, but these are being treated as part of the evidence of the case. Given that the case is an on-going criminal inquiry, it was considered that it would have been wrong to divulge all aspects of the evidence.

As I have mentioned, the body was found in the yard behind the premises of John Smith's book shop in St. Vincent street, Glasgow at about 5 am on Friday 4 August. Mr. Harris had sustained severe head injuries, which, as I have said, were the major factor in his death. He had an extremely high level of alcohol in his blood and the pathologists were of the view that this would have worsened the effects of the head injuries and would have been a contributory factor to his death. What I think needs to be emphasised particularly is that it cannot be said at present with any certainty how William Harris sustained the injuries from which he died.

I must stress that the investigation into the death of William Harris is still open. The hon. Gentleman referred to the television programme, which I have studied. I understand that it appeared to be critical of the fact that no one had been charged. The reason for that is clear and simple; there is insufficient evidence to bring charges. I have made it clear that a suspect was interviewed under caution. In addition, the programme claimed that the Harris family may have been misled by the authorities and unfairly denied a fatal accident inquiry, and that this somehow adds to the notion that certain important details about their son's death have been kept from them.

The Harris family received a very high degree of understanding and co-operation from the authorities, not least from the police and the fiscal's office. The family continue to demand an inquiry and remain critical of the police handling of the investigation. I have to say that the programme contained little new information which is not already known to the police. No words of comfort can undo what happened, but I believe that this debate has served to highlight the fact that the case has, regrettably, not been cleared up.

William Harris's death is undoubtedly suspicious and must therefore remain a cause for serious concern. For that reason, this is a case which is still open, and I will pass on the hon. Gentleman's main request——

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Pit Closures

1. Mr. Barron: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce the future of the 31 coal mines currently in his review,

9. Mr. Janner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on his proposals concerning the closure of 31 pits.

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Heseltine): The future of individual pits is a matter for British Coal. The House will be aware that extensive discussions and negotiations are continuing to be held by the parties concerned. The Government will publish a White Paper on the prospects for 21 pits identified for closure by British Coal. The Boyd's report on the remaining 10 pits currently subject to a consultation process between British Coal and the unions was placed in the Library of the House on Monday 15 March. British Coal has today announced that the existing redundancy terms have been extended to the end of December this year.

Mr. Barron: Why will miners and their families in my constituency have to wait until the end of March or even until April for the Government's view, when we had the view of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry in January this year? Is not it the case, as was shown in the disgraceful speech by the right hon. Gentleman last Tuesday, that the Government have no intention of doing what the House and the country wanted them to do last October—that is, to save the British coal industry?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman should feel that what I said, which merely repeated some of the Select Committee's recommendations, was disgraceful. I thought that I was helping the House by explaining that in the case of the interconnector, the legal obstacles to breaking the contract appear to be insurmountable. I thought that the House would wish to have that information. It is right that I should give the House the clearest possible picture about the position as quickly as possible. To do that requires that contracts should be in place in an ideal way. I have no powers to make people sign contracts.

Mr. Janner: Has the right hon. Gentleman read the unanimous report of the Employment Select Committee on the proposed pit closures and, in particular, the Committee's recommendation that before deciding to close any pit, the Government and British Coal should take into account the financial circumstances of that pit, the social consequences of the closure and the national consequences of unloading people into unemployment? Will the Minister undertake to bear those points in mind before deciding to close any of the threatened pits?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. and learned Gentleman can be assured that the report by the Employment Select Committee will be carefully considered—indeed, it is already being carefully considered by the Government. We shall reply to that and to the many other submissions that we have received in the context of the White Paper.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the coal industry has a vital part to play in a long-term, integrated energy strategy? Does he accept that the manufacturing and engineering companies associated with coal are a vital part of our manufacturing base and one of its more successful parts in terms of exports? Will he take all those matters into account before he announces to the House that there are to be any pit closures? This industry is vital to the country in the long term.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend will realise that one of the commonest requests from the manufacturing base is that it should have cheap energy costs. He will also know that other parts of the energy industry are among our more vibrant manufacturing sectors. The uncomfortable fact is that one has to make a balanced judgment about the extent to which subsidising one industry or imposing costs on another actually advances the interests of the manufacturing base. That is the range of decisions that the Government have to reach.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my right hon. Friend accept that we are grateful that he sent the Minister for Energy to France to negotiate with and talk to the French about the interconnector, which was an important element in the deliberations of the Select Committee of which I am a Member? Can he tell us what progress he has been able to make with France?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is most kind. We have had extensive conversations and my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy visited Paris to carry on those discussions. The House will be aware that I explained in a recent debate that the legal advice—a summary of which I shall publish for the benefit of the House—is that the contract, first approved by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), is not one that allows me discretion in these matters. In those circumstances, although I have to explore every conceivable opportunity, I do not anticipate that I shall be able to come back to the House with news that significantly improves on that which I have brought to the House already—although I have to say that there has been a relatively small but positive step since I spoke to the House.

Mr. Skinner: Why does not the President of the Board of Trade admit that there is no subsidy for British Coal and has not been since 1988 and that he is wrong when he talks about a £1 billion pound subsidy, as we are talking about the consumers, not about the taxpayers?

Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that in the Boyd's report, to which he referred, the financial costs of each of the 10 collieries has been calculated on the first six months alone, when anyone who works in the pits—including management—acknowledges that, because the first six months includes nearly all the holiday period and the second six months is the period during which pits make profits? That applies to every pit in Britain, not just to the 10.

Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind the fact that what miners are concerned about is saving British taxpayers' money? If 100,000 people are thrown on the scrap heap, that is equivalent to £900 million, to be paid for by a diminishing number of taxpayers. If the right hon. Gentleman saves the pits, saves the dole money and allows the miners to pay national insurance and tax, the net result will be that the Chancellor will not have to introduce his value added tax measure.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will know that I appointed Boyd's as a result of what I thought was the clear indication of the courts that that would be a positive suggestion. Therefore, I acted on the very—[Interruption.] I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman is ever satisfied about anything.

Mr. Skinner: Not with you.

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Heseltine: This is a matter of the greatest importance to the House and it is important that I should be able to answer the questions thoroughly and carefully without interruptions that disrupt the flow of my answer. I am happy to treat Labour Members as they treat the House, but it will not help us to have an informed debate on the coal industry—if that is what they want.

Lord Justice Glidewell indicated that I might be able to make a positive contribution towards the consultation between British Coal and the unions if I appointed Boyd's, an internationally reputed engineering consultancy firm, to provide an independent element in the consultative process. That is what I did. The Boyd's report was made available to the House the other day and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on it as it is part of the consultative process that is now taking place between British Coal and the unions. That is where I must let the matter stand.

The hon. Gentleman raises the much wider but equally important issue of the degree of subsidy for British Coal.

Mr. Skinner: There is none.

Mr. Heseltine: Perhaps I may explain what I mean by the element of subsidy——

Mr. Skinner: There is none.

Madam Speaker: Order. Sedentary interventions and barracking are not helpful to our discussion of what is, to all our minds, a crucial issue.

Mr. Heseltine: Under the contract between the electricity generating industry and British Coal, entered into some three years ago, the price that British Coal currently receives for 65 million tonnes of coal is £1 billion a year more than the world price of coal would imply. That is the degree to which the prices of British coal are in excess of what could be purchased at world market prices. The hon. Gentleman says that there is no question of subsidy, but he will be aware that the Select Committee, which looked into the matter with great care, suggested that a subsidy which could be calculated broadly at £500 million would be a significant policy advance, if I were to make it.

Mr. Batiste: Is not the real long-term problem for the coal industry, as the energy industry is presently structured, that it can sell coal to only a small number of generators? Would not it make a great deal more sense in the longer term if the coalfields and coal-fired power stations were put together so that coal could compete for electricity generation? Is not it time to refer the whole matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend asks an important question, but he will also recognise that my first political priority on becoming President of the Board of Trade was to facilitate the process whereby the generators entered into new contracts with British Coal to replace the contracts that will run out on 31 March—just a few days' time. It seemed to me that, rather than looking at alternative policies, the first priority was to see whether those base contracts could be put in place. I have to tell the House that, as I stand here today, those contracts are not in place. Therefore, from the end of this month, there will be no contracts between British Coal and the generators. I was assured in meetings that I had yesterday that there was a reasonable chance that that position would be significantly improved in the next few days.

Mr. Robin Cook: Does the President recall that last October he told us that the closure announcement could not be put off for one week until Parliament returned because of the need to put miners out of their uncertainty? What does he think that the week after week of delay in producing his White paper has done for uncertainty among miners? What is the point of criticising British Coal and the generators for not yet signing a contract if he cannot yet produce a White Paper? In view of the extended time taken by his energy review, has the right hon. Gentleman yet found the time to visit a single pit on the list for closure? Should not he see for himself the investment at those pits before he closes them down?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman knows that the issues with which I am grappling are equally dealt with by my presence where the people who can enter into contracts with British Coal are to be found—that is, within the negotiating operations that I am conducting. It does not change my position or give me any additional legal powers to have visited a particular pit. In so far as the law allows me, I have encouraged the processes of negotiation to produce contracts. But as of this moment, the contracts are not signed. Until they are signed, it seems inappropriate to come to the House with a White Paper. The only consequence of doing that would be that people would say, "Go away and come back again when contracts have been entered into." So there is no point in trying to debate the issues until we know something of the basis on which the future is to be determined.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Will my right hon. Friend give a commitment that when he assesses the country's future energy requirements, full consideration will be given to the levels of investment and employment in the North sea oil and gas sector, especially in Scotland, where fewer than 1,500 people are involved in deep mining but more than 97,000 people are involved in oil and gas extraction?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend raises one of the most important aspects of the debate—one on which, as I explained to the House recently, the Select Committee has made an important contribution. The Committee has recommended that we do not interfere with the oil and gas industry for many reasons, but most importantly because it is at the heart of one of our most successful manufacturing sectors.

Scott Inquiry

2. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what evidence he has given to the Scott inquiry.

Mr. Heseltine: My Department has supplied all the documents requested by Lord Justice Scott. They amount to more than 10,000 pages.

Mr. Dalyell: To help informed debate, could the President of the Board of Trade tell the House of Commons whether he has admitted to Lord Justice Scott that, when he put pen to his signature on the public immunity certificate, that could have sent Matrix Churchill directors to prison, he knew perfectly well that Paul Henderson had been supplying intelligence information to the British Government?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Member will know that Lord Justice Scott is examining those matters and that, if he considers it appropriate, he will examine whatever I did or said at the time. I am content to await his further good advice.

Assisted Areas

3. Mr. Madel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to change the boundaries of travel-to-work areas as they relate to calculations for dividing areas of the country which might be granted assisted area status; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): Designating new travel-to-work areas based on 1991 census data is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. As indicated in the consultation document for the review, travel-to-work areas will continue to be the main geographical unit used in making decisions on the new assisted areas map.

Mr. Madel: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the present boundaries of travel-to-work areas do not properly show up the acute unemployment problems in Dunstable, following the devastating loss of truck jobs in the town? May I urge upon him that the TTWA boundaries should be quickly redrawn and that Dunstable should be granted assisted area status so that we can be helped out of our acute unemployment problems?

Mr. Sainsbury: I understand my hon. Friend's concern because Dunstable and his constituency form the top left-hand corner of a rather large travel-to-work area which stretches from south of Watford to north of Luton. However, those TTWAs, based on 1981 census data, are the best approximation that we have on self-contained employment areas and we shall not have better information until the 1991 census data are available, which is not expected to be until late 1994 or possibly early 1995.

Mr. Eastham: For years, the travel-to-work area formula has distorted the true position and many major cities, especially inner city areas, are lumped together with suburbia miles away, which gives a distorted picture of unemployment. In many cities, including Manchester, unemployment is three times the figure given by the formula relating to the area.

Mr. Sainsbury: I can understand that sometimes an area that has, or appears to have, a local high level of unemployment resents being associated with another place in the same travel-to-work area which has lower unemployment, but there is a good deal of movement to work and that is the basis on which the TTWAs are assessed. They represent an area where approximately three quarters of the people who live there also work in the area. That is the best approximation that we have for a self-contained area, and help directed to that area will help the people who live and work there.

One-stop Shops

4. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to see the first of the one-stop shops open for business; and what is his timetable for opening a one-stop shop in the Dover and Deal area.

Mr. Heseltine: I expect the first one-stop shops to open for business by the summer. In this year's competition a bid was received from Kent which was not shortlisted for interview. A further round of bids will be invited in the autumn for centres opening in 1994-95. I hope that a bid will come forward that includes the Dover and Deal area.

Mr. Shaw: My right hon. Friend will be aware that small businesses offer the greatest opportunity for bringing us out of the recession, for recovery and for creating many new jobs. My right hon. Friend should not hide his light under a bushel or be a shrinking violet by ceasing to promote the opportunities that one-stop shops can bring about to help small businesses to generate the recovery that the country needs. May I commend to him the fact that the Dover area will undergo considerable change as a result of the channel tunnel and the single European market and that a one-stop shop based in Dover would be most welcome? I hope that he will ensure that his officials do everything possible to enable a proposal to be put forward and accepted for the Dover and Deal area.

Mr. Heseltine: I realise that my hon. Friend has noticed that it is my customary reticence which turns me into a blushing violet. I will have to improve my outlook. Challenged by him to do so, let me congratulate and support my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on producing a Budget full of good news for small businesses, including help on the uniform business rate, capital gains tax, the small firms loan guarantee scheme, the business start-up scheme, exports, the simple scale charge for business bands, the deregulation initiative, simplified taxation and the auditing of small companies. Yesterday was a very good day for small businesses.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Why is it that the President of the Board of Trade announced on 10 July 1992 that his one-stop shop scheme would forge ahead when, eight months later—after 11 months in office and after 14 years of Conservative government—not one shop has opened but his policies have closed tens of thousands of shops?

Mr. Heseltine: With characteristic zeal, the hon. Member ignores the fact that 400,000 small businesses started up last year.

Japan

6. Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will indicate the current annual level of exports to, and imports from, the empire of Japan; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Richard Needham): The United Kingdom's exports to Japan in 1992 were £2,230 million. United Kingdom imports from Japan in 1992 were £7,450 million. Our exports to Japan increased rapidly in the late 1980s. They have held up well in the past two years despite difficult economic conditions in Japan.

Mr. Dunn: Is the Minister aware that in certain sections of British industry there is a view that the Government of the empire of Japan erect unfair obstacles to prevent British goods from gaining entry to Japanese markets? Will he undertake to tell the imperial Government that unless they permit easier access for British goods to Japanese markets we may have to reconsider our position on the entry of Japanese goods to this country?

Mr. Needham: I hear what my hon. Friend says about the imperial Government. A very large number of Japanese investments in this country are now contributing to the British balance of payments in a much greater way than any other country's investments, with the possible exception of the United States. My hon. Friend is right to say that there are still barriers to our exports to Japan. One of the reasons for my visit to Japan last week was to raise those matters with the Japanese Government and demand that the remaining trade barriers come down.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister agree that one of the most successful products of British industry in the past 25 years was the transputer, the computer on a chip, which was exported to Japan very successfully? It will continue to be exported from the end of this year, but from France and Italy because their Governments have invested in the transputer. It will no longer be produced in Britain because our Govermnment have refused to invest in it. Why is that?

Mr. Needham: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's comments. He knows perfectly well that decisions made by companies are up to them, not the Government. Our technological collaboration with Japan is closer and has more depth to it than that of any other European country and has already had a major effect on the quality of research, development and production in this country.

Mr. Bill Walker: Has my hon. Friend noticed the massive imports coming from Japan, which seems to have achieved that despite the fact that it is not a member of the European Community? Will he explain how this possibility has come about and what he expects will change when the Maastricht treaty is concluded, if it ever is?

Mr. Needham: It is not the possibility of Japanese imports; it is the reality of them. One of the major reasons for that is the quality of the goods that it produces. The counter to that argument is the ever-increasing number of Japanese companies that have set up in business here and are now doing so much to improve the quality of our manufacturing base.

It is vital that we continue to attract and invite Japanese companies to invest in this country. It would be a great help in achieving that objective if, when we take missions to Japan, Opposition Members did not pull out, on the orders of their Chief Whip, two days before we are due to leave. The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) was told by her Chief Whip that she could not go to Japan, even though we were pairing, which made it impossible for us, on a cross-party basis, to offer support for Japanese investment in this country and explain our role in Europe. That was an absolute disgrace.

Pit Closures

7. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met representatives of the engineering industry to discuss the implications of the pit closure programme.

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): I and officials in the Department have had regular contact with the mining engineering industry in the context of possible changes in the requirement for mining equipment and machinery. I shall be meeting representatives again as soon as practical after the White Paper is published to have further discussions on specific proposals for helping the industry.

Mr. Hinchliffe: The Minister will recall that I have raised with him on a number of occasions the specific problems facing the mining engineering sector in Wakefield in my constituency. Is he aware that the current proposal for the Swedish company, ABB, to build a green power station in the Wakefield district would offer hope for the future of the three remaining pits in the Wakefield district and the mining engineering sector in my constituency and elsewhere? Can he offer Government support for that project in view of its importance, particularly in the light of the major difficulties facing the Wakefield region as a result of the Government's energy policies?

Mr. Eggar: I was aware of the ABB proposals and other proposals in the district. They are being considered in the context of the White Paper review.

Dr. Michael Clark: Does my hon. Friend recognise that, due to our historic and successful coal industry, we have many companies which, in engineering terms, are market leaders in coal technology, particularly clean coal technology for power stations, long-wall mining, hydraulic supports and underground conveyor systems? Does he recognise that, if the coal industry is to contract and the home base to diminish, it will be harder for such companies to trade abroad and export? Therefore, will he undertake to give whatever help and assistance his Department can to those companies so that they may stay in business, export and help our balance of payments?

Mr. Eggar: The answer is yes, yes and yes.

Mr. Orme: Is the Minister aware that representations were made to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on the very points just raised by the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark)? When will the Government issue the White Paper as its delay is having a disastrous effect on the mining industry?

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade addressed that issue in answer to earlier questions. We are aware of the need to proceed as rapidly as possible, but we cannot proceed until we have finished the difficult negotiating process—in particular until contracts have been concluded for the supply of coal to the generating industry. There are no contracts currently available and if contracts are not in place by 31 March, theoretically no coal can be supplied by British Coal to the generators.

Mr. Riddick: Does my hon. Friend agree that Mr. Arthur Scargill and his fellow members of the National Union of Mineworkers executive must be out of their tiny minds to recommend strike action to their members now? Does he agree that such action will do nothing to help the mining equipment industry and will confirm in the minds of some people working in the power generation industry the need for a diversity of supply? Has not Mr. Scargill shot himself in the foot once again?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend addresses a serious issue. If the country feels that there should be support for the coal mining industry, that industry and the miners must earn that support. The result of what Mr. Scargill has said has been to reduce the confidence that coal can be relied on as a secure source of power generation, which cannot be in the interests of the miners and cannot promote coal as one of a diverse range of sources of electricity generation.

Mr. O'Neill: Is the Minister aware that any contraction of the coal industry will, as my hon. Friends have pointed out, have an impact right across British engineering and, in turn, have a great effect on those existing on unemployment benefit? Is he further aware that, according to the Institute of Fiscal Studies, the effect of the introduction of VAT on domestic fuel will be three times as harsh on the poorest families, many more of whom will be unemployed as a result of his dithering over the coal industry? Will he take steps to ensure that families who will be unemployed for a long time to come are protected against the worst excesses of yesterday's announcement of VAT on domestic fuel charges?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman talks about jobs and, in particular, about the mining industry. He surely now understands that to save jobs in the mining industry and to increase electricity generation by the use of coal can only be at the cost of the loss of jobs in the gas-related industries, in the nuclear industry or in some other area. He must stop peddling the idea, or trying to get across the point, that it is somehow possible to expand jobs in the coal industry without any costs being incurred elsewhere in the economy. That is not reality; he knows it and the Select Committee recognised that to be the case.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my hon. Friend recognise that as we are to have a substantial coal-burning energy policy, it is essential that it is backed by proper research? The Coal Research Establishment is in my constituency. Will my hon. Friend congratulate that body on having just won major contracts in Taiwan and Kazakhstan, and it is about to be awarded a third major contract? Will he also congratulate that establishment for doing a thoroughly good job in the research work that it undertakes?

Mr. Eggar: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing a delegation from the CRE to see me earlier this week. I was impressed by the success that it has had in gaining contracts internationally. My right hon. Friend and I will of course take into account the points that my hon. Friend and the delegation made when we produce our White Paper.

Shipbuilding

8. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to meet the European Commission to discuss the future of shipbuilding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have no plans to meet the Commission at present, but shipbuilding will be on the agenda at the informal Industry Council meeting in Denmark which I shall be attending later this week.

Mr. Campbell: Why are the British Government unable to help our shipbuilding industry when the Germans are able to help theirs? Or are the circumstances the same as coal, which can be subsidised in Germany but apparently cannot be subsidised here?

Mr. Sainsbury: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is aware of the Communitywide rules affecting aid to shipbuilding. Our agreement with the Commission forbids the paying of subsidy to companies that were privatised as warship builders.

Mrs. Currie: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there are a number of industries, including shipbuilding, that have been dramatically affected by changes in defence requirements and that that includes the aerospace industry in areas such as Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire? [Interruption.] Would my right hon. Friend care to give Opposition Members and me whatever information he has —[Interruption.]—about European Community funds to assist in the reconstruction of defence-related industries?

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. Points of order, as the hon. Member knows, come later—[Interruption.] I have been attempting to listen to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) and I might have been able to hear her but for the noise in the Chamber.

Mr. Sainsbury: I, too, was attempting to listen to my hon. Friend. Obviously, the shipbuilding industry, like other industries in many parts of the country are affected by the reduction in defence orders. We welcome the reasons for that reduction and we recognise—I hope that my hon. Friend agrees—that it is for the companies concerned to take the right commercial decisions, in the light of their individual circumstances, as to how best they restructure their businesses to contend with the reduction in orders from the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Loyden: When will the Government respond to the growing demand in the House for the revival of Britain's merchant fleet? Do the Government appreciate that Clydeside, Merseyside and north-east shipyards would greatly benefit from the revival of shipbuilding in those areas? There would be jobs for British shipbuilders and crews to man the British ships, if and when they were built.

Mr. Sainsbury: As the hon. Gentleman knows, sadly there has been a long period of decline in British shipbuilding. I suspect that there would be widespread agreement that the unfortunate labour relations in the industry decades ago contributed to that. Now, the industry is becoming competitive and it is my intention to remove subsidies and to create a fair trade between countries in shipbuilding, as in other areas.

Mr. John Marshall: Would my right hon. Friend care to remind the House of how many billions of pounds have been poured down the gullets of British shipbuilders? Does he agree that the best hope for employment in the shipbuilding areas in the north-east of England has come not from shipbuilders, but from the advent of Nissan to Sunderland?

Mr. Sainsbury: I agree that many billions of pounds have been paid out in subsidies to shipbuilding. Of course, the industry is still receiving significant subsidies. I very much agree with my hon. Friend about the contribution to the north-east region that has been made by Nissan, which contributes not only directly through employment, but through its influence on employment among those companies that supply its factory.

Mr. Fatchett: Given the Minister's answer and the prejudiced comments by his hon. Friends, it is hardly surprising that the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry has lost 76 per cent. of its employment over the past decade, while the German industry has increased by 37 per cent. It is also hardly surprising that United Kingdom output has fallen by 81 per cent., while German output has increased by 96 per cent.

German yards have access to intervention funds. Now that the Government have at last discovered the importance of manufacturing industry, is not it about time that they gave British shipbuilders the opportunity to compete on a level playing field? Is not it about time that they protected British jobs and British industry and gave us the same conditions as exist in every other European country?

Mr. Sainsbury: I fear that the hon. Gentleman appears to have overlooked the reunification of Germany in the statistics that he quoted. European Community rules affect the level of shipbuilding intervention that can be made. Those rules are the same throughout the Community, including reunified Germany and Britain. I recently announced that we were continuing with a shipbuilding intervention fund level of 9 per cent. for this year, which is the same level as last year.

BCCI

10. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many companies have been taken to court by Touche Ross acting in their capacity as receivers for BCCI.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): The joint liquidators of BCCI have sought sanctions pursuant to the provisions of section 167 of the Insolvency Act 1986, to commence, continue or defend proceedings involving 91 limited companies. The number of such proceedings actually taken to court is a matter for the liquidators, but such proceedings are, of course, taken for the benefit of creditors.

Mr. Gunnell: I thank the Minister for that and other replies that he has given me on the subject. Given that we know that the costs of Touche Ross in the liquidation now amount to about £100 million, what measures are the Department taking to ensure that there is value for money in that receivership? What plans are there for an audit of the accounts? Should the accounts go to the National Audit Office for consideration? Is the Department also conducting a social audit of the affairs of the receivership, so that we can be sure that at the end of it—for both creditors and those companies that have had dealings with BCCI—the maximum number of jobs are saved out of a debacle that is clearly in some way a responsibility of the Government?

Mr. Hamilton: It would be impossible for the Secretary of State to do what the hon. Gentleman has asked, because there are no powers to do so under current legislation. The costs and expenses of a liquidation are considered by a sub-committee of an informal creditors committee and are then submitted to the High Court for approval. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, a meeting will be held on 27 May at Wembley stadium, where the creditors of the company can come forward and at which we hope that a liquidation committee of creditors will be elected. That committee will then have the responsibility for the scrutiny of the costs and expenses of the liquidators.

Mr. Bell: What is the Minister is going to do between now and the creditors' meeting? The President of the Board of Trade appointed the auditors. There may have been 91 cases taken to court but 10 companies were placed in liquidation by the BCCI liquidators. How can the Government consistently shuffle off their responsibility in the matter? How many reports have been called for by the Minister? How many meetings have there been? If £108 million has been received by the auditors, is not it time that the liquidation was taken by the scruff of the neck by the Department of Trade and Industry instead of waiting for 27 May?

Mr. Hamilton: As the hon. Gentleman will know, we have powers under section 172 of the Insolvency Act to dismiss the liquidators. An application to do that has been presented recently by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). Of course, consideration will be given to that. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) has as much power as the Department of Trade and Industry to do what he is urging us to do. I repeat what I said to the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell): we have no legal powers to do the things that he asks us to do.

Exporters

13. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to promote services available to British exporters.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Technology (Mr. Edward Leigh): In support of the comprehensive and high-quality package of export services that my Department and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office offer to British exporters, we undertake a wide range of ongoing promotional activity.

Mr. Fabricant: Will my hon. Friend take it from me, as one who has exported to all four corners of the world over the last few years, that in the past we have suffered some small disadvantage against the Japanese and the Germans because of inadequate export credit guarantees? Will he join me in congratulating the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his excellent move in adding £1·3 billion to the resources of the Export Credits Guarantee Department? Does he agree that this is a victory for common sense and perhaps a victory of the Department of Trade and Industry over the Treasury?

Mr. Leigh: No, I could not possibly say that. It is a victory for Britain. I am sure the House will agree that it shows that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade's efforts in ensuring that the DTI is an effective voice of business within government have been proved right. It used to be said of some people that they had a good war. My President had a good Budget yesterday. Whether on advance corporation tax, small firms or ECGD, I do not think that £1,300 million worth of extra cover is bad for one day.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Representing an area with a high number of exporting businesses, I welcome the increase in export credit guarantee support. Will the Minister recognise that he can help exporters by ensuring that Britain becomes clearly and unequivocally a fully-integrated member of the single market and the European Community, that we ratify Maastricht and that he stops accusing Opposition parties of the failure of his own party to get its act together?

Mr. Leigh: After the events of last week, people in glass houses should not throw stones.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The improvement announced yesterday will be a tremendous and most welcome boost to morale and the performance of capital goods exporting and contracting industries. Does my hon. Friend agree that the fact that ECGD is offering competitive premium rates will enable us to negotiate with governmental export credit agencies in other countries a concerted de-escalation of some of the cut-throat competition which has existed over the last few years so that we can avoid making again the mistakes that we made in that area in the early 1980s?

Mr. Leigh: I am grateful to my hon. Friend; he is absolutely right. In major markets our ECGD rates will be broadly competitive. This is about making Britain win in the world market. We have provided the tools; exporters must get on with the job.

Mr. Hardy: The dreadful balance of payments position certainly justifies the modest action to which the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) referred, but does not the Minister accept that if the Government make unwise decisions in regard to the coal industry, the cost of additional imported energy—which would increase dramatically after the next four or five years—would eat away at any export achievements that the Government might secure?

Mr. Leigh: To put the matter in context, the value of our exports is at a record level. Over the 1980s, it increased faster than that of our major competitors. Although import penetration has been an increasing problem for all major industrialised countries, it has been less of a problem in this country than in major competitor countries since 1981—less than in France, Germany, Italy or the United States. Yesterday's announcement will ensure that our exporters will be even more successful in future than they have been in the past.

Deregulation Unit

14. Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will arrange for there to be an annual report to Parliament on the work of the deregulation unit.

Mr. Nell Hamilton: Progress reports to Parliament are made regularly under the deregulation initiative. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister reported to Parliament on 4 February, when he outlined the results of the seminar of Cabinet Ministers and senior civil servants that gave rise to the appointment of seven business task forces, to involve the private sector in furthering progress with the deregulation initiative.

Sir Michael Grylls: While I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and acknowledge that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has given his support to the campaign, I remind my hon. Friend the Minister of the value of a regular report to Parliament and a debate. On the Government Benches, an army of my right hon. and hon. Friends are behind my hon. Friend the Minister and want him to succeed with his good work. I ask him not to turn his face entirely away from a formal report—almost like a Budget—that could be debated in the House over two days. That would help my hon. Friend in his work and would have the support of us all.

Mr. Hamilton: I am delighted to account to Parliament as often as possible on my responsibilities, and I thank my hon. Friend for the help that he gives me in achieving success. He is joined by many others on these Benches—particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Sproat), who was this week elected chairman of the deregulation sub-committee of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, which itself is chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls). This side of the House is serious about deregulation because we know that it will bring more jobs and increased prosperity for all our people.

Assisted Areas

16. Dr. Berry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce his review of the assisted areas map; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: An announcement will be made as soon as possible, taking account of the outcome of the coal review and after the necessary clearance of the European Commission.

Dr. Berry: Is the Minister aware of the enormous support for assisted area status for the Bristol travel-to-work area? Is he aware that the submissions of the local councils have cross-party support and the support of the public and private sectors in Bristol? Is the Minister aware that unemployment in Bristol has risen at twice the average national rate over the past two years, with record levels of long-term unemployment and thousands of jobs lost at companies such as Rolls-Royce and British Aerospace? When will the Minister do something about that?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am aware of those matters. The joint submission made by the county, district, borough and city councils and Avon training and enterprise council and the figures to which the hon. Gentleman referred will be carefully considered, along with those relating to all other travel-to-work areas, before we announce the result of our review.

Mr. Barry Field: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Isle of Wight has left no stone unturned in making its case? Does he agree that it is appalling that when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced a pilot study of the benefit to jobs, we heard only carping criticism from the Liberal Democrats? That is the very sin of which they always accuse other parties. It is just too bad; when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor adopts an Opposition suggestion all their spokesmen could do in the House last night was to criticise the Budget.

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend made his second point with his usual force and strength. I confirm that not only the Isle of Wight authorities but my hon. Friend have left no stone unturned. In fact, I would say that they have turned over every stone at least twice, in making representations for the Isle of Wight and its possible qualification for assisted area status.

Mr. Jim Cunningham rose—

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's name escapes me.

Mr. Cunningham: It is not very often that my name escapes people.

Does not the Minister realise that the delay in disclosing the date for the announcement of the assisted areas map is causing great uncertainty for cities like Coventry, which recently experienced further redundancies in companies such as Rolls-Royce? When will the Minister be able to announce the exact date so that the uncertainty in relation to investment may be removed?

Mr. Sainsbury: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. I can assure him that we will make the announcement as soon as we can, taking the coal review into account, as I am sure the House would wish us to do.

Business Men (Meetings)

17. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many meetings he has had with business men before 8.30 am in the last month; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I have had no such meetings.

Mr. Oppenheim: In considering what he might do before breakfast, or indeed before any other meal of the day, will my right hon. Friend take into account the effect of state-directed industrial strategies on the European steel industry? For many years, politicians considered that the right macho strategy for that industry was to pour billions of pounds into the creation of ever-increasing capacity, and we are now asked to provide even more billions to close down much of that capacity. Does not this illustrate that while decisions left to the market may produce outcomes that are not perfect, they are a great deal less imperfect than those determined by politicians?

Mr. Heseltine: The whole House knows what I am doing before breakfast. I am intervening, as I am doing before lunch, tea and dinner. What I am not doing is subsidising British industry, before or after any meal.

Mr. Robin Cook: Should the President of the Board of Trade manage to intervene with business men before breakfast, will he make available to them the report of his competitiveness unit? Can he confirm the Sunday Times story that that report concludes that the British industrial base is fundamentally weak and that the trade deficit will last for decades? How can the Government seriously claim that they have put in position the conditions for recovery when that report tells them that what they have put in place is an industrial base low in investment and low in skills? Is not that an appalling verdict on 14 years in office? Is not that the real reason for the President's refusal to publish the report?

Mr. Heseltine: The uncomfortable fact for the hon. Gentleman is that the report clearly reveals the devastating inheritance of 1979, when, economically, this country was perceived as the weak man of Europe because of over-taxation, over-inflation and over-nationalisation. We are now recovering from that situation, and the hon. Gentleman just cannot stand the changes.

North Sea Development

19. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to improve competitiveness in the development of the North sea.

Mr. Eggar: I published the report of the working group on United Kingdom continental shelf competitiveness on 2 March, and I am encouraging all concerned to implement the group's recommendations.

Mr. Thompson: Bearing in mind the fact that many of my constituents in Norwich, North depend for their jobs on the further development of the North sea oil and gas industry and reserves, does my hon. Friend agree that yesterday's Budget announcement of the reform of North sea oil taxation was very good news with regard to jobs in the constituency and very good news for people throughout the country?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend will have heard what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday. Of course, these are very wide-ranging changes in the structure of petroleum revenue tax and associated North sea oil taxation, and the companies will respond to the changes in due course.

Coal Review

20. Mr. Hoon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will publish the results of the coal review.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my earlier answer to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

Mr. Hoon: Is not the truth that the purpose of the delay in publishing the review is to enable the right hon.

Gentleman to cobble together some sort of majority on his own Back Benches, rather than to take account of any concern for the country's energy requirements?

Mr. Heseltine: The truth is that my overall responsibility is to provide competitive energy from a diversity of sources. However, in the process, I must have regard to any changes that take place. I am therefore examining the effects of the coal industry upon energy policies and the level of the marketplace, and I will report to the House as soon as I can.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the reaction of the House yesterday to the suggestion that energy prices would be raised when he considers whether it is right to increase the cost of electricity and other energy by giving coal a higher price than the average that could be obtained on the open market?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend has raised one of the central dilemmas. I am considering it extremely carefully, along with a range of associated matters.

Mr. Stevenson: Does the President of the Board of Trade realise that hardly anyone in the country does not believe that his major preoccupation is trying to cobble together a deal to get out of the hole that he has dug for himself? Will he take this opportunity to reject claims that he has not taken fully into account the reports from the Select Committees on Trade and Industry and on Employment in his assessment of energy and employment needs?

Mr. Heseltine: No one could possibly make such a suggestion, because I have not responded to either report. I intend to respond to both fully. If the hon. Gentleman is seriously suggesting that the President of the Board of Trade should not be preoccupied with the costs to British industry, he merely reveals the divide that exists between the two sides of the House.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. If, for example, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) had tabled a closed question about Derbyshire and another hon. Member had then tried to ask a question about Hertfordshire or Bedfordshire, I assume that you would have ruled that hon. Member's question out of order. In fact, the hon. Lady intervened on a question about shipbuilding to ask a question that was entirely about the aircraft industry. Will you reflect on whether such questions should be ruled out of order in future?

Madam Speaker: As far as I recall, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) led on defence expenditure, but let me make my attitude to questions absolutely clear. I very much deprecate hon. Members' going very wide of the questions on the Order Paper: I regard that as an abuse of the House. If it is any comfort to hon. Members, I make a mental note of the names of those who abuse the House in that way. May I leave it at that?

Dr. Kim Howells (Pontypridd): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you tell me whether questions 5 and 12—one tabled by a Scottish nationalist, and the other by a Welsh nationalist—were withdrawn today because the hon. Members concerned did not wish to embarrass the President of the Board of Trade, and were involved in the grubby deal that the nationalists cooked up with the Government last week?

Madam Speaker: I have no idea why the questions were withdrawn. A message simply came to my office in the normal way.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Has the President of the Board of Trade made a statement to you to correct his inaccuracies with regard to the report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry? He said that the report made no recommendations about gas and nuclear energy, but it clearly does. Paragraph 247 states:

"In determining whether new capacity should be licensed, we recommend that the Secretary of State give priority to:—

that is, combined heat and power—

"element and thus major environmental benefits . . . sour gas, which is unsuitable for other purposes and thus unlikely otherwise to be developed."

The report also suggests that the right hon. Gentleman use——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now becoming involved in content. I have tried to explain to him previously that I cannot deal with content, or with what Ministers or Back Benchers say in the House. I am concerned with procedure and points of order.

Mr. Clapham rose——

Madam Speaker: May I answer the hon. Gentleman? After all, he asked the question in the first place.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has made no statement to me, privately or in any other way. I understand that the hon. Gentleman is attempting to pursue the matter. I advise him to pursue it by other means; he cannot pursue it through the Speaker.

Hire Purchase and Conditional Sale (Prevention of Fraud)

3.33 pm

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the sale and leasing of goods and to vehicle registration; to make provision for the registration of title to certain other goods; and for connected purposes.

I am grateful for this opportunity to present the Bill this afternoon.

Hire purchase fraud is a serious form of criminal activity, which can and must be stopped. In a typical case, a criminal takes goods, usually motor vehicles, on hire purchase, lease or credit sale and sells them to an unsuspecting member of the public or a motor dealer or through an auctioneer without of course, disclosing the existence of the hire purchase company's interest. The criminal then disappears or is not worth suing.

Last year, losses to finance companies exceeded £13·5 million, and further losses exceeding £2 million were suffered by motor traders and auctioneers. Those costs are passed on to our constituents in the form of higher finance charges and higher vehicle prices. Last year, there were also more than 4,500 cases of wrongful disposition of motor vehicles, many of which resulted in prosecutions, with increased costs for the police, the courts the prison system and others, all paid for by the long-suffering taxpayer.

The remedy is not to arrest, prosecute and punish the offender but to change the system of documentation to make it virtually impossible to commit such a crime. As the law stands, if the criminal sells to a private buyer who acts in good faith and without notice of the finance company's interest, the buyer gets a good title and the loss falls on the finance company. If the criminal sells to a motor trader or through an auctioneer who does not know of the finance company's interest, the loss falls on the trader or auctioneer.

A register of hire purchase interest is maintained by a company called Hire Purchase Information, or HPI. It does an excellent job, but traders and auctioneers searching the register will often find no trace of a hire purchase or other security interest. There are two reasons for that. First, many hire purchase companies do not bother to register, knowing that private buyers do not search at HPI and also knowing that, if the criminal sells to a trader, the trader will have to bear the loss.

The second reason is that the criminal may have sold the vehicle very quickly, before the hire purchase interest has been registered. It is therefore necessary to change the system of vehicle registration so that the vehicle registration document sometimes known as the logbook, is endorsed with a note of the hire purchase interest. Traders and private buyers would therefore see straight away whether the car was subject to a finance company's interest and, of course, if the seller said that he could not produce the vehicle registration document, a prudent buyer would send him away until he could produce it. The present pace at which the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency at Swansea operates is much too slow and needs to be speeded up.

Some consequential changes to the law would be needed. The main one would be to make it clear that a finance company that fails to register its interest or allows its customer to take possession of a vehicle with an unendorsed vehicle registration document would lose its title if the criminal sold to an innocent private buyer or an innocent trader. There is no reason why a system similar to that which I have outlined should not also be introduced for boats and caravans, which are subject to the same criminal activity.

It is time to take action to crack down on hire purchase fraudsters. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Michael Stephen, Mr. Andrew Bowden, Dr. Liam Fox, Mr. Patrick Thompson, Mr. Bruce George, Mr. Tony Banks, Mrs. Angela Knight and Mr. Michael Bates.

Hire Purchase and Conditional Sale (Prevention of Fraud)

Mr. Michael Stephen accordingly presented a Bill to amend the law relating to the sale and leasing of goods and to vehicle registration; to make provision for the registration of title to certain other goods; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 23 April, and to be printed. [Bill 163.]

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [16 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply, acquisition or importation;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies, acquisitions and importations; or

(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lamont.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 4683/93, the Commission's Annual Economic Report for 1993, and the draft Decision adopting the Report.]

Madam Speaker: The Question is as on the Order Paper. I remind the House that the Budget debate continues on the motion entitled "Amendment of the law". Before I call the first speaker, may I plead for short speeches today, please? A number of Members are seeking to catch my eye and I should be much obliged if speeches could be rather shorter today.

3.39 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Two years ago, we had a "Budget for business". Since then, 100,000 businesses have gone under. Last year, we had a Budget called a "Budget for the recovery". No recovery materialised. In November, we had an autumn statement "for investment". Public investment continued to fall. Now we have what is called a Budget for jobs, and I make one Budget forecast—that, after the Budget, unemployment will rise this month, next month and for months afterwards. This "Budget for jobs" is really a Budget with only one intention, to save one job—the Chancellor's own job. It was the Chancellor's last Budget to be held in March, and it should be his last.

The Budget makes it clear that taxes will rise not only this year but next year and the year after. There will be tax rises now, tax rises later and tax rises two years later. That is not only a double whammy but a triple Conservative tax whammy.

National insurance contributions, which the Conservatives said would not be increased, have risen. VAT, which they promised would not increase, is now to be imposed on fuel. As the President of the Board of Trade would say——

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall give way later.

As the President of the Board of Trade would say, "Taxes to the left, taxes to the right, taxes everywhere." For people paying VAT, there will be "tax rises before breakfast, before lunch and before dinner", and people will have to get up the next day and pay taxes yet again.

Before the general election, the Conservatives promised not to devalue——

Mr. Arnold rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) giving way?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Mr. Arnold: Bearing in mind the statement on the Labour party's green creditials made by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), and the commitment to reduce CO_2 emissions by the end of the century, if the hon. Gentleman opposes the imposition of VAT on domestic energy, will he explain how the Labour party would honour the commitment?

Mr. Brown: The difference between us and the Conservative party is that we have a policy for the environment. We are not using the environment, as the Conservatives do, simply to raise taxes at the expense of the rest of the people.

At the general election, the Conservatives promised not to devalue. They did devalue. They promised a recovery that has not happened, and they promised to end repossessions, which continue at the rate of 1,000 a week. They promised and guaranteed young people jobs or training; hundreds still have none. They promised that they would not privatise Scottish water, and now there is a real fear that they plan to do so.

Most of all, the centrepiece of the Conservatives' election campaign was the promise that taxes would not rise—indeed, that taxes would fall. The Chancellor's Budget has been not a Budget for Britain but a betrayal of the people of Britain.

The central failure of the Budget is the failure to tackle unemployment and economic decline. The Budget deficit and the tax rise that will ensue result from the central failure to produce economic prosperity. A Government who tackle only the consequences and not the causes of economic and industrial decline will fail in the Budget, and they will fail Britain.

Reading the Budget statement, which makes it clear that unemployment will continue to rise and that little will be done about it, we realise that the only consistent view that the Chancellor has held over two years has been the view that, for him, unemployment is a price well worth paying.

I am sorry that the Chancellor is not in the Chamber. The first thing that Ministers must do is apologise to the House and to millions of people throughout the country. Two pounds a week is the price that will be paid in the fuel bills of elderly people and of many millions of others. That amounts to £100 a year and, as I noticed yesterday, there is no guarantee of full compensation in social security payments or in pensions.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Is the hon. Gentleman actually denying the words that hon. Members heard the Chancellor say quite clearly, quite categorically—that those who are getting benefits through the social security system will have those benefits made up to take full account of what is going to happen on the additional VAT?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I shall now give way to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury so that he can confirm what his hon. Friend said.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): I intend to make a speech later.

Mr. Brown: That is the Tory party at work—the Tory party that never, ever tells a truth in answer to a simple and straightforward question.

Let us consider in precise detail what the Government have said about tax rises. During the election campaign, the Chancellor said on "Channel 4 News":

"We will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

Just to be sure, Jon Snow, the interviewer, pressed him and asked:

"Does that mean direct and indirect taxes?"

"Yes," said the Chancellor. The Chancellor and the Ministers who have betrayed promises made during the election campaign can never be trusted again.

The tax promises were not casual remarks or offhand, throwaway comments. They were not a peripheral element of the Conservative campaign. The Chancellor made it the centrepiece of his whole election strategy that taxes would not just not go up, but would go down under his leadership. I repeat that he said that he could not see any circumstances in which tax rises would be necessary.

Is that the same Chancellor who has raised taxes by £17 billion over two years, the same Chancellor who kept telling us during the election campaign that tax rises would destroy work incentives, the same Chancellor who has imposed tax rises amounting to £8 a week on the ordinary taxpayer from next April, and the same Chancellor who unveiled billboard poster after billboard poster saying that Labour's plans to raise taxes were a folly and a fraud on the people of this country? Is it the same Chancellor who has imposed——

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether, if he is so opposed to dealing with the Budget deficit by increasing taxes, he accepts that inevitably he would have to introduce substantial cuts in public expenditure?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman fails to understand that it is the failure to solve the problems of unemployment and of economic decline that is forcing up the Budget deficit. The Budget's failure to deal with the causes of the problem and the fact that it deals only with the consequences mean that it is a Budget that fails Britain.

I should have thought more of the hon. Gentleman if he had told us that he would apologise to the voters in his constituency whom he told during the general election campaign that there would be no VAT rises and no national insurance rises. If he cannot point out the section of the election manifesto which warned of increased tax rises for the ordinary voter under a Conservative Government, he should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Townend: If the hon. Gentleman looks at my election address, he will see that I talked about no increases in direct taxation.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman's comment is interesting. I presume that he meant that there would be no increase in national insurance. Was that the policy with which he went to the electors? Was that the policy? He cannot answer the question. National insurance is a tax that is paid by every worker, and by next year people will be paying £3 a week more.

There are only two explanations for what has happened since the election—either Ministers are incompetent on a scale that beggers belief or, with the access that they, uniquely, had to the Treasury papers before the election, knowing of the problems that their policies and their failures had created, they set out to deceive the people of Britain on a massive and unprecedented scale.

Let us remember that this is the Chancellor who told us that he would not devalue and did; who forecast that the recession would be shallow and short-lived; who told us that the recession would end two years ago, then one year ago; who told us that he had seen the green shoots of economic recovery—months before there is any sign that a recovery is happening. Can anyone ever believe anything that he says to the House or the people of this country again?

During the election campaign, the Tories put up billboards throughout the country saying that the country could not trust the Labour party. Now they should put up billboards in every town and city saying that the country can never trust the Conservative party again.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is there not something far more sinister about these matters? Given that the Government have a majority of only 20 and that among those 20 are a number of marginal seats, is not it quite clear that, had it not been for the tax lie, there would probably have been a minority Labour Government today? Should not the wider public be told that?

Mr. Brown: If the truth had been told, there would have been a majority Labour Government.

What did the Prime Minister say? His reputation is clearly on the line in connection with all the promises that were made. Let us be absolutely clear that it was not just the Chancellor—who is taking the lion's share of the blame—but the Prime Minister who made the promises. The Prime Minister was asked about VAT. "We have no plans," he said, "to increase VAT. There will be no VAT increase."

Let me remind Conservative Members—who will have to live with this as these decisions come back to haunt them between now and the next general election—of what the Prime Minister said. Asked by The Independent on 27 March:

"Can you give the same pledge that Mrs. Thatcher gave in 1987 that you will not extend the scope of VAT to children's shoes, clothing, gas, electricity and food?",

the Prime Minister replied,

"I have made the pledge in the past. I have made it clear that we have no plans . . . no need . . . no plans . . . to extend the scope of VAT."

The Prime Minister was not content with that. He went further and promised tax cuts year on year:

"I have no doubt,"

he said,

"that we will be able to make further reductions in the rate of taxation."

[Mr. Brown]

Those were the words of a Prime Minister who put himself at the forefront of a manifesto that said that lower taxes were necessary to encourage people—they would make for "a more productive economy"; and would "transfer power from the state to the people"— and that high taxes would
"kill the goose that lays the golden eggs".

There is now no refuge for the Prime Minister in claiming that he did not know anything about the length of the recession. It was he who gave the unequivocal promise: "Vote Conservative on Thursday and the recovery will continue on Friday." They were calculated, cold-blooded and cynical statements, made simply to win the election. The result is that the Conservative party, under the Prime Minister's leadership, will never be trusted again.

Let us just remember that, to win an election, President George Bush said, "Read my lips—no more taxes," then put taxes up and lost the election. The Prime Minister said, "Read my manifesto—no more taxes." Now he has put taxes up, and he will be thrown out of office.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Will the hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to pledge his party to reverse the extension of VAT to fuel and power?

Mr. Brown: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to join us in the Lobby on Monday, when we will be voting against the VAT increases. I will tell him something else: when we draw up our election manifesto, we will be fair to pensioners and to all those to whom fuel prices matter, and when we go to fight an election campaign, we will tell the truth.

The Chancellor has argued that the Budget will set Britain on the road to recovery. He has argued, when he has produced figures, that the balance of payments will rise to £17·5 billion, that investment will grow by only 0·5 per cent., that the trade deficit in manufacturing will double, and that the Budget is a sign of the successes of his policy. But let us consider what is happening to unemployment in Britain.

After the Budget, unemployment will still cost the country almost £30 billion a year. The cost of every unemployed person—the rising numbers—is £9,000 a year. When faced with the problems of massive unemployment in the 1930s, we had a new deal in America. After the war, we had the Marshall plan to reconstruct Europe. We need a mobilisation of resources to combat unemployment now.

What do we have instead from the Government, when more people are unemployed; when more people are chasing jobs; when, in some constituencies of Conservative Members, 1,000 people go for every vacancy on offer; when we need a great national effort that would repair our roads and railways, build homes, improve our schools and hospitals and upgrade our environment?

When we look at the plans produced yesterday by the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Employment, let us remember that there are fewer training places now than in 1990, when the Chancellor and the Prime Minister came into office. Let us remember that the amount spent on every unemployed person has not increased but has been reduced.

When talking about broken promises, let us also remember the promises that were made to the unemployed, which have been cynically betrayed: the promise that, by March 1992, employment action would create 30,000 places—it never did; the promise that the Government would increase the funding available to the training and enterprise councils—the Chancellor had to admit that the funding was being cut; the guarantee that all young people would have a job or training—thousands, and now hundreds, do not have that; the Chancellor's promise in 1991 that the monthly rate of increase in unemployment had peaked and was likely to moderate further. All those promises were never met.

What do we have now in the Government's employment programmes? Employment action, which produced neither employment nor action, is now relaunched as training for work, to disguise a £34 million cut. The business start-up scheme mentioned by the Chancellor yesterday has been relaunched under a new name, with almost half the places that it originally had five years ago.

Certainly there are twice as many job interview guarantees from the Chancellor and the Prime Minister, but when the two main firms in the job interview guarantee scheme helping the Government are the Post Office and British Gas and between them they are laying off 26,000 people in the next few years, how can the job interview guarantee scheme generate thousands of jobs for the unemployed? After all that, we are left with the central fact that unemployment is rising and will continue to rise, and that the Government's whole approach is essentially this: that unemployment is a price well worth paying.

I say that there is no recovery that we will call a recovery when it assumes that 3 million people stay out of work. There is no recovery that is worth its name which does not begin to put Britain back to work.

Will the Chancellor tell the couple who stand to lose their home as well as their jobs as a result of higher unemployment that unemployment is a price well worth paying? Will he tell the man in his 40s who knows that he will never work again once he loses his job that his unemployment is a price worth paying? We all know very well that, if the Government accepted their responsibilities for jobs, we could begin to get Britain back to work.

Will the Chancellor tell the youngster with no hope, no cash and no job that his long-term unemployment is for him a price well worth paying? The Chancellor knows that he could abolish youth unemployment if he had the will to do so.

The tragedy is that the only redundancy that really worries the Chancellor is his own, and that the repossession of No. 11 Downing street is the only repossession he cares about.

What are the Government's excuses for what has gone wrong? They started, in 1979, by blaming the trade unions. Then they blamed Labour councils, the European Economic Community, the exchange rate mechanism and Jacques Delors. When European excuses ran out, they discovered world recession. At the weekend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry even blamed the Labour party.

The weekend before that, as things were beginning to get desperate, they looked nearer to home and found someone else to blame—Lady Thatcher—who, in her own words, is now the "enemy within" for the Conservative party. All was explained. The Prime Minister had been terrorised into silence in her Cabinet on a subject dear to his heart—British manufacturing industry. That is the Prime Minister, the voice of the silent minority in the Cabinet, who failed to speak up for his love of British manufacturing industry—the love that dared not speak its name.

Having blamed Europe, the world, the Labour party and their former leader, whom do the Government blame now, when many people would say that they have no one to blame but themselves? They blame the British people. The Prime Minister has identified the British people's instinct for self-deprecation and for talking the country down. Not to be left behind, last Sunday the Chancellor discovered it all—the British people are to blame for the alibi society. Now we know it from a Tory—society is to blame after all. The party that told us that society did not exist has reinvented it, if only to take the blame for its own failures.

The truth is that Britain is not an alibi society that has let down a well-meaning Government: Britain has an alibi Government, who have been letting down British society for 14 years.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's tide of enjoyment, but does he recognise that, as the Chancellor pointed out in the early stages of his speech yesterday, there is recession, unemployment and a fall in growth in other European countries, including socialist France? What does he have to say about socialist France, which is facing elections this month?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman should look at the figures. He will know that, during the past two years, unemployment has risen faster in Britain than in any other EC country. Let us remember that the Government claimed that they had created an economic miracle. In 1988 and 1989, they told us that we were living through a supply side transformation of our society. Some members of the Government even claimed that living standards would continue to rise year after year. Now, the Government have created 3 million unemployed.

When we consider what has been happening in Europe and around the world——

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Norman Lamont) rose——

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the Chancellor. If he intervenes, could he tell us in which part of his election manifesto he told his constituents that value added tax and national insurance would rise as a result of his policies?

Mr. Lamont: Why does the hon. Gentleman not answer the question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson)? Unemployment in France is 3 million, in Ireland and Spain it is well in excess of the level in this country, and in Italy it is very similar to the level in this country. The European Commission projects that unemployment will reach 11 per cent. for the Community as a whole. Does every word of criticism, every stricture and every argument that the hon. Gentleman has made apply to those Governments as well as to our Government?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the Chancellor, because he allows me to explain what has been happening in Europe during the 1990s. Is it not the case—does he deny—that Britain was at the bottom of the league for growth not merely last year but the year before? Is it not the case that Britain has been at the bottom of the league for investment, and for employment creation? Is it not the case that Britain has been at the bottom of the league in the European Community for every major indicator in the 1990s? If the Chancellor is prepared to deny that, I will happily give way to him.

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I thought that the Chancellor helped Back Benchers, rather than the other way round.

On Sunday, The Sunday Times revealed what we already knew: that we are not only experiencing high unemployment but are engaged in a process of industrial decline. It revealed that Britain invested half as much in its industrial workers as many of the world's best economies; that our skill levels are 40 per cent. below some of the world's best; and that we have the worst record for manufacturing investment since 1979, bar none, of the countries in the European Community. While investment in manufacturing has grown by 100 per cent. and more in Japan since 1979, it has fallen by 5 per cent. in Britain.

Our argument is that this Budget does not even begin to tackle the central questions of reversing our economic decline by rebuilding our industrial capacity. The central questions are how we invest in people for the future, how we invest in industry and how we invest in the social and economic fabric of our country to ensure that we will have not only rising production in industry but rising standards of living.

The remarkable feature of this Budget is that the tax rises are to pay for the mistakes of the past. The Chancellor does not have one contribution to make towards laying the foundations for future success.

We have been saying for years that manufacturing and industry matter; that we need a policy for manufacturing for the future; and that we neglect it at our peril. For years, we have been saying what the Department of Trade and Industry data reveal: that action to restore manufacturing required a comprehensive policy for research, technology, investment and the regions. We said this not because we believed that manufacturing was inherently preferable or because we had some romantic attachment to factories instead of offices, but because we knew that manufacturing is one of the major centres of innovation in our economy and important to our great industrial regions. It is central to our exports, to our tradeable economic base and to the future of our balance of payments.

The Prime Minister tells us that he was in the minority when arguing the case for manufacturing industry. I have looked through the speeches he made during the 1980s, when he was that voice for manufacturing industry but could not raise it forcefully in public. When he spoke about the famous economic miracle, did he say that he was worried about the future of manufacturing or that something had to be done about the balance of payments? No. He said:

"In the 1960s we watched the German miracle from our sick beds. Today in Europe we are the economic miracle."

That was what the Prime Minister said. He did not tell us that there were problems with manufacturing when, since 1979, German manufacturing has grown at five times the British rate. He said that Britain was the economic miracle.

What of the Conservative party under the Prime Minister's Chancellorship? Did the document about the state of manufacturing industry issued in 1990 by the economic research department betray the Prime Minister's worries? No. What that document said was that manufacturing was an obsession of the Labour party—that it was an outdated attitude of the Labour party that put manufacturing at the centre of affairs.

What of the balance of payments which we warned about? Did the Prime Minister give speeches saying that the balance of payments deficit could cause us a problem? No. When even the President of the Board of Trade was warning that the deficit was of consequence, that it could not be dismissed as a second order problem, that it would not be easily financed, what was the Prime Minister saying? Nothing more, nothing less than that it was a second order problem, of little consequence, and could be easily financed.

What of the Chancellor during those great years at the Treasury when the Prime Minister and he were supposed to be speaking up for manufacturing industry? He said:

"The idea of an industrial strategy is moth-eaten, and one might even say half-baked."

Those were not the words of someone who looked as if he were supporting the industrial strategy that is now referred to by the President of the Board of Trade.

Even as late as 1990, as the recession required a new approach to industry in this country and a change of policies to allow British industry to triumph over the recession, did the Chancellor say that policies would have to adapt to the needs of manufacturing industry? No. He said:

"The real test of Thatcherite economics is now only beginning. The slow-down in prospect will put to the test the new-found flexibility and resilience of the economy and the effectiveness of the labour market reforms. It looks as if we may now be seeing the beginning of a reverse of a long-running trend which has seen the share of manufacturing in national income fall. I feel that the resurgence we have seen so far is nothing like the resurgence we are about to see."

For three years after that, manufacturing output has fallen, businesses in the manufacturing sector have gone bankrupt in record numbers, and unemployment has risen substantially. Surely that speech about Thatcherite economies was one of the great misjudgments of history. If the past three years have been the real test of Thatcherite economics, when the Chancellor sums up the Budget debate on Monday, it will be interesting to see whether he can tell us what the results for British manufacturing industry have been.

The Budget was effectively a betrayal of the people of Britain. The Government first betrayed the pensioners in 1979, when they broke the link between pensions and earnings. They then betrayed the unemployed, when they taxed unemployment benefit and then cut it. Next they betrayed the home owner, with the increase in mortgage rates that their policies produced. They then betrayed the low-paid by abolishing, cynically and cruelly, the wages councils on which 3 million people depend. They then betrayed patients in the national health service and public service consumers, and they continue to do so.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): For how many years did previous Labour Governments have a link between pensions and earnings?

Mr. Brown: I think that the right hon. Gentleman should refer to history. The link between pensions and earnings was introduced by a Labour Government to help the pensioners of this country. The right hon. Gentleman should know that, as a result of breaking the link between pensions and earnings, many pensioners are hard up.

The Government betrayed the unemployed; they betrayed the low-paid and home owners. The Government betrayed people in the national health service, and they have now betrayed the taxpayers of this country by raising national insurance and value added tax. There is no one left for this Government to betray; they have no credibility in this country. The electorate will never trust them again. If Britain is to have a new start, it will need a new Government—and that will have to be a Labour Government.

4.13 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): What a speech we have just heard. What passion was shown as we witnessed the glowering countenance of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) across the Dispatch Box. I detected in his speech the sound of disappointed rage. The hon. Gentleman is disappointed that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has framed a skilled Budget which is well suited to this stage of the cycle. Once again, faced with substantial difficulties in framing the Budget, my right hon. Friend has none the less produced a Budget which demonstrates a real grasp of the subject. He has exceeded the expectations of his critics.

Before yesterday, the commentators were saying that the Chancellor faced a stark choice—he could either protect the recovery or tackle the Government's borrowing, but could not do both. But my right hon. Friend has done both in the Budget—[Interruption.]—and British business has recognised that achievement. Sir David Lees of the CBI said:

"this budget will certainly help the recovery."

The Institute of Directors said:

"The Chancellor has listened carefully and the package of business measures announced is relevant and helpful."

The Federation of Small Businesses said:

"Small businesses will welcome being singled out for special support."

The Association of British Chambers of Commerce said:

"We asked for a budget which did not upset the fragile recovery, but addressed the urgent need to boost exports and press on with deregulation. This is what we have heard."

A cross-section of business leaders has given the Budget the thumbs up.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): What is the Treasury's assessment of the reduction in the demand for coal as a result of the imposition of VAT on fuel announced yesterday?

Mr. Portillo: The VAT changes alone will produce a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions of about 1·5 million tonnes and that is part of our firm commitment to the Rio convention. I shall later be asking Labour Members how they would achieve that commitment.

Mr. Bryan Davies (Oldham, Central and Royton): We appreciate, this being a debate, that the Minister has a prepared speech. But will he address his remarks to the interesting point raised by the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw), who alleged that the Chancellor said yesterday that the Government intended to restore in full to those on benefit the cost of the fuel tax? Is it really the intention of the Government to restore in full that extra tax on poor people?

Mr. Portillo: The Chancellor's words on that were clear. He said:

"Social security benefits will, of course, rise automatically to reflect the price effect of this change. But I recognise that this will cause particular problems for those on low incomes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will take this into account when the income-related benefits are uprated next year."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 183.]

That was perfectly clear.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Minister confirm what the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) understood to be the position—that the benefits will be uprated in full to take account of the rise in VAT?

Mr. Portillo: All benefits will be uprated to take account of the RPI. That is perfectly obvious.

Mr. Gordon Brown: The point is not whether the VAT rise will be reflected in the RPI. Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that the VAT rise will mean that the benefits for ordinary people on income support and pensions will rise to take account of that? Will they rise in full?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman is apparently inventing an entirely new concept—[Interruption.] He is saying that in some way income-related benefits must be adjusted for particular price rises that occur. That is an entirely new concept, and I will give him an example because all such issues are made up of swings and roundabouts. The increase announced in duty on road fuels puts about ¼ per cent. on the RPI. People on low incomes are very low users of road fuels, but they will be compensated through the RPI for the extra expense that other people will face. So there are swings and roundabouts—[Interruption.]—and the words of the Chancellor were perfectly clear.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr) rose——

Mr. Portillo: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, but then I must make progress.

Mr. Rooker: Let us be absolutely clear on the point. How does the right hon. Gentleman respond to the work published this morning by the department of applied economics at Cambridge showing that, whereas the Budget will have a 3 per cent. effect on those with the lowest 10 per cent. of household incomes, partly as a result of the tax and VAT changes, it will have only a 1·5 per cent. effect on the top 10 per cent. of earners? In other words, if the nation's 10 per cent. poorest are not to suffer disproportionately, their social security benefits must rise by 3 per cent. above the rate of inflation. If the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to do that, we shall go away reasonably happy, or at least not so unhappy, and it should be easy for him to do that if he wants the Budget to be fair to all sections of the population.

Mr. Portillo: I believe that the Budget is fair to all sections of the population. For example, those on the highest earned incomes will be hit hardest by the tax changes in the tax credits for dividends, the tax changes for company cars and the tax changes to the married couple's allowance. All those affect people on higher incomes. There are swings and roundabouts. The hon. Gentleman did not bother to point out that currently income support scales contain a 20 per cent. allowance for community charge. Nobody will be asked to pay the council tax after 1 April, but that money is not being withdrawn—it is being left in income support. I refer the House once again to the words of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor yesterday.

Mr. Gordon Brown: This is wholly unsatisfactory; it is a clear attempt to evade the question. Will the Chief Secretary give us an unequivocal answer—will those on income support be compensated in full for the rise in VAT?

Mr. Portillo: I am not in any way evading the question; I am referring hon. Members to what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday, which was that the rise in VAT would be taken into account when the income-related benefits are uprated next year. My right hon. Friend chose his words carefully and they are on the record.

Since the Conservatives took office 14 years ago, our two guiding economic aims have been sound money and sound public finances. Those aims must stand above all others. We have reiterated those principles day in and day out, before breakfast, before lunch and before dinner. All those involved in wealth creation know that those are the right principles. By contrast, the Labour party—which is not involved in wealth creation—scarcely even recognises those principles.

Before the election we said that we had no plans to raise VAT, and that was the plain truth—[Interruption.] Yes, it was. Last year, we were looking at a level of Government borrowing far lower than that we are facing today. We must take action to deal with the changed position. The recession has lasted longer than anyone thought and the proof of that is that the Labour party reminds us of it every day of our lives. Indeed, it has made the length of the recession its excuse for abandoning all the tax proposals that it put forward at the election. Its present stance shows that now, as always, it could not care less about the state of public finances.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): There has been a forecast of a £50 billion public sector borrowing requirement for some considerable time, so it has not come as a surprise to most people. The Chief Secretary fails to recognise that in the first 10 years of the Thatcher Government, the richest 1 per cent. in Britain accumulatively had £26·2 billion handed to them in tax cuts. What the Chancellor should have done yesterday was to recoup that money from the wealthiest 1 per cent. and not land it on the pensioners and others who will have to pay the additional VAT without any compensation.

The truth is that the Tory Government, through their Budget yesterday, not only helped the rich, but they refused to take back any of the money that they had given to them and, instead, they have crippled millions of other people. The Government are in favour of looking after the bosses and lining the pockets of their friends.

Mr. Portillo: The amount of money raised in income tax from the highest 5 per cent. of earners has risen consistently during the time that we have been in office. I have already pointed out that the changes that we made yesterday to the married couple's allowance, company cars and dividends will impact most heavily on the highest earners. The Budget was designed to be fair across all sectors of society and all levels of income.

The Opposition's policy has veered from side to side, with extremely strange results. They are now apparently in favour of raising taxes only at election time. That is not something about which I want to complain, but they should consider what that says for the political acumen of the man whom they have recently elected leader of the Labour party.

At the election, the Labour party proposed to raise taxes by £35 billion a year, three and a half times what the Government propose. Labour wanted the tax increases to be immediate. Labour's purpose was not to pay off debt but to pay off scores against the middle classes. We heard the same tone just now. Labour wanted 10p on income tax and 9p on national insurance, not to repay borrowing but in order to be able to spend more money.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I tell the Minister once again that the £35 billion that he quotes was a monstrous lie which won the Conservative party the general election. Does not he realise that millions of people are saying this morning that the election was won by the Tory party on the back of a lie? Does not he realise that, now that we have had the Budget?

Mr. Portillo: The election was won for the Conservative party perhaps by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), following the Luigi restaurant incident. That was the key. The right hon. and learned Gentleman corrected the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), who tore him off a strip. That lost the election for the Labour party. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was rewarded by being made leader of the party.

We have to raise revenue because it is our duty as a responsible Government to do so. We have chosen to do it in ways that do not harm recovery or depress incentives, ways which draw money from all levels of earnings and which contribute to meeting our commitments on the environment.

Here are the facts which cannot be ignored. Next year the public sector will be borrowing £1,000 a year for every man, woman and child in the country. The interest on that borrowing will have to be paid for many years to come. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor could have chosen to postpone action. Many presumably expected him to do that. But those who create jobs in Britain need to know that the Government will reduce their borrowings.

The "mañana" approach would have done nothing for confidence. Investors in Britain take the level of borrowing seriously. [Interruption.] The Labour party is convulsed because it does not. For example, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) has built a political career on moving from television studio to television studio evincing righteous indignation about alleged underprovision by the state for health or education or whatever other good cause she has in mind.

The hon. Lady was at it again last night, touring the studios of London like an understudy for Joan Collins, complaining that borrowing was too high, that we should be spending more, and that we should not raise revenue. It was a curious view from a shadow Chief Secretary; it was perhaps more appropriate for a film star. I am not aware that the hon. Lady has ever addressed the need for control. I am not aware that she could even spell the word "restraint". She was indeed a most original choice as shadow Chief Secretary.

The first lesson for Chief Secretaries, shadow or otherwise, is that there is no such thing as a free lunch. I should know, after my recent lunching experiences. If the hon. Lady thinks that her reputation can stand it, I will happily take her to the Churchill room for lunch and explain to her why that is so. [Interruption.] The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East has got the joke; well done. The Leader of the Opposition is very quick.

At the same time the hon. Lady can explain to me Labour's policies. She can explain about the extra public spending which Labour wants—more spending on employment, on health, on education, on science, on research and development, on investment—more on everything under the sun. To pay for it, there are only two choices—more borrowing or more taxing. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East set out the options. He said:

> "I am not talking about increasing current borrowing . . . I am not talking about raising income tax or national insurance or VAT."

So what on earth was he talking about? Is Labour saying that borrowing is too high and spending too low, but that taxes must stay exactly where they are? If Labour is saying that, what nonsense it is.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I understand that the Chancellor wants to raise revenue, and he chose VAT as a way of doing that. When our zero rating was under pressure from the Community in the 1970s, I argued that it was needed to prevent VAT from becoming a regressive tax. Income tax is a progressive tax. By removing an essential element of VAT, the Government are turning a neutral tax into a regressive tax, to avoid using income tax—which would have been the proper thing to do.

Mr. Portillo: The proper argument against Community intervention in our zero rates is the right of the House to determine our taxation rates. It is the right of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to decide what they should be. It has been our consistent policy to move from taxes on income to taxes on spending.

Our commitment to a medium-term strategy for public spending was shown in the autumn statement. It is essential that we reduce the proportion of national income spent by the state. For the years 1994-95 and 1995-96, we are committed to real increases in the control total of 1 per cent. and less. At a time when we are committed also to increasing money for the health service and increasing the number of students, and facing pressures on social security, those are very tough ceilings. Some of my hon. Friends think that they are not tough enough. A poll of Conservative Members of Parliament published in last week's Financial Times showed that 62 per cent. favoured cuts in public spending.—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] My hon. Friends say "Hear, hear." I admire their spirit, and I will welcome their support for the hard decisions that lie ahead.

I have started a programme of fundamental expenditure reviews, and over the medium term and beyond they will make an essential contribution to meeting our spending targets and to containing the size of the state. All the industrialised countries of the world are facing up to the same problem.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): If those are the right hon. Gentleman's policies, and given that the Government have been in power 14 years, can he explain why public sector expenditure is 44·75 per cent. of gross domestic product? Why is that figure higher than it was when the Conservatives took office from a Labour Government in 1979?

Mr. Portillo: That is a curious point to be made by a member of the Labour party. The proportion of public spending in national income was higher when Labour lost to a Conservative Government. We got it down to just over 39 per cent. The figure has now risen to the mid-40s due to the recession. I am determined that it should go back down from here. That is this Government's commitment.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor used yesterday's Budget not just to raise revenue but to pursue tax reform —most notably, by increasing the 20 per cent. band. When he introduced that band, Labour dismissed it as a gimmick, even though a 20p band was its policy also. Labour claimed that we would never get anywhere with it —i underestimated us in that. My right hon. Friend is determined to extend the 20p band year after year, until it becomes the basic rate of tax for all and the top rate of tax for most. For 5 million taxpayers, that pledge is already met—delivered, despite the recession, in the very first Budget of this Parliament.

The Budget accepts Britain's responsibilities towards the environment. The Rio convention was in June—after the election. It radically affects the view that we have to take and our judgment of how taxes must be raised. Reducing the quantity of carbon dioxide that the United Kingdom puts into the atmosphere is not easy or cheap. The Government are in earnest. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister put Britain's name to the United Nations convention on climate change. Along with others, we are committed. We have to reduce carbon dixoide emissions by 10 million tonnes by the year 2000. The Budget measures, along with the steps that we have already announced, will deliver a reduction of about 7 million tonnes. We are therefore two thirds of the way to meeting our commitment, less than a year after the Rio convention was signed.

We have carefully chosen the way in which we shall reduce emissions. The extension of VAT to fuel and power will help us to meet our Rio convention commitments and minimise the burden on industry. Indeed, it brings domestic consumers of fuel and power into line with industrial and commercial consumers, who already have to pay VAT on their energy bills.

The House will recall the dreadful humbug that we have heard from Opposition Members. Labour's election manifesto of April 1992 proclaimed:

"The greatest challenge we face is the responsibility to ensure the survival of the planet."

Opposition Members might have done better to concentrate on the survival of the Labour party.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Portillo: I shall give way later. I am coming to the hon. Gentleman.

The leader of the Labour party was up there, leading on greenery. He said:

"Protection of the world environment must move to the top of the international agenda."

Bravely said. There he is—the jolly, green giant of Monklands, East. His words were fine, but where is the beef? Labour talks about the environment; it lectures about the environment; it preaches about the environment; it chops down trees and prints policy documents about the environment. But anyone who studies Labour very closely will find no green roots—a few green nuts perhaps, but no green roots.

How would Labour achieve our Rio commitments? Would it perhaps impose a national speed limit of 35 mph? Would it introduce a new Eurotax? Would it build more nuclear power stations? Or would it close all the coal pits in the country? The decisions that we have made take us two thirds of the way to meeting our commitment, two thirds of the way to Rio—just about as far as Caracas. The Labour party has not got as far as Clapham junction.

Mr. Chris Smith: The right hon. Gentleman may like to tell us why his proposal to impose VAT on domestic fuel will reduce carbon dioxide emissions by less than 1 per cent. He may also want to remind the House that the Labour party's proposal, published a month ago, on a national programme for energy efficiency work would be four times as successful, at no cost to the taxpayer, and with no imposition on households.

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman must acknowledge that the VAT change will enable us to achieve 15 per cent. of the Rio commitment. It will account for 1·5 million tonnes of the 10 million tonnes to which I have referred. The hon. Gentleman's remarks puzzle me very much. I have here a copy of something he wrote in Green magazine of February 1993—just last month:

"Back in 1990 I proposed a series of small but effective tax measures, none of which have yet been put into practice. If I were Secretary of State now I would twist the Chancellor's arm right up his back to see these implemented."

So what are these tax changes that the Labour party wants to introduce? Not VAT, perhaps? If they did not involve VAT, however, by now the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East would surely have risen to say that he would definitely repeal the imposition of VAT on fuel and power. We are led to the interesting conclusion that what we have done is precisely what Labour proposes to do.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Chief Secretary is talking nonsense. If he had eyes in his head, he would have read the proposals for tax changes that we published in full three years ago. We stand by those proposals, not one of which included the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel.

Mr. Portillo: I will tell the hon. Gentleman how I reached my conclusions. I note that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has not chosen to deny the charges that have been put to him. He has visited one studio after another, but he has not once denied that he will maintain VAT charges on fuel and power. When asked about it by my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), he made no answer. Silence was not only golden in this instance; silence was Gordon.

I have examined the matter closely. Watson might say, "Very curious, Holmes", but it is not all that curious, Watson. Labour's policy document "Looking to the Future" stated:

[Mr. Portillo]

"Zero-rating on items such as food, fares, books, and children's clothing should remain."

Hon. Members should note that, cunningly, the document did not mention fuel and power. A most significant omission, Watson. The document went on to say:

"We will look at ways of . . . increasing taxes on environmentally damaging products".

Aha! I deduce from that passage that Labour was planning to put VAT on fuel and power all along. Elementary, my dear Watson—but there is more.

A Labour document produced after the election, entitled "Agenda for Change", talked of "developing a range of green taxation incentives" and "fiscal incentives". Most tellingly of all, only a month ago Tribune stated:

"Labour's Shadow Chancellor is expected to announce . . . proposals for green taxation".

What a dreadful end. Hanged, Watson, with words from his own mouth!

The Budget helps business. It helps exporters, by increasing export cover; it helps British companies, and foreign-owned companies that want to invest in Britain, by tackling the problem of surplus advance corporation tax; it helps small firms by encouraging fixed-rate lending; it helps entrepreneurs by letting them reinvest the capital gains that they make from selling their businesses; it helps the construction industry by setting out new plans to build the channel tunnel rail link and the Heathrow Express; it helps the self-employed by offering them perhaps the greatest ever package of deregulation for small businesses, covering self-assessment, statutory audit, VAT cash accounting, bad debt relief and VAT penalties; and it helps every one of the 800,000 businesses that were facing large increases in their rates bills.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East concentrated much of his speech on unemployment, but I found his lack of grasp alarming. His prescription is "First tackle unemployment; recovery will follow." Dr. Brown treats the symptom first, rather than the disease. In fact, Governments must first provide for recovery; then they can secure lower unemployment. The order cannot be reversed. In his speech today, the hon. Gentleman was hopelessly confused on that point, expressing the belief that reducing unemployment would produce recovery. That is a complete misunderstanding of the position.

In a Guardian interview on Saturday, the hon. Gentleman committed the Labour party not only to full employment, but to full and fulfilling employment for everyone—not just jobs, he said, but good jobs. That is an admirable aspiration, but, with the hon. Gentleman's policies, it is an impossible dream. The hon. Member for Peckham has been more cautious. I think that she may be developing some chief secretarial tendencies after all. Interviewed on Channel 4 by Vincent Hanna, the hon. Lady said:

"What we are committed to is full employment redefined to take account of the changing circumstances of the economy."

Vincent Hanna said:

"So it's not full employment."

The hon. Lady replied:

"No, it's just a new definition of full employment."

However redefined, full and fulfilling employment for all would not be achieved by Labour. The party's claims are a sham, a cruel deceit of the unemployed and a remarkable piece of political dishonesty. The truth is that Governments cannot spend their way out of unemployment; what we can do is help the unemployed to improve their skills. The long-term unemployed can lose both skills and motivation, but the Budget contains measures specifically designed to help them. A total of 30,000 long-term unemployed will be able to take courses at colleges of further education, and will receive an allowance based on their benefit. We shall enable 60,000 more to tackle the tasks that are crying out to be performed in our communities.

On top of that, we shall set up innovative pilot schemes, paying a subsidy to employers who take people on to their books after they have been out of work for a long period. The subsidy will be based on benefit rates. It will be withdrawn in stages, but we hope that, by then, many of the people concerned will have proved themselves, and that their employers will be happy to keep them on. Those are truly pioneering schemes, and they have been widely welcomed.

These Budget schemes cost money—£230 million in all. Our latest proposals add to the large amount that the Government already spend on training and help for the unemployed. We are now spending £2·8 billion a year on helping the unemployed, and offering 1·5 million opportunities. If those whom we are now training are to find jobs in future, however, we need sustained recovery and a sound economy. Unemployment can be brought down; jobs can be created. Between 1984 and 1990, the United Kingdom economy produced 3 million extra jobs. That was the best performance in Europe. Even now, Britain still has more people in work than it had 10 years ago, and more of the work force are employed than in any other major European Community country.

We have the conditions for recovery and job creation. We have the lowest interest rates in Europe; inflation is below the European average and at its lowest level for a quarter of a century; we have the lowest corporation tax rates in the European Community or the G7; we have a top income tax rate of 40 per cent., which is much lower than the top rate in Italy, Germany and France; we have rising manufacturing investment, rising productivity—it is rising faster than it has for five years—rising manufacturing exports, the highest level that we have ever had, and rising business optimism: it is at its highest for five years. Moreover, the punitive regulations of the social chapter will apply to others, but not to us. For that reason, foreign companies are flocking to the United Kingdom.

The Budget has created the conditions for a lasting recovery. It helps business and tackles Government borrowing: it provides a climate for growth. British business is enjoying low inflation and low interest rates. It knows that the Government are responsive to wealth creators; it sees that we have established a clear strategy to control spending and raise revenue. That is the achievement of this Budget and that is why I commend it to the House.

4.48 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): As I listened to the Chief Secretary, I recalled that he had written a pamphlet entitled "A Vision for the 1990s". I wondered whether this was the Chief Secretary who argued in the pamphlet for "an ultra low tax, high growth economy."

He is the Chief Secretary who has to describe to us an economy which is not growing and who is trying to defend a Budget which includes significant tax increases. However, he is also the Chief Secretary who wrote in the pamphlet:

"No Conservative can want to rest at present levels of taxation in Britain."

He has certainly given a new meaning to that phrase.

It has now become clear that the Government are a tax-raising Government. Of course, that was the case before it was less clear. The Government have raised taxes regularly and consistently. The question that the Chief Secretary left with us, even at the end of his speech, is how much more are the Government prepared to raise taxes in order to deal with the public sector borrowing requirement which they forecast? Even on the Government's own assumptions about recovery, there is a £30 billion PSBR at the end of the period described in the forecast. From what the Chief Secretary said, that does not sound like something he is prepared to accept or approve. Is there a further strategy of more tax increases if the Government are shown to have been too optimistic and if the recovery does not occur? That is the question that Ministers must answer in the debate.

It is a question asked not only by hon. Members but by the markets and those who lend to the Government. If the Government are so confident, one wonders why they are prepared to offer such a high real rate of return on gilts to the market. If inflation is going to be kept down to the extent that the Government prophesy, they are offering a very favourable rate of return on gilts.

The Budget confirms failure and does not build success. The price of that failure is visited heavily on the many families and individuals on low and modest incomes, through the 1p on national insurance and the 17·5 per cent. value added tax for fuel. The useful aspects of the Budget, such as the adoption—on a limited basis—of our proposal to convert benefits into a job subsidy for the long-term unemployed, are simply not enough to speed up recovery.

Of course, I welcome the fact that the Government have shown an interest in our proposal, but I was surprised that they want to limit it to people who have been unemployed for two years. Many more people who have been unemployed for between six months and two years could also benefit from the scheme. The idea of introducing only a pilot study will mean that, on the Government's best assumptions, a maximum of only 10,000 people can be helped. We believe that many more could be helped without significant cost to the Exchequer. The idea is to transfer benefits to a job subsidy. Our proposals involved transferring only part of the benefits so that any displacement costs would be covered. However, the job-encouraging projects are not sufficient to speed up recovery, and nor are the capital projects.

Very little is new in the capital projects which the Chancellor chose to mention yesterday. The Heathrow link has been with us for ages, and proposals and Bills have been before the House for a long time. It is no great new bonus to the construction industry. The channel tunnel link has been thrown into absolute confusion by the Government's announcement. British Rail has done all its work for a King's Cross terminal, but the terminal is now to be at St. Pancras. We hope that the project will go ahead, but it will be delayed and further confused. It seems that crossrail will disappear without trace on the basis of yesterday's announcement.

Let us consider the autumn statement. We were told, very disingenuously, that the Jubilee line was to go ahead. That announcement was made in the autumn statement, but the line is still not going ahead because the private sector does not think that the funding which the Government have so far offered is adequate. That was the case when the announcement was made, and it is still the case. The capital projects are far too limited to promote a real recovery.

What does the Budget tell us about the general economy? It tells us how big a mess the Government have got us into—a £50 billion deficit and little sign of the promised post-election recovery. We were promised, as soon as it was announced that the Conservatives had won the election, that recovery would take off. It did not happen. Instead, we have massive unemployment, which makes the debt problem spiral. We cannot tax our way out of that spiral. We must reduce unemployment if we are to give confidence to business and to individuals.

Individuals do not rush out to buy goods in the shops, even if interest rates are lower, because they fear that they or their families will be hit by unemployment. They may now fear that they will be hit hard by the tax changes which are to come. Even if it is relatively cheap to borrow capital, businesses will not borrow if they see no prospect of selling the goods that they make because they will not have a return on that capital.

It is necessary to have capital spending of a kind that will benefit the construction industry. It is necessary to have a job start scheme on a much larger scale. It is also necessary to help small businesses—an area in which the Government have taken up a number of the ideas that we and small business organisations suggested to them.

In some cases, the Government could have done more. The VAT threshold for accounting could have been raised to a much higher level. The Chief Secretary must bear in mind that companies which have tried to cut their costs or have tried to expand by moving premises will not benefit from transitional relief, so they still have the problem of the uniform business rate. There were some helpful changes in that sector, but they do not add up to enough to make the vital difference.

A more comprehensive programme of the kind that we advocate would need to be backed by an anti-inflation monetary discipline, but we do not have that. The Chancellor was fascinating and revealing on the subject of the exchange rate mechanism. He explained what a good thing it had been and how valuable in reducing inflation but how much better off we were going to be now that we were out of it. He made it sound as if we had been to a health farm for a couple of weeks to lose weight, but, thank goodness, we did not need to go back again. It is not like that. Sooner or later we shall need to apply an effective anti-inflation discipline again, but we do not have it. All that we have is a series of indicators from which the Chancellor can pick and choose, depending on how he feels when he gets up in the morning. That is not a coherent or understood basis for monetary policy, and not one on which the Government and the markets can rely.

With neither the type of programme nor the discipline that I have described, we face the prospect of sustained high unemployment as well as a continuing high public sector borrowing requirement, even if the Chancellor's optimism is justified. How is that hole to be filled? That question has not been answered.

[Mr. A. J. Beith]

Let us consider the tax measures that the Government have introduced. The Chancellor announced the tax on domestic fuel with a thinly veiled attempt to curry the support of the Eurosceptics in his party. That technique has not been developed very successfully by Government Whips in any event but, in this case, the Chancellor tried to curry that support by arguing that it would be not a European but a British tax. The Eurosceptics might be expected to oppose the harmonisation of VAT rates, but the Chancellor said that there would be no nasty European energy tax for us as we have a much nastier tax of our own.

It is much nastier because it is not an energy or resource tax. It is not directed at resource use or pollution. Orimulsion and windpower are taxed on the same basis under VAT. Oil and solar power have the same impost levied on them under VAT. They will attract VAT of 17·5 per cent., as will the standing charge which is so hated by pensioners who try to keep down their energy costs. All will be subject to 17·5 per cent. VAT. The new arrangement does not discriminate as a carbon, energy or resource tax would.

Just such a tax is on the agenda of the Council of Ministers and will come up in April under the Danish presidency. It appears that it is backed by a great deal of Danish commitment. The Chancellor has sought to pre-empt the decision by substituting a tax which does not draw any distinction on the basis of energy efficiency, of pollution or of resource use. It is a tax designed to raise revenue, but the Chancellor would be a very disappointed man if it achieved its effect. If the tax had the effect of drastically reducing energy consumption, he would not get his revenue.

The tax will not have that effect because it is targeted at those whose demand for energy cannot be elastic. It is directed not at industry but at the ordinary domestic consumer. It will bear heavily on families who have no choice, especially tenants of badly built houses, which are not energy efficient. Those people have no choice about where to live—they probably live in the only house allocated to them when they applied to the council. The tax will hit pensioners hard, especially in the north and in Scotland where energy costs are necessarily higher. The unspecified benefit changes, which the Chief Secretary was unable to define or explain, will not help those who are just above the benefit levels.

It is a stock response of Governments, when introducing a new penal impost, to say, "There is no need to worry, because poor people will be helped by benefits." On the basis of what we have heard today, I do not think that they will—but apart from that, it is on the many people who are struggling to pay their way and who are not entitled to any benefits at all that such a tax bears so heavily. Pensioners with just a little bit of capital saved for their retirement, who receive no benefits because of those savings, will receive no compensation for the energy tax. Working families just above benefit levels are among the people who will be hit hard.

The Chancellor should remember his election campaigns. He should remember the way in which he attacked other parties for the possibility that they might introduce taxes on energy. He has proposed a far more drastic petrol tax than we did, and without any of the safeguards for rural areas. Would he be kind enough to trawl through the stock of Conservative leaflets that argued so vigorously and bitterly that anybody who voted Liberal Democrat risked higher energy charges, especially charges on petrol? The Government have gone far beyond anything that we proposed in either direction.

Let us examine the other key taxation element in the Budget—personal taxation. The most devious tax increase is the raising of employee's national insurance contributions. In all but name, that is an increase in income tax —something that the Conservatives said that they would not introduce. It is even worse than an increase in income tax, because it is not as fair. It does not apply to higher levels of income, and makes the anomalies of the national insurance system even worse—national insurance does not apply to perks and all the other factors that the income tax system covers. That is because of the distinctive, and now outdated, character of the national insurance contribution.

The Chancellor tried to justify the increase in national insurance contributions by saying that there was a shortfall in the national insurance fund. But Ministers know perfectly well that the fund has become a fiction, and that there will still be a shortfall in it. This is a tax increase, and it was designed to be a tax increase—but it is a badly designed tax increase.

The broadening of the 20p income tax band is worth only £25 next year for someone earning as little as £5,500 a year. That will not even offset the increase in employees' national insurance contributions. Someone on average earnings will be £125 worse off because of the increase in national insurance contributions, even after the extension of the 20p income tax band has been accounted for. When the freezing of the personal allowance has been taken into account such a person will be £215 worse off. Ministers' descriptions of what they are doing have not been entirely accurate or fair.

Mortgage interest tax relief is another subject on which Ministers have consistently attacked other parties for considering measures on which they themselves are now embarking. I vividly remember how, during the general election campaign, our proposals for radical reform of mortgage interest tax relief were furiously attacked by Ministers who implied that Conservatives would never touch this sacred benefit—it was to be preserved for all time. Now they have restricted mortgage tax relief further, but there has been no genuine radical reform. The Government are not transferring help to poorer people so that they can buy houses.

The basic trouble with the system, even when it is modified by being restricted to the 20p rate, is that it still gives a lot more help to people who can afford to buy larger and more expensive houses, with larger mortgages. Furthermore, people paying little or no tax cannot benefit from the relief. There is no longer the old alternative of the option mortgage scheme that used to direct help to people on low incomes who were trying to buy houses.

The Government seem to recognise that mortgage interest tax relief is not a good system. Indeed, I believe that there is increasing recognition of that fact even among Conservatives who fought the election pledged to preserve the system for ever. However, if the Government intend to reform the system, they should do so in ways that genuinely help people suffering hardship, and assist the housing market, too.

There are in the Budget measures helpful to industry and small business. Some of them, such as the cash accounting on VAT, are cut-down versions of our proposals. Several measures have, rightly, been welcomed by the CBI and other industrial organisations.

The advance corporation tax proposal is so complicated that I decline to give a more considered judgment on it until I have examined it for a lot longer—but action clearly needed to be taken, because the old system operated against the interests of some of our best and most efficient exporting companies. I hope that the Government have got it right. We shall discover whether they have when we examine the measure in more detail in the Finance Bill.

My anxiety is that the changes do not add up to a programme that will restore confidence, let alone a programme to rebuild the manufacturing industry about which the Prime Minister now says that he has always been concerned. The Budget is the bill that taxpayers are having to meet for the catastrophic mismanagement of the economy under the Conservatives. It does not relieve that bill with any adequate stimulus for recovery, and it exacts payment through the very taxes that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor promised not to increase—the very taxes that they accused other parties of favouring. That is not so much the Clinton approach as the Bush approach —one goes into an election campaign denouncing things which one then goes on to do. Perhaps the Conservatives will be able to demonstrate that that is the only way to win general elections. That would be a cynical commentry on the way in which politics have developed. The Conservatives have debased politics by seeking election on a platform of low taxes while pursuing a policy of high taxes,

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall his party's document, "The Policy Declaration for the Social and Liberal Democrats", dated 1988 which says:

> "The party should therefore not be afraid . . . to extend VAT over several years to food, children's clothing, domestic fuel, newspapers and financial services"?

Will he comment on that?

Mr. Beith: I recall that document vividly, and also how totally it was repudiated within six hours of its having been produced by the two then leaders of the party. I recall that occasion with special affection, because I was one of those who was most determined to repudiate the document. On this matter it was plain wrong, and I am sorry that the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards) has not only read it but been influenced by it, and is pursuing part of the policy set out in it. In that respect it was plain wrong. I said so at the time, and so did my parliamentary colleagues, which is why the document never became party policy.

I was arguing that the Government have bebased politics by seeking election on a platform of low taxes while pursuing a policy of high taxes. They have reduced the economy to the point at which, according to their own forecasts, even the large tax increases proposed will achieve not a balanced budget but a £30 billion deficit. The Government should go.

I believe that the British public are entitled to a re-run of the general election, in which the Conservative party is required to stand on the policies that it is in fact pursuing. I invite the Prime Minister to arrange just such a re-run of the general election. I am sorry that, for the saddest of reasons, it is only the voters of Newbury who will have the opportunity to deliver that judgment.

5.7 pm

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I hope that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will forgive me if I do not follow him exactly, except to say that I was interested to hear another example of the typical Liberal Democrat party posture of having a new policy every day. If the policy that they have tomorrow does not suit them, they change it for the day after tomorrow.

The right hon. Gentleman used words such as "catastrophic failure of economic policy" to describe the Government's performance. I guess that, in the middle of the recession, opposition parties all round the world are using that parrot cry about the Governments with which they are confronted. It is not very constructive.

I hope that my remarks will be short, and I shall divide them into two parts. First I shall speak about the Budget; secondly, I want to express my significant anxieties about where it leaves us for the future.

I welcome the Budget, which I believe is constructive and helpful. I especially welcome some parts of it. In my constituency, where there are many small businesses, the measures proposed by the Chancellor, especially those on VAT, will be a huge help. I hope that the House will endorse those measures when the time comes. I declare an interest as a director of Blagden Industries. We have been enormously penalised by the imposition of advance corporation tax, so I welcome the proposed changes to that.

I want to be brief, so I shall not dwell further on the Budget, except to say that I have grave anxieties about a public sector borrowing requirement of £50 billion this year. That is too much. Although the Government are right to spend more in a recession and to put up their borrowing requirement—Keynes is not yet dead, I guess —I point out to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary that I told him some weeks ago that there should be significant increases in taxation, given that level of public sector borrowing requirement.

I hope that the Government have gone far enough in the Budget. I am enormously concerned to read the public sector borrowing requirement projections for the years ahead. They are summarised on the second page of the pamphlet published by the Treasury yesterday which is entitled, "The Budget in brief". Table 1, which deals with the public sector borrowing requirement, shows that, starting from £50 billion in 1993-94, there is a continuing PSBR, ending with £30 billion in the financial year 1997-98. When one adds up the figures, one realises that the horrific figure for the PSBR in the six years up to and including 1997-98 is no less than £233 billion. That figure should cause every one of us, especially Opposition Front-Bench Members who have been pleading for more and more Government spending, to hesitate.

I am really alarmed when I see in the Red Book what is projected to be the cost of servicing that massive debt. I invite the House to turn to page 73 of the Red Book and to look at the figures for central Government debt interest. The figure is due to rise from £17·5 billion in 1992-93 to £26 billion in 1995-96. What the Red Book does not make clear is the figures that are made clear in "The Budget in brief". In the extra two years up to 1997-98, there is a further PSBR of £35 billion in 1996-97 and another £30 billion in 1997-98.

It is almost impossible to avoid the conclusion that, in 1997-98, we are likely to have to look for £30 billion in debt interest. We shall be in the most uncomfortable position in that year, because, while borrowing £30 billion, we shall have to find another £30 billion to pay the interest on the debts that we have incurred.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): I am interested in what the right hon. Gentleman says, because I have also noticed the figures. Does he think that the figures given for debt interest are too low, given that the total debt at that time must be more than £400 billion? Surely the Government must be projecting a debt interest rate of about 7 or 8 per cent. per annum. I fear that, with that level of debt, we shall not get money at such a rate of interest.

Mr. Jopling: If the hon. Gentleman looks at table 1 in "The Budget in brief", he will see just above the figures I mentioned for PSBR for six years the figures for the percentage of gross domestic product. It is all right to have a relatively high percentage in a single year, or even for two or three years. I commended the Government for that. However, to continue that for six years—as I said, the figure is £233 billion over six years—should cause anxiety to all of us.

I attempted to examine the implications of that huge bill in debt interest for the future rate of taxation necessary to pay for it. Having consulted the autumn statement tax ready reckoner, which the House has before it, I am forced to this conclusion. Revalued to 1993-94 prices, the increase in central Government debt interest from £17·5 billion in 1992-93 to £26 billion in 1995-96 is equivalent to about £6 billion. To raise that additional revenue at 1993-94 income levels would require an increase in the standard rate of VAT of about 2·75 per cent. or an increase in the basic rate of income tax of about 3·5 per cent., assuming that the increases applied for a full year.

I have made it clear that the figures in the Red Book take us only up to 1995-96 whereas the PSBR projections go up to 1997-98. There is a further £65 billion of debt added in the final two years. Extrapolating from those figures, the implication of what is in the pamphlet is that paying for that debt would require either an increase in VAT at that time of 4 per cent. or an increase in income tax of 5 per cent.

Mr. Townend: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an alternative? That alternative is to take a long and hard look at public spending.

Mr. Jopling: I am coming precisely to that point, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising it. My hon. Friend has arrived at the next point in my thought process slightly before I got to it. The figures for debt interest in the years ahead just will not do. The Government really cannot go on on the basis of those figures for the years ahead.

The Treasury has three options for dealing with the situation, which will otherwise be intolerable. The first is to increase taxation. The second is to spend far less, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) suggested. The third is to engineer much faster growth in the economy. The Government are likely to have to do all three. I hope that they will not cringe from further taxation in the November Budget or after that.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will be more than usually tough and hard in the public expenditure survey round, which I presume will be, as usual, in the summer and autumn. I hope that the Chancellor will continue to do what he has been doing to encourage business, to encourage the economy and to get more growth. Clearly, that is a way in which we can find the funds to deal with the extremely worrying situation that will develop.

To sum up, the Government have been correct this year, but the projections for the next four years are unacceptable. There is a great deal of hard work to be done, and the Government will have to take a great many tough decisions. I urge them not to shrink from taking them.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): There were great hopes that yesterday's Budget would be a Budget for jobs. Sadly, however, those hopes have been dashed. The whole country needs a Budget for jobs, given that, even according to the Government's official figures, there are 3 million people unemployed. We all know that the Government have tried to fiddle the figures more than 20 times and that the real level of unemployment is over the 4 million mark, which means that unemployment has quadrupled since the Tories came to power.

Much has been said about the social cost of unemployment, but the economic cost is also considerable. It costs the Treasury about £9,000 per year to keep a person on the dole rather than in work. That means that, even on the Government's figure of 3 million, the total cost per year is £27 billion. It is surely common sense to ask why we cannot invest that kind of money in the creation of real jobs and real training opportunities for unemployed people. Why cannot we invest in the construction industry, in housing improvement and insulation programmes, in the provision of infrastructure, in the electrification of the railways and in the many socially useful as well as economically viable projects required throughout the country? The Chancellor specifically mentioned the Heathrow Express and the link from the channel tunnel to St. Pancras. But what about high-speed rail links with the channel tunnel from Scotland and the north of England? I detected no mention of them in the Chancellor's statement.

The Chancellor announced only a few measures that might help a maximum of 100,000 unemployed people—a mere 2·5 per cent. of the total. In Scotland alone, 62,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost in the past three years and more than 10,000 businesses have collapsed in the past year.

The Scottish manufacturing base has been decimated to such an extent that we are surely entitled to look to the Government for special measures to assist what industry we have left in Scotland. Take the Scotch whisky industry, for example. Taking into account the employment generated indirectly by that industry—in bottling, packaging and so on—it employs about 70,000 people, which is a considerable number. Yet a few weeks ago,

United Distillers proposed 700 redundancies and several plant closures, including the closure of the Rosebank distillery in my constituency.

Part of the problem facing the industry and those employed in it is the unfair competition that is the direct result of the lack of fairness in the Government's own tax regime. It is no use blaming the European Community, because the Government have the power to take unilateral initiatives to try to create a level playing field. Although they took one small step in that direction yesterday, there is still a long way to go to end the tax discrimination against the Scotch whisky industry, the unfair competition from imported wines from France, and so on. I urge the Chief Secretary to pass on that message to the Chancellor. We are grateful for small mercies, but it is about time that the Government took much more radical measures to help the industry.

The Budget is also a Budget of broken commitments. The Government have clearly reneged on their election promises not to extend the scope of VAT and not to increase national insurance contributions. They have done both. The 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions is, in reality, a tax increase. In fact, it is worse—and more regressive—because it will hit people on lower incomes even harder.

Probably the worst feature of the Budget, and the one that has deservedly come in for the most scathing criticism, is the proposal to impose VAT on domestic fuel and power. The Chanceller tried to justify it yesterday by claiming that other European countries do not zero-rate domestic fuel and power. Let me give him another European comparison. There has been a higher percentage increase in the number of winter deaths in this country than in other European countries of a similar climate. Many of those deaths are caused by hypothermia and other cold-related diseases.

Pensioners and families on low incomes are suffering from fuel poverty to such an extent that, particularly during the winter months, many of them face a choice between eating and heating; they cannot afford both. In Britain today, there are about 6 million homes that cannot be heated to the basic standards for healthy living set by the World Health Organisation. The 17·5 per cent. increase in domestic fuel bills will make matters considerably worse.

The Chancellor said yesterday that there will be additional help from the Department of Social Security for people on income support, but the Chief Secretary gave no commitment to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) who asked whether that additional help would meet the whole of the additional fuel burden that people on low incomes face.

The Campaign for Cold Weather Credits has been fighting for some time for a more equitable system of assistance to help people on low incomes meet their fuel bills during the winter. It suggested the extension of the £6 per week cold weather allowance—which is not very much, after all—to all recipients of income support during the months December to March inclusive. I understand that the total cost of that would be about £550 million. However, when I wrote to the Secretary of State for Social Services suggesting that that scheme be adopted, I received an unsympathetic and negative reply, so I am not hopeful. We shall have to wait and see what the Secretary of State comes up with in his statement, which I hope will be made soon.

The fact remains that there are many individuals and families on low incomes who do not qualify for income support and, according to the Chancellor's statement yesterday, they will get no assistance whatever to help them meet the 17·5 per cent. increase in their fuel bills.

It is ironic that many of the victims of fuel poverty are literally sitting on top of hundreds of thousands of tonnes of viable and workable coal reserves which are in danger of being abandoned because of the Government's nonsensical energy policy and proposed pit closures.

As the Liberal spokesman, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), said, it is undoubtedly a feature of the Budget that people on low incomes are being asked to pay for the Government's economic failures. From when the Conservative Government came to power until the end of the last financial year, the Treasury received £132 billion in revenue from North sea oil and proceeds from privatisation of various industries and public services. What have the Government done with that money? Instead of investing it in our future, they have frittered much of it away in tax benefits to their rich friends.

Investment in manufacturing industry is 6 per cent. lower than it was in 1979. Manufacturing trade has been in deficit since 1983. As the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) said, the public sector borrowing requirement is at an intolerably high level. The Government's own estimate for the next financial year is £50 billion. The Government have brought the country to the brink of economic ruin and we would be down the plug hole completely if it were not for the proceeds of privatisation and North sea oil revenues.

Sadly, the Budget is a missed opportunity. It will do nothing to promote economic recovery. It will do nothing to create real jobs or training opportunities for unemployed people. It will do nothing to create or redistribute wealth. It will reduce the living standards of people on low incomes and try to make them pay for the economic failures of this discredited Government.

The only consolation is that yesterday's Budget statement will probably be the last to be made by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. His departure will not be regretted and I hope that he will take the Chief Secretary to the Treasury with him.

5.31 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I shall dwell on the last comment of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) because it is frightfully important. I very much hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) delivers the next Budget and the next public expenditure round with my right hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo). It is essential that the policy which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced yesterday is seen through.

I have never suggested to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister whom he should or should not have in his Cabinet, but I intend to do so today. I hope that he will bear it in mind. It is essential that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer should present the next Budget, and especially the one after that, because he must see through the strategy that he produced yesterday for economic recovery and to deal with the public sector borrowing requirement.

[Mr. Michael Brown]

I have absolute confidence in the Chancellor of the Exchequer. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] I will tell Opposition Members why. Yesterday's Budget was the 15th that I have listened to on these Benches. The Budget which I cheered most loudly was the one delivered in 1981 by Lord Howe.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): It did not get the hon. Gentleman a job though, did it?

Mr. Brown: No, it did not get me a job, but it won the 1983 general election. It sowed the seeds for winning the 1987 general election. The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) seems more interested in jobs here. I am interested in jobs out there in the constituencies. I am more interested in jobs in Brigg and Cleethorpes than the hon. Gentleman is interested in jobs.

The Budget in 1981 sowed the seeds for our election victory in 1983. It sowed the seeds for the whole recovery of the 1980s. I cheered that Budget to the echo. It was received with total consternation by Opposition Members, and not a little consternation by Conservative Members. Yesterday, my cheers for the Budget were second only to my cheers for the Budget in 1981.

This is only the second time that I have sought to catch the eye of the Chair in a Budget debate. The last time was in 1981. What moved me to speak in that debate was what moved me to speak in the debate today. The devastating state of the economy in the late 1970s led the then Chancellor of the Exchequer to take some brave and bold decisions in 1981. He had to balance the need to restructure the British economy and take it out of recession with the need to deal with the burgeoning PSBR which had defeated Labour Governments throughout the 1970s.

Similarly, yesterday, the Chancellor, faced with the world recession and its consequences for Britain as we come out of that recession into recovery, had to deal with the problems that recessions create for the PSBR. I endorse the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling).

The hon. Member for Hartlepool might be interested to know that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer is the first since I have been a member of the Parliament who has been kind enough to seek my views on what should be in the Budget. So I am making slow progress. My right hon. Friend asked me at lunch earlier this year at No. 11 Downing Street what I thought should be in the Budget. My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) was present, and will testify to this. The only thing that I asked my right hon. Friend to do was to tax, tax hard, tax heavily and tax as soon as possible. That is not something that I like saying, but it has to be done, for the reasons that my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale gave.

My only slight criticism of yesterday's Budget was that the medicine which was poured out should have been swallowed by the country today rather than next year or the year after. However, I fully appreciate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to make a judgment and balance the need to ensure that the fragile recovery is not jeopardised with the need to make sure that we deal with the PSBR.

For precisely the reasons that my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale said were in the Red Book, if one looked closely, and in the Budget package which we received from the Vote Office, there will be consequences if we delay dealing with the PSBR now in respect of the additional moneys which my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will have to find to service that PSBR. It is essential to deal with it.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was involved in the public expenditure round last autumn. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House cheered that public expenditure statement to the echo. I was more hesitant with my cheers then, since I felt that the public expenditure settlement was reasonably generous. I knew that there would be consequences, and we heard them in the Budget yesterday.

I give my right hon. Friends the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer every encouragement to take whatever difficult decisions have to be taken, even if they impact on the various spending hobby horses which every hon. Member in the House has. I have my own. I fully acknowledge that I may have to make sacrifices.

One thing is clear. I support the Government's economic policies, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because if you come to Brigg and Cleethorpes, you will see the recovery taking place. Even Opposition Members and the hon. Member for Hartlepool might make a journey to my constituency. They will see for themselves that today unemployment in my constituency is below the national average, whereas it touched just over 20 per cent. in the 1980s, due to the decline in the steel and fishing industries. It is an industrial constituency and unemployment is now below the level at the 1987 general election.

Mr. Mandelson: If, as the hon. Gentleman said, recovery has come to his constituency, can he answer two questions? First, why has unemployment risen by 2,000 in his constituency during the past two years? Secondly, if recovery has occurred, would he tell us the secret of his constituency's success, so that we can share it?

Mr. Brown: Yes, I would be happy to do so. First, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman goes to the Library and looks at the figures for my constituency before he quotes statistics. Two years ago, in January 1991, unemployment was 3,932, and in January 1993 it was 5,267. I do not know whether, if one subtracts one from the other, the answer is 2,000.

Mr. Mandelson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No. I now understand why the Labour party has such difficulty with figures. They cannot even get them right when they make cheap political jibes about other people's constituencies.

If the hon. Member for Hartlepool cannot be bothered to go and look for himself, I can tell him that there were massive redundancies in the steel industry in the early 1980s. Thanks to the Conservative Government's infrastructure policies, my constituency was made a development area, whereas previously it was an assisted area.

In the early 1980s, thanks to my noble Friend Lord Joseph, we secured two enterprise zones for my constituency. If the hon. Member for Hartlepool took a journey along the River Humber today, he would first see SCM Chemicals, a Hanson Trust company, which employs about 700 people.

If he had accompanied me to my constituency last Friday, he would have had the opportunity to go to Hydro Fertilisers, which is a large chemical factory—[Laughter.] It is no laughing matter. That large company is based in my constituency and employs about 1,000 people. Last Friday, I attended the opening of its new nitric acid plant, which involved a £5 million investment.

If the hon. Member for Hartlepool had accompanied me to my constituency two weeks ago, he would have been able to enjoy a visit by the President of the Board of Trade, who performed the topping-out ceremony at the—[Laughter.] The hon. Member for Hartlepool seems to think that this is a laughing matter.

Mr. Mandelson: It is hilarious.

Mr. Brown: He says that it is hilarious. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade performed the topping-out ceremony at Kimberly-Clark's Kleenex factory, which will create 700 jobs at the end of the year and 2,700 jobs by the end of next year.

Mr. Portillo: I wonder whether my hon. Friend listened to the Opposition going on earlier about unemployment and manufacturing industry, and whether he can account for the fact that, when he mentioned jobs, manufacturing industry and companies by their names, Opposition Members were convulsed with hilarity.

Mr. Mandelson: It's the way he tells 'em.

Mr. Brown: I cannot account for the reaction of Opposition Members when confronted with the reality of the recovery. I cannot understand Opposition Members' hilarity when I mentioned the employment and expansion policies of companies along the Humber estuary, but I shall ensure that my constituents are made aware of their attitude to serious evidence.

We shall leave the Kimberly-Clark factory, where the President of the Board of Trade performed the topping-out ceremony, and move on to Associated British Ports, which runs a large dock in my constituency—the port of Immingham—where jobs are increasing monthly. Then, we arrive at the power stations. The construction industry has been busy, and fabrication yards in south Humberside full, as National Power and PowerGen's power stations near completion.

The shadow Secretary of State for the Environment, along with other Opposition Members, made much of dealing with the Rio summit and of how the Labour party would implement its provisions. He attacked the Government for applying value added tax to energy bills. The two power stations in my constituency will be able to generate electricity while emitting no sulphur dioxide and virtually no carbon dioxide. My constituency is at the forefront of ensuring that we produce energy in a way that does not result in carbon dioxide emissions.

I have no difficulty in accepting the provisions in the Budget. They will make an important contribution to the recovery and, more importantly, to dealing with the public sector borrowing requirement.

If Opposition Members would like to visit my constituency, I should be only too happy to escort them and to show them the industrial development there. The infrastructure laid does in the 1980s, as a result of Government investment in roads and the motorway system around south Humberside, is one of the major reasons why we have been able to attract inward investment from abroad. Brigg and Cleethorpes has one of the highest levels of inward investment as a result of policies pursued by the Government and those adopted in the 1980s. Today we are benefiting from the industrial policies of the Government in the early 1980s.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: No. I have already given way once, and I know——

Mr. Howarth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) mentioned Associated British Ports. Would it be appropriate for him to declare his interest, as I understand that he is registered as its parliamentary adviser?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) is fully aware of the procedures on declaring an interest in the House, and I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) is also aware of them.

Mr. Brown: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am proud and happy to declare that I am the parliamentary adviser to ABP, which is one of the largest companies in my constituency and which runs the successful docks at Immingham. I am certainly not ashamed to do so, and I am sorry that I did not declare that I have the great privilege to be its adviser, as ABP employs many of my constituents in Immingham and I wish the company well. I hope that it will go from strength to strength, make more and more profits and generate more and more investment in the Immingham docks, so that yet more people will be employed there. I have no hesitation in saying with pride that I wish that company well.

There are many industrial manufacturing companies in my constituency. Thanks to the successful application of Government policies in the 1980s, there is solid recovery in the British economy. I invite any hon. Member to come to my constituency. I shall be happy to take the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) around Immingham docks. He might then learn why we have made a success of the east coast ports and why the west coast ports, including Liverpool, failed so dismally in the 1980s.

I fully endorse the Budget, and I wish my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary well in their endeavours. I hope that they both continue in their duties at the Treasury for a very long time to come.

5.49 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) went to the lunch at No. 11 and called on the Chancellor to tax and tax again. The question that the Opposition want him to answer is why he did not say the same to his constituents at the general election. That was the big lie told by the Conservative party. This Budget, perhaps more than any other, will go down in history as the one that revealed that that party won the election on a lie that was bound to be found out, because it knew that the promises it gave during that campaign were untrue.

Mr. Michael Brown: My constituents know what I stand for because I have always been described by my political opponents as the arch Thatcherite of south Humberside. Since 1979 I have always made it clear to my constituents that should there be any suggestion of the Government being faced with a deficit in public finances, I would call for taxation to be increased.

Mr. Soley: That is not the answer to my question. The hon. Gentleman went along to lunch with the Chancellor and asked him to tax and tax again, so why did he not say that at the general election? The hon. Gentleman must have known then, in common with all his hon. Friends, that the country was in dire economic straits. We all knew that the public sector borrowing requirement would go up, almost regardless of what the Government did. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that he did not know that, he must be economically blind, because it was known by every economic commentator.

I accept that the Conservative party won the propaganda war of the election, but anyone who knew anything about the true state of the British economy knew that its promises were untrue. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes may talk about the employment opportunities in his constituency, but we remember the Tory poster during the 1979 election campaign, when the hon. Gentleman entered the House, that sported the slogan "Labour isn't working". The level of unemployment under the Conservative Government, however, has been consistently higher than it ever was under the previous Labour Government. It is worth noting that the last time that inflation was as low as it is now was under a Labour Government, when the rate of growth was 2·2 per cent. and unemployment stood at a third of a million. That achievement is a measure of the Government's failure.

The failure of the 1981 Budget, which compounded previous failures, was that it destroyed the industrial base of Britain. In the early 1980s we lost close on one third of our manufacturing capacity. The policies of Lady Thatcher may have been wrong, they may have failed and done enormous damage, but at least they were espoused openly and honestly. At the previous general election the Conservative party acted dishonestly and it knew it. When Lady Thatcher destroyed the manufacturing base of British industry it was inevitable that Britain would have a weak economy. One cannot have a nation state with a weak industrial base and a strong financial structure. Britain dominated the world for so long because of our strong industrial base. Likewise, Germany and Japan have done well in the current financial world because of the strength of their industrial base. If that is taken away, one's financial strength is also lost. That is why the pound was devalued—any country would devalue in such circumstances.

Throughout the 1980s, the Government chipped away at our industrial base in such a way as to leave us terribly exposed. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) won an earlier exchange about Europe with his interpretation of the statistics. The findings behind another statistic, which was issued by the European Community about three weeks ago, should be made crystal clear to everyone. It reveals that, for the first time, the standard of living in Britain is below the average for EC countries. Anyone above the age of 40 will remember that this country was always in the top four in terms of EC standards of living. Now we are below the average; we are one of the poorer nations. The Government, however, try to get away with the lie that, somehow, our situation is comparable with that in other European countries because they, too, are faced with high unemployment or investment problems.

The truth of the matter is that so much damage was done during the 1980s that the Government are now trying to put together the pieces. That is the only thing that one can say in their favour. The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) was right to say that things will get worse. The PSBR will continue to grow until the Government announce the true public expenditure cuts that they need to make, and which the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) would love them to make, to unemployment benefits. The only way in which that can be done, however, is by reducing unemployment, unless one is set on putting the unemployed on the breadline. The Opposition have always argued that one way to get the PSBR under control is not to have a high level of unemployment.

Recently, at Prime Minister's Question Time, the right hon. Gentleman reversed the policy of Lady Thatcher and told me that he sought to achieve full employment. I followed that reply with a written question and, in answer, the right hon. Gentleman defined full employment as high employment with a low level of inflation. To achieve that, however, one's aim must be full employment, but the Government do not accept that. As long as they accept a high level of unemployment, they will, by definition, accept a high level of public expenditure. That will cause them problems because they will either have to make cuts in other expenditure or conceal the dole queues in other ways.

The issue of housing finance has troubled me for a number of years. The Government have addressed it, to a limited extent, in the Budget with their changes to the mortgage income tax relief. For many years I have argued that housing finance has not only aggravated our housing problems, but caused major problems for the British economy.

Our housing crisis need not have arisen. The cuts that the Conservative party made to the provision of council housing were supposed to be designed to allow other houses to be made available for the private rented sector. That did not happen. The private sector represented 14 per cent. of the rented market when the Conservative party inherited it from the Labour Government, but it has now fallen to 7 per cent. The private rented sector is collapsing even though the Government have claimed that they want to enhance it. It is collapsing, and will continue to do so, because of mortgage income tax relief, which has always been a subsidy designed to make buying and selling houses attractive and renting housing, either as a landlord or a tenant, unattractive.

The collapse of the private rented sector has had important consequences and, to be fair, the Government now seem to recognise that, because the Chancellor is now phasing out mortgage income tax relief. That was the clear message from his decision, last year, to get rid of it for top rate taxpayers, as it was from the Government's refusal to upgrade that relief from £30,000 and their decision, yesterday, to reduce it from 25 per cent. to 20 per cent. It is clear that they are phasing out mortgage income tax relief. That is the right thing to do, but I wish that the Government would admit it. The President of the Board of Trade admitted it when he was on the Back Benches and said some six years ago—I have a copy of his speech somewhere—that that relief should be abolished except for first-time buyers. He also said that, in any event, it should be abolished after the first 10 years. I happen to know that a number of people on the Government Front Bench share that view.

When the late Lord Ridley was Secretary of State for the Environment I said that it would be possible to revive the rented sector if all the parties agreed to phase out mortgage income tax relief. At that stage, however, the Government did not want to bite on the bullet, mainly because Lady Thatcher supported the subsidy. It is a common mistake to believe that Lady Thatcher was against subsidies; she was a strong supporter of them for private sector education, private health or house purchase. She would not allow it to be cut. If the late Lord Ridley had had his way, he would also have phased it out. We should have had all-party agreement to phase it out. But the big mistake that the Government are now making is to phase it out without putting anything in its place, which is equally stupid. A subsidy is necessary to help people to buy houses.

The reason why the earlier rescue package failed disasterously was that the Government refused to change the subsidy system. Just over a year ago—I think that it was 18 December 1991—the Government said, in response to fears that they had about the coming general election, that they would introduce a mortgage rescue scheme to rescue 50,000 families. I checked relatively recently and found that the number of families who have been rescued under that scheme is about 140, compared with the 50,000 promised. The reason for the failure is that the Government did not place money in the system to protect people with genuine difficulties over paying their mortgage.

Mortgage income tax relief is a problem and I would support the Government in saying that it should go—the Government should say that it needs to go urgently. Mortgage income tax relief has added about two percentage points to the inflation rate. Every time the Chancellor or a Government Member appears on television to talk about the inflation rate they use the phrase, "excluding mortgage income tax relief or house prices". What they mean and what Lord Lawson said some time ago is that mortgage income tax relief adds about two percentage points to the inflation rate.

The increase in the inflation rate is serious enough in a time of housing boom, but it becomes more serious when added to the other factors of housing finance. Those factors include the equity release that came in the artificial boom years of the mid-1980s, which were thought to be the Thatcher miracle years. At that time about £20 billion a year was released from housing equity as people borrowed money on the value of their houses. However, that process fuelled the import problem as they spent that money on imported goods as we had destroyed our manufacturing base. In doing so, we fuelled the boom. Lord Lawson's big mistake in his Budget was to believe that that boom was based on the real wealth of Britain, rather than artificially engendered manufacturing wealth.

Much of that equity relief came from homes that had been bought under the right-to-buy policy. It is not well known, but the total amount brought into the Exchequer under that policy was £25 billion—equivalent to all the other privatisations put together. If even a significant part of that had been channelled into housing investment, this country would have had not only better housing stock, but a more effective construction industry which was not on the rocks as it is today. Such investment would have produced the other manufacturing advantages that flow from house repairs, maintenance and new-build. It would have helped the furniture and window industries and all those sectors that constitute a large part of Britain's manufacturing base, which is linked to the construction industry and is so important to the underlying base of the economy.

In other countries where there is a healthy rented sector people do not save by buying houses and waiting for house prices to rise so that they get rich. That has not happened here in the past few years, but has normally happened in Britain. In those other countries people save money in banks and investment societies that invest in industry. People in this country have historically relied on house price inflation to make them wealthy. People in our income group—I am referring to those who rely solely on a Member of Parliament's salary, which may not apply to many Conservative Members—rely on getting rich and securing an investment for the future by buying a house that will increase in value over the years. That does not constitute investment in industry or manufacturing—it is the sort of investment that can be released and developed in other ways.

Mortgage income tax relief is also important in relation to the mobility of labour. One problem of the mobility of labour in Britain is the lack of an effective rented sector. Mortgage income tax relief restricts the rented sector so that it is not easy for people to move around. A Welsh miner in the Welsh valleys who loses his job because the Government close a mine can sell his two-bedroomed house for about £10,000, move down the road about 100 miles to Reading—not a big move—where there is some available work and buy a similar house for £100,000. The Government will not achieve mobility of labour in this country until they do something about housing finance.

I regret that the Labour party did not make as much of the housing issue as we should have done in the period leading up to the general election. If we had concentrated on the subject of housing finance we could have won the arguments, not merely on housing, but on finance and the British economy. At that time, I had developed policies designed to reform housing finance and create a level playing field for the rented sector and the ownership sector. Banks and building societies were queuing up to talk to me about how to do that.

I believed that a key issue was the need for a housing investment bank. Initially, I suggested that the Government should set up a housing investment bank into which money released from capital receipts could be invested. The sum involved would then have been about £6 billion or £7 billion, which would have provided a good package on which local authorities could draw over a period. It would also have attracted private sector money to create expansion in the rented sector.

Initially, I thought that the Government would have to set up that bank, but one major building society and two or three banks came to me and said, "Don't bother—we'll do it for you." They said that if the capital receipts were invested in the bank and they were given a guarantee on the risk factor of about 1 per cent., they would also invest in it. The construction industry was also interested in investing money in the bank as it could see the advantages to be gained for itself. It would have been a long-term investment bank that would have attracted funds from people wanting ot make a long-term investment as they do with pension funds.

There was a possibility of constructing the sort of bank that exists in other countries in Europe, some states of the United States and elsewhere. It would have attracted extra private money to invest in housing. Such investment would be good, not only for the housing stock, but for the construction industry. Such a bank provided an opportunity that we have lost. The Labour party should have made a strong case for it. If the Government want to steal a march on us, they should say to the building societies and banks that, although the Labour party did not give them the chance to take advantage of such a policy, they could do so under the Conservatives. At least that would take some of the homeless kids off the streets —a phenomenon that we have not seen in this country since the 1914 period—and would take families out of bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Such a policy would also allow the Government to do something that they want to do: move towards market rents. There have been arguments about market rents, against which I have no argument as long as they are affordable. It is their affordability that matters. Market rents are made affordable by having a level playing field for owner occupation and the rented sector within the housing finance structure. If that does not exist, it inevitably follows from the economics of the policy that the market rents will be unaffordable. That is precisely what is happening. That is why housing associations are experiencing so much difficulty and the private sector will not invest.

Before the election I said what we should have done. I now repeat that and say that, in the Budget, the Government should have given private landlords tax breaks. They should have done so only on the basis of an exchange for registration so that landlords would have to be registered in order to receive that subsidy. The registration would ensure that they delivered a proper standard of housing and did not harass tenants or provide bad service. The private rented sector has always produced the worst abuses in the rented sector generally. I was quite happy to say to landlords wishing to enter the system that, in exchange for the subsidy, they should give guarantees about management standards. In that way, we could revive the private rented sector, which would benefit the economy as a whole.

Mr. William Ross: Many of us who are listening with great interest to what the hon. Gentleman is saying know that one of the great costs involved in building a house is the price of the land on which the house stands. How would the Labour party and the hon. Gentleman have dealt with that issue in terms of planning law?

Mr. Soley: I could refer the hon. Gentleman to a document that I produced on that subject—I also spoke on planning matters—and while the land issue is important, it is not as crucial as it is made out to be. Even so, I accept that we need a social use class order for planning, which would help matters considerably.

A much wider argument involves the role of local government. We needed to allow local government to designate areas for social housing. I will not go far down that road, although it is not a million miles from the Budget in that if, for example, we had had a Greater London authority and said that we wanted a certain amount of docklands land used for affordable housing, for rent or for sale, we would not have the housing problem that now exists in London. The same could have applied in other areas. That is the way to use the planning system to deal with planning provision generally.

There are many areas in which the Government could have intervened by way of the Budget to reform the housing finance system in a way that would not only help people get homes, but would help the British economy out of its structural problems.

Apart from Belgium, we are the only country with anything resembling mortgage income tax relief. It is a straight subsidy of about £5 billion which does not go to those who most need it. It does not save people from being repossessed, and when they are repossessed they go into bed-and-breakfast accommodation and everybody paying the council tax contributes to that accommodation for them. It is a ludicrous system, which is why about a year and a half ago I put to the Government a mortgage rescue scheme directed at preventing people from going into bed-and-breakfast accommodation by keeping them in their own homes.

I could speak at length on that subject. I leave it by reminding the House that throughout the 1980s the Conservatives produced a disaster in housing policy to the extent that, for the first time in 70 years, we have homeless teenage British children begging on British streets. That has come about in part, though not wholly, through a failure to address the housing finance system. The present system in Britain not only distorts housing but distorts the economy, and unless we address it more effectively we shall continue to fail in housing policy and in dealing with some of our wider economic problems.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Before dealing with the Budget, I must challenge some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) about the myth that is being fostered that the economic policies of Lady Thatcher were a disaster in the 1980s. For the first two Parliaments of her rule, we had the most successful economic policy Britain had witnessed this century.

As the Chief Secretary said, we saw the creation of 3 million jobs and an explosion of enterprise and initiative. We reformed the industrial climate—the trade unions—we reformed the tax system, and we created an enterprise society, all based on two pillars of economic policy—fiscal rectitude, moving progressively to a balanced budget, and bringing inflation down by controlling the money supply with a floating exchange rate.

The tears started to fall when we abandoned those two policies. We started giving in to the demands of people who wanted us to spend more on this and that, and the budget deficit began to rise. Lord Lawson abandoned his monetary policy—he caught the European bug; he tried to shadow the deutschmark and began dropping, when he should have been increasing, interest rates—and the economy overheated.

That was the cause of our problems today, so I am delighted that the Government have now accepted that they should go back to the earlier principles. We have left the ERM and have a floating exchange rate, we are controlling inflation by our monetary policy and, hopefully, this year's Budget is the beginning of the control and reduction of the budget deficit.

I strongly support the broad thrust of the Budget. I was looking for three things from it. First, I wanted a Budget for recovery; secondly, I wanted a Budget that sent a message to the markets that the British Government really were serious about dealing with the problem of the deficit; and, thirdly, I wanted a Budget that would be welcome on these Benches and would form the basis for a fifth election victory. The Chancellor has succeeded on all three counts.

We wanted a broadly neutral Budget with no massive tax increases in 1993-94, which could have snuffed out the fragile recovery which is taking place. We have a package of help for industry, small business and the long-term unemployed. I have been interested in small business throughout my political career. Indeed, I started out as a small business man, so I am particularly pleased with the measures to help small businesses.

The reduction in the cost of the loan guarantee scheme will be helpful. At a time of recession, the speeding up of the repayment of VAT on bad debts is long overdue, and I am delighted with the reform of the VAT penalty regime. It was unacceptable previously that relatively small errors —even clerical errors—that could be made by any small business man should result in heavy penalties.

Certainly my hon. Friends will be delighted that there is to be no real increase in business rates this year. There will be 10,000 more places on the business start-up scheme, which is good news because, as we appreciate, jobs in the future will come from small businesses. The new manufacturing factories will create wealth, but with their robots and automation they will not create many jobs.

Further moves towards deregulation are wanted by virtually everybody. Help for industry, particularly exporting industries, is vital and it is good to see export credit cover increased and the cost decreased. The racing industry was liable to be driven to Ireland, but it, too, has been helped. We have also dealt with the problem of surplus advance corporation tax.

I am pleased that the Government have appreciated the problems of the City of London. I have been worried about the City. We felt that, with the single market, we might not do as well as Germany in machine tools and other manufactured products. But in banking, insurance and financial services, such as dealing in stocks and so on, we thought that we would sweep Europe. Unfortunately, we have suffered some disappointments in that respect.

The management of our banks has not been as good as it might have been, to say the least. Their capital has been undermined with large bad debt write-offs. The insurance industry has been badly hit. In Lloyd's there has been incompetence and, in some cases, dishonesty, and now we have the problem of TAURUS. The City is struggling. I am pleased—I say this unashamedly, being a member of Lloyd's—that the Chancellor has grasped the nettle and is helping insurance, Lloyd's and the industry as a whole to have a level playing field, with a tax allowance for reserves to deal with future claims. That will be helpful to the City. It is vital that the insurance industry survives and prospers.

All those many changes, which improve the lot of business, show that we have a listening Government. The Budget contains many measures, some of which may not seem important individually, but put together they represent a significant and helpful package.

Even so, I have some reservations, the first being in respect of excise duty. My family has been in the wine and spirits trade for generations. I am delighted that my business is in the north of England, although I am not affected personally. We are faced with the single market. The degree of increased imports by private people, duty-free, of beers, wines and spirits is extremely worrying.

I was delighted that the Chancellor decided not to increase the duty on Scotch whisky. He is aware of the problem. The brewers estimate that 10 per cent. of packaged beer consumed here is coming in duty-free. Wines and spirits are also pouring in. The Treasury estimates that it will lose £250 million in duty this year. That means a loss of business to the British industry of getting on for £1 billion. We are exporting jobs in retailing, wholesaling, brewing and packaging. It is estimated that one in six off-licences will close, with the loss of thousands of jobs.

The Chancellor said in his Budget speech:

"But there is a natural concern as well about the impact of an increase in cross-border shopping, and the effect that it might have on British businesses, particularly in the south-east. In considering what changes to make to excise duties, I have had to balance that against the need to raise revenue. I have therefore decided to raise the duties on most alcoholic drinks by only 5 per cent."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 176.]

I have to say that that is double the rate of inflation. It is a higher level than usual. Experience in other countries —especially in the United States of America, where different states have different regimes for sales and excise taxes—has shown that, provided that differences in retail prices do not amount to much more than 5 per cent., there is no serious damage. However, once the difference increases to higher levels, damage is done.

The duty on a bottle of wine in France is 3p. We have now put up our duty to £1, so hon. Members can appreciate the enormous difference. Far from increasing the gap, surely my right hon. Friend the Chancellor should have kept the duties the same for at least this year, and then progressively brought them closer to the French and Belgian levels. As the spokesman for the Brewers Society said today, there will be a growing black market in beer and wine, imported and sold to the trade. It is a charter for the wide boys.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-West: As someone employed in the brewing industry for 19 years, I have to agree with the hon. Gentleman. Does he agree with me that the Chancellor has given himself a tremendous problem over the next couple of years, as he will have to equalise the duty in the United Kingdom with that of our EC partners? He has increased the duty; and he will have to bring it down from about 40p on the pint equivalent to 4p on the pint equivalent.

Mr. Townend: My understanding is that there will be complete harmonisation. As I have said, the increase will distort the market and export jobs. I do not advocate that we reduce our duties to 3p for wine and 4p for beer, as that would result in the Exchequer losing virtually all the revenue. However, if the duty was brought down to 50p on a bottle of wine, although the difference would still be significant, the incentive would be much less.

I want now to move on from this Budget to the second Budget in November, and to the November 1994 Budget. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has spelt out large and specific tax increases. He has made it clear to the market that the Government have returned to a policy of fiscal rectitude, and that they are serious about dealing with the deficit. I strongly welcome and support that move. I do not like increases in taxation, and, let us be frank, the increase in the burden of taxation is substantial—£6·5 billion in 1994-95 and £10·5 billion in 1995-96.

There was a worrying omission from the Budget statement. There was no mention of a contribution to cutting the deficit through a reduction in public spending. I was hoping and expecting my right hon. Friend to say that the Government and the public sector would be sharing the burden with the long-suffering taxpayer. I was hoping that he would match the reductions, and that in the autumn he would cut the control total for 1994-95 by £6·5 billion and that for 1995-96 by £10·5 billion, to reduce the Budget deficit still further.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) that the problem of the budget deficit is very serious and will last a long time, dragging down the economy. If we are to solve the problem, it must be attacked from two sides. We must accept rather high increases in taxation, but also reductions in public expenditure. As can be seen from page 73 of the Red Book, the settlement for the coming year is very generous. We will have a fiscal stimulus in 1993-94. If we take out interest charges and cyclical social security —so we are not taking in the costs of recession—the control total will rise by no less than 5·58 per cent., with underlying inflation standing at about 3 per cent.

We must remember that one of the most significant elements of public expenditure is the cost of wages and staff, which is limited to 1·5 per cent. Therefore, in volume terms it means that expenditure is rising by about 4·5 to 5 per cent. Spending has increased at a frightening speed, and that is a significant cause of our budget deficit. It is not right to blame it all on the recession.

Page 74 of the Red Book shows that Government general expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product rose from 42 per cent. in 1991-92 to 45·5 per cent. this year. Even with the tax increases, it will decline by only 1·5 per cent. in the next two years. As the figure for 1988-89 was only 39·25 per cent., it is obvious that the increase is significant. It is vital that the Government give a commitment to bringing down spending as a proportion of GDP, and back to less than 40 per cent.

Overall, taxation at the next general election should be no higher than it was at the last election. There is a real political imperative, which is why the Government must turn their attention to public expenditure. There are two reasons why we won the last election. The first is that the public decided that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would be a better Prime Minister than the former Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock). Secondly—above any other consideration—the public thought that, if they voted Labour, they would be voting for a party of high taxation.

Although I support the increases in taxation to get the deficit down, as soon as the recovery is under way, we must cut spending and reduce taxes. I suggest that the Government look at what happened in America with President Bush, and at what happened in Australia last week with Mr. Hewson. I do not think that we will be returned at the next election if we go into it with significantly higher taxes.

We are on the right track. I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is not here because there is no doubt that he carries a heavy load. We have dealt with one leg—taxation. The future of the Government and of the Conservative party depends on whether my right hon. Friend can get the support of his Cabinet colleagues to deal with the other leg—public expenditure. I look forward to the first Budget in November that deals with both taxation and spending. I hope that by then my right hon. Friend will have been successful, and that there will be at least £5 billion to £10 billion off the control target.

A great deal of money is being wasted in many areas. I intend to table some parliamentary questions about that. I do not think that anyone appreciates the increase in the costs of financing care in the community for people who are mentally ill. A case was brought to my attention this week of a rather difficult patient who has been decanted from a large hospital into care in the community. The revenue cost for that one person is £100,000 a year. It is being paid by direct grant from the Welsh Office. I have figures that show that previously the cost for a patient in a large hospital was £20,000 to £22,000 a year, but when they go into care in the community it is well over £30,000.

It is the same with law and order, where the costs are very high. The county council in my area was very upset because a youngster was sent to a special detention centre at a cost of £2,000 a week, or £100,000 a year. That cost is unacceptable, and there are many areas that we need to study.

One of my hobby horses is the question whether, in our current state and with a large budget deficit and a large balance of payments deficit, we can really afford to be spending £2·25 billion a year on overseas aid. I am not opposed in principle to overseas aid, but when we have to borrow from the foreigner to give it away and then repay the foreigner with interest, surely that is not good business. Therefore, I am happy that the Government have two pillars of monetary control to help bring the budget deficit under control.

I have great faith in my right hon. Friend. I support fully the broad strategy of the Budget and hope that, when I speak in the next Budget debate in November or December, I shall be able to congratulate my right hon. Friend on dealing with the other leg of the problem.

6.30 pm

Mrs. Jane Kennedy (Liverpool, Broadgreen): I wish to direct my first comments to the short passage in the Chancellor's speech that has direct implications for hundreds of my constituents and those of my hon. Friends representing seats in Liverpool, Glasgow, Cardiff and London where employment in the pools industry is likely to be affected by the introduction of a national lottery. Hon. Members who shared with me the distinction of serving on the Standing Committee that examined the National Lottery Bill will be relieved to hear that I propose not to refer even once to a level playing field.

Taxation of the lottery is of great interest to many people. Charities and voluntary organisations and sports and arts organisations had hoped to see no taxation at all, which would have increased the anticipated benefit from the lottery. Football pools companies involved in the sale of soft gambling products, who will see some erosion of their market share, hoped for a reduction in the pools betting duty. Neither has materialised in the Budget.

The Chancellor's proposal to start taxing the lottery in the first year at 12 per cent. will disappoint many, including Conservative Members who had hoped that it would escape taxation. The consequences of that level of taxation for the good causes will be a reduction in the expected benefits.

In a press release yesterday, Customs and Excise predicted a turnover of about £1·5 billion in the first year. We must treat all such predictions with caution, but that is revealing. It would leave an approximate pay-out to each of the five good causes of about £78 million per year. On that prediction, for every £1 spent on the lottery 12p will go to the Chancellor, compared with 5p to charities. I hope that the Advertising Standards Authority will monitor closely the marketing hype that will surround the launch of the lottery. A lottery whose tax take is more than twice the amount going to charity can hardly be described as a lottery for good causes. European lotteries are taxed at levels of up to 30 per cent. I wonder how long it will be before the Chancellor or his successor finds lottery proceeds too tempting to resist.

Football clubs will also be disappointed that the Chancellor missed the opportunity to extend the 2·5 per cent. concession on pools betting levy, which ends in two years' time and which allows pools revenue to be ring-fenced for the Football Trust and the Foundation for Sport and the Arts. Much work has been done through the Football Trust to help clubs meet the requirements of the Taylor report, making stadiums safe and more attractive for supporters. There is still a long way to go and I hope that there will be an amendment to recognise the continuing role of the Football Trust.

The 12 per cent. duty to be levied on the lottery will allow up to 50 per cent. of turnover to be paid back in prizes. Without the further reduction in pools betting duty, the pools will be limited to their current 25 per cent. prize level. That differential between the lottery and the pools will make the pools a relatively less attractive proposition. The smaller companies such as Zetters and Vernons will be particularly disadvantaged. Vernons' employees on Merseyside will continue their campaign to see fair competition established.

Fairness would be good for the lottery as well as the pools. A healthy pools industry would help stimulate interest in soft gambling which would in turn promote sales of the lottery. The collapse of the pools would not only lead to further unemployment in my constituency but would damage the lottery. The lottery promoters would be forced continually to modify their gains to maintain public interest. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage, the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), would find it increasingly difficult to stick with his "very British lottery", a concept which has won widespread support. Pools workers would also benefit from a more secure future. One of my biggest fears—further unemployment in my constituency—would be removed if the Chancellor would consider that point further.

Past economic performance on Merseyside has been among the worst in Britain. The sustained decline in employment in Liverpool, especially in port-related industries, in transport and in manufacturing, has frequently been much faster than the national average. I endorsed fully the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) when he talked about the decline in manufacturing industry being a direct result of the policies of the Conservative party.

The service industries were heralded by Baroness Thatcher as the engines of economic growth in the '80s. That policy has the Prime Minister's tacit endorsement, no matter how much he now protests that he did not support the perverse logic inherent in it, because he remained a member of the Cabinet that espoused it.

The Budget will do little to arrest the decline on Merseyside. It is devoid of any strategy to put people back to work or to give young people throughout the country, the 6,713 unemployed in my constituency, where one in four men are out of work, or the 1 million long-term unemployed nationwide some hope of a decent future. They cannot look to the Government for any imaginative or effective policies to alleviate their hardship.

The Chancellor said yesterday that he wants tax decisions to be made here and not in Brussels. I suspect that he believes that economic matters more generally should also be determined here. But economic policy made here has done nothing for the people of Merseyside. They have to look to Europe for help.

The recent nomination of Merseyside by the European Commission for objective 1 status—the status reserved for the regions whose development is lagging behind that of others in the Community—will provide grant aid via the European regional development fund for a range of projects to facilitate regeneration and will give a glimmer of hope to those of us engaged in the task of turning Merseyside's economy round.

As I have said, the Budget does nothing for jobs. The measures announced to help the unemployed are insufficient to cure the malaise. In any case, they are too late and on too small a scale to have any real effect. They are nowhere near proportional to the problem. Only one in 10 of the long-term unemployed will be helped by the measures.

More generally, the Chancellor said that supply-side measures were vital in the long term. For 13 years he and his predecessors have been saying that, yet their supply-side reforms have failed to produce a dynamic economy. Instead, there has been a failure to invest in infrastructure, new technology and capacity, much of which has been scrapped in any case because of the recession.

Unlike the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), I am unable to describe the advantages of the Government's policies for my constituency. However, there are some spectacular success stories, including one on Merseyside that I wish to describe to the House. GEC Plessey has recently completed a massive programme of investment in its Edge lane plant, resulting in a world-beating centre for the development of new communication technology. Unfortunately, that success story is the exception to the rule. GEC Plessey's successful development of high technology has resulted in a shake-out of hundreds of jobs in the plant, where engineers are no longer needed and production jobs are increasingly scarce. The victims of the shake-out need to be re-skilled to enable them to turn their hand to other work, which has to be available for them. Government provision of such training is woefully inadequate and condemns many to long-term unemployment.

[Mrs. Jane Kennedy]

It is surely a sign of a failure of economic policy when, after 13 years of supposed supply-side improvements and at the height of a recession, the current account of the balance of payments is over £12 billion in the red and growing rapidly. In my limited experience of economics, that flies in the face of conventional economic wisdom.

The devaluation of the pound following black Wednesday gave an important boost to the economy's tradeable sector, and the Prime Minister's much publicised interview in The Independent on 4 March implied that devaluation was one element that made Britain uniquely competitive. I seem to remember—this was not long ago—the Government telling us that devaluation was completely ineffective because any competitive gains from a lower pound would be wiped out by higher prices.

Looking back, the misguided financial deregulation of the 1980s ensured the credit explosion that fuelled asset price inflation. Many people, perceiving that their wealth had increased, spent more—and everything seemed rosy. In March 1988, however, the Government lowered income tax when it was clear that consumer spending was running out of control. Inflation was inevitable, as was a ballooning balance of payments deficit. Manufacturing, which had been pushed to the side but which is so vital for economic prosperity, was simply too small to sustain our import needs.

With increasingly shambolic monetary policy and the failure of monetary targeting, entry into the exchange rate mechanism was seen as the panacea. With exorbitant interest rates dampening domestic demand and propping up the pound, recession was inevitable. The depth and length of the recession produced the low inflation in which the Government place such faith and for which they take credit. They pin hopes of recovery on lower interest rates, which have only been made possible because the ERM—a major plank of Government policy—failed.

The irony is that the forces for recovery defined by the Government—low inflation, low interest rates and a competitive currency—have been put in place because of a catastrophic failure of Government economic policy.

Some of the measures announced yesterday must be welcome and they suggest that the Government have at last woken up to the plight of manufacturing industry. I refer in particular to the extension of export credit cover. I am told that the reforms to advance corporation tax are also of great benefit, but, like the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I cannot comment further. I await the views of hon. Members who know more about that subject than I do.

The Chancellor was silent on tax breaks for capital investment—which was strange, considering that if he anticipates recovery, measures to encourage investment are essential. The temporary measures introduced in the autumn statement are not being extended, which will disappoint many.

A further measure that may help Merseyside is the abolition of petroleum revenue tax in the case of new fields, which we hope will encourage development of the Liverpool bay oil and gas field.

For the majority of my constituents, however, the Budget is profoundly depressing. The prospect of higher personal taxes over the next few years will do nothing to encourage consumer spending now. Higher fuel costs through the imposition of VAT on previously zero-rated gas and electricity supplies—despite Tory promises—will hit families on the edge of poverty the hardest.

The hinted benefits increase will have to be seen to be believed, particularly given the clearly stated objective of reduced Government spending in the next few years, described at column 175 of yesterday's Official Report. Savage cuts will inevitably hit the Department of Social Security. Unlike the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), I do not urge the Government to cut spending on care in the community. That is not an expensive option, and it is agreed by all to be the proper way of caring for the mentally ill and those with mental health problems. Neither do I urge the Chancellor to cut expenditure on law and order or overseas aid.

While it is true that the economic slump is felt world wide, it began sooner here and has lasted longer, and we are in a weaker position to recover in terms of our manufacturing base. The Chancellor has done nothing to overcome the United Kingdom's structural economic problems, and I have little confidence that my constituents will more easily find work as a result of yesterday's announcements.

Mr. Douglas French (Gloucester): I sympathise considerably with the remarks of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who has just left his place—not as they relate to my noble friend Lady Thatcher but as they relate to the phasing out of mortgage interest relief. He elaborated on views expressed earlier by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). Both see considerable merit in phasing out mortgage interest relief, and yesterday's Budget offered a golden opportunity to abolish it altogether. There could scarcely have been a better opportunity, with interest rates as low as they are, and when the maximum benefit to each family is only around £600 a year. That figure is not significant compared with the fall in mortgage repayments resulting from recent interest rate reductions.

The abolition of mortgage interest relief could have been significantly cushioned by adjustments to the 20 per cent. band. More importantly, it would have saved a considerable amount of revenue—a sum approaching £5 billion—and revenue saving ought to have been the key to yesterday's Budget.

The Budget acknowledges that the deficit problem is enormous, but not that it is enormous enough to warrant immediate action. I would prefer the Budget to face up to the need to start a deficit-reducing programme now, and not delay it. Tackling MIRAS would have been a good start.

I find it difficult to have full confidence in a judgment made in 1992-93 that assesses a need to raise additional revenue of £6·5 billion in 1994-95 and £10·5 billion in 1995-96. Such figures assume a level of recovery which should come and which we all hope will come, but the time scale is uncertain—as we know from the past two years. They assume also a level of recovery which will be deeply affected by events in Europe and in the United States, and a forecasting accuracy that has seldom if ever been achieved in the past.

There is a sound reason why Budgets have historically been held at annual intervals. Usually, the intervals have been less than annual only at times of economic difficulty.

We have not before attempted Budgets less frequently than at annual intervals, but it seems from yesterday's approach that the likely future practice entails the forecasting of figures, and particularly of tax takes, far in advance.

The deficit levels confirmed yesterday were worse than the majority of commentators expected—at £35 billion for 1992-93, rising to £50 billion in 1993-94. Much City opinion was surprised by the £50 billion figure. Those who watched television coverage of the Budget know that, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor referred to it in his speech, the chief economist of James Capel, Keith Skeoch, reacted with the words, "That must be a mistake." This indicates the extent to which the figure of £50 billion, while expected and anticipated in the course of time, was not expected this early.

At the time of the last autumn statement, a forecast by Goldman Sachs predicted on current trends a deficit in 1996-97 of £80 billion. That figure was viewed as ridiculous at the time. If it had been forecast in the knowledge that the 1993-94 figure was already £50 billion, the chances are that the Goldman Sachs prediction of six months ago would have been not £80 billion but somewhat higher.

The document "The Budget in Brief", which was published yesterday by the Treasury, says:

"The Public Sector Borrowing Requirement (PSBR) in 1993-94 is projected to be £50 billion, equivalent to 8 per cent. of GDP. But the Government's objective is to bring it back towards balance over the medium term. The discretionary increases in tax revenues announced in the Budget will build up over time, and together with the public expenditure plans in the Autumn Statement will ensure that this happens."

Those are very fine words, but for many people they are not very convincing, and they will not be convincing until the next public expenditure plans are revealed in November. Thus, we are to have eight months of uncertainty, eight months during which we shall not know how satisfactorily the Government will tackle the public expenditure problem.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): On the question of public sector spending, surely the credibility of the Government's PSBR policy will depend on whether they get growth back into the economy so that tax revenues can start to rise again, with people now unemployed back at work.

Mr. French: I accept the hon. Lady's point in theory, but it would be very risky indeed to base all action on the assumption that growth will return within a particular time. Naturally, one hopes that it will, but it would be extremely imprudent to make such an assumption. As we have seen in the past, assumptions do not always prove to have been justified, however well based they may have been.

The position becomes even more disconcerting when we read in the Red Book that the Treasury projects that the PSBR for 1996-97 will be £35 billion. That is the same, in cash terms, as the figure for 1992-93. My right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) was absolutely right to draw attention to this problem. Over a period of five years, in cash terms, no progress is to be made, yet revenues are expected to rise because of the recovery from recession. The indication is that there is to be no significant progress in reducing Government expenditure, in cash terms, during this period.

In 1992-93, the PSBR was 5·75 per cent. of GDP, and in 1995-96 it will go down only to 5·5 per cent.—hardly any worthwhile change at all. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) pointed out, the same sort of pattern is to be found when one compares spending as a percentage of GDP. In this regard, I refer hon. Members to page 74 of the Red Book. In 1995-96, Government spending will fall only to 44 per cent. of GDP. That is not the progress we need: it is too slow.

Why did the Chancellor reach the view that, in this respect, no immediate action should be taken? Why is the majority of significant action to be deferred? Clearly, the Chancellor has asked himself how fragile the recovery is and how much it could be harmed by revenue-raising measures designed to reduce the deficit. The fact that the current year is virtually revenue-neutral implies that the Chancellor has concluded that the recovery is very fragile indeed.

Why is the recovery so fragile? It is fragile because market confidence is so low, and confidence is low because the commitment to curbing the deficit and putting finances on a proper footing is inadequate and lacks credibility. What will give it credibility is action, not words—action now, as opposed to action later. I very much regret the fact that the Chancellor seems to feel that well chosen words now are a reasonable substitute for action. I simply do not believe they are.

To that extent, I find myself totally in agreement with one member of the Treasury panel of independent forecasters, Professor Tim Congdon, who is regarded as the maverick. I should like to refer to the March issue of The Gerrard and National Monthly Review in which Professor Congdon has published his now-infamous "Open Letter to the Treasury Panel". Before getting to the extremely complex part, I should like to quote these words:

"Since everyone agrees that the Budget deficit must be reduced in the medium term, there is, in my opinion, no advantage in deferring tax increases. The longer the tax increases are postponed, the higher will be the future costs of servicing the national debt, and the larger will be the tax increases that are eventually necessary."

I totally endorse that judgment. In fiscal and economic policy, it has been shown time and time again that, if tough action has to be taken, it is better to take it early rather than late. Deferred action causes uncertainty, even if it is designed to be informative and to show commitment, and is undertaken with the best of intentions. I can think of nothing more certain to dampen the capacity of an economy to spring into life than an announcement that, whatever happens, heavier taxes are on their way but they are not to be imposed just yet.

Leaving aside the overall tax take, what is the effect of announcing tax levels in advance? That is something of a novelty. I do not recall any Budget in which it happened to anything like the same extent. It is an innovation, possibly inspired by the Clintonesque approach, but there are very considerable dangers in it.

Taxpayers cannot reasonably assume that the rates being announced will apply when the time comes. Everybody knows how unreliable economic forecasts are, how frequently they are wrong. If forecasts are wrong and have to be changed, the tax rates depending upon them may also need to be changed. As I understand the situation, these rates are to be included as an integral part of the Finance Bill. It seems to me that this makes the situation worse rather than better. If rates have to be changed subsequently, further difficulty will be created, and more explanation will be required.

[Mr. French]

In my opinion, such a practice also fetters the judgment of the Chancellor. My right hon. Friend may be fettering his own judgment for future Budgets—I very much hope so—but, on the other hand, he may be fettering the judgment of subsequent Chancellors. One has to ask whether the rates being announced for future years run with the existing Chancellor or whether, in the event of his moving on, they will fetter the judgment of any successor.

It is fairly certain that the precise rates being specified at the moment will not, in the event, be applied. It is almost certain that future Budgets will have to show why figures that were announced so far ahead have had to be altered. As a result, a measure designed clearly with the best of intentions—to provide continuity and certainty of policy—is far more likely to breed uncertainty. In my view, it is therefore self-defeating and extremely imprudent.

I am also very uneasy about the practical effects on the conduct of the individual taxpayers of announcing tax increases so far in advance. Indirect tax increases are one thing. Advance announcements may have the effect of bringing expenditure forward, although that is not very likely to be possible in respect of domestic fuel and power, but direct tax increases announced so far ahead freeze taxpayers into inaction.

Many taxpayers are currently having to hold back on discretionary expenditure, although they have cash to spend as a result of the recent mortgage rate reductions. A natural fear of unemployment, and the painful experience of running a tight household budget—which is all too recent a memory—lead them to consider it prudent not to spend any surplus they may have. The prospect of direct tax increases will continue to restrict their spending, and thus will not achieve what might be expected of such a policy.

If the decision to increase taxes had been implemented now, it could have been balanced by further action on interest rates. The United Kingdom's interest rates may be the lowest in Europe, but the gap between interest rates and inflation is still too large. The decision to increase taxes next year and in the following year implies a further fall in interest rates, but the decision to impose no tax increases in the current year clearly diminishes the chance of lower interest rates in the short term.

I want to say something about the Chancellor's small business package. I was surprised that he should seek to breathe life back into the loan guarantee scheme. If he is to succeed in his strategy, he will have to lean fairly heavily on the banks: the practice of banks throughout the country is to steer clear of the loan guarantee scheme if they possibly can. There are many stories of potential bank customers who have sought to bring the scheme into play, only to be discouraged from doing so. That, I think, is because the scheme has a central flaw: it invites banks not only to set aside normal banking criteria but also to lend on terms which will ultimately cost the borrower more. That has always struck me as inherently contradictory.

I consider it unfortunate that, insofar as the Chancellor decided to make any tax concessions—I believe that a considerable tightening of the fiscal stance was necessary—he opted to hold the inheritance threshold at £150,000. I found that profoundly disappointing. A minimal amount of expenditure could have gone some way towards fulfilling my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's declared aim of enabling wealth to cascade down the generations.

The present system of inheritance tax reliefs, which encourages capital to be passed to the next generation in dribs and drabs, puts the older generation in an iniquitous position. They must decide to what extent they will seek to avoid the taxman by giving away money, when they do not know how long they will live, what their financial requirements may be and what they may need for health and geriatric care: for fiscal reasons, they are required to decide whether to divest themselves of the capital that they have saved over their lives, or to deprive the next generation of the benefit of their work. They are being required to place themselves at risk by not retaining sufficient funds for their own needs in old age. The sooner the threshold can be raised, the better.

In conclusion, however, I give my right hon. Friend the Chancellor full marks for the broader measures relating to business, and for the package of employment measures. The two are closely related. The stronger the cash flow available to businesses, and the more tax and regulatory burdens are removed from them, the easier it is likely to be for them to employ new people, and the greater will be the likelihood of business growth and permanent job creation. I suspect that the need for new jobs will prevail for much of the 1990s; I fear that it is an intractable problem, but I hope that it will prove less intractable than the deficit appears to be at present.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): I have listened to most of the debate, and I wish to develop three themes. First, the Budget is an absolute betrayal of every policy that the Government put to the electorate only a year ago; secondly, the measures proposed in it—supposedly to help the economy—are ill directed and will be ineffective, because they are so minuscule in comparison with the problem itself; and, thirdly, despite the massive difficulties in which we find ourselves, the Government have yet again taken the opportunity to protect those at the top of the income scale at the expense of everyone else. I do not think that many Opposition Members are surprised by that.

The betrayal could not be deeper. If the Budget has achieved anything, it has brought about a substantial increase in the cynicism that the country must feel about the entire democratic process—or, at any rate, about the Government whom it elected only a year ago. Listening to Conservative Members, I can hardly believe that they are the same people who put their party manifesto to the country such a short time ago: the promises that were made then have been thrown away.

Hon. Members may recall the exiled Conservative party leader's aversion to U-turns, and her famous remark:

"You turn if you want to; the lady's not for turning."

We have seen some U-turns from the Government—U-turns on public spending, on Europe and on monetary policy. People felt betrayed before, but the phenomenal U-turn in the Budget takes the biscuit.

The Conservatives did not use the language of George Bush, but their promises were made as clearly as his promises to the American electorate, and they have been reversed as clearly as his were. Their first pledge was made by the Prime Minister in the run-up to the general election:

"We are the only party that understands the need for lower taxation".

The second was

"We will maintain mortgage tax relief".

No caveats or hidden retreats were involved then. Thirdly, the party had "no plans and no need to extend the scope of VAT".

Now, a massive wedge—as the Chancellor put it—of new taxation is to be introduced over the next three years. In one respect, at least, the Budget was an innovation: effectively, we were presented with three Budgets, involving tax increases next year and in the following year.

I do not believe that the British people will be conned by the Conservative party again. It is clear that the political intention behind the Budget is to drag forward the bad news, demanding a post-dated cheque from taxpayers in the hope that they will have forgotten what happened when the time comes for them to judge the Conservatives once more. The Government will not get away with it because people now treat with cynicism everything that the Conservatives say. I promise the Government that we shall never let them forget their betrayal.

There is one issue on which the Conservatives have been consistent. Despite the difficulties that we face, the Conservatives have again attempted to enhance the position of the highest earners at the expense of everyone else. The Government claim that they are a Government of low taxation, but, when one examines what has happened in the past 14 years, one finds that that is not true.

There has been a massive shift in the burden of taxation from the rich to the poor. There can be no doubt that the shift was systematic and deliberate. When the Government first came to power, the poorest 10 per cent. of the community even then paid 40·4 per cent. of their income in taxation in one form or another, either direct or indirect. That had been pushed up to 46·3 per cent. in 1990. Whether they paid it through VAT, income tax, national insurance contributions or any other form of taxes, in one way or another they paid almost half of their incomes in tax. At the same time, the richest 10 per cent. have seen their proportion of taxes fall from 35·6 to 32·2 per cent. The rich pay a third of their income in tax while the poor pay half of their income in tax. That is a deliberate policy, the reverse of the principle that Robin Hood was supposed to have supported. The Government systematically take from the poor and give to the rich.

The proposals in the Budget are an extension of that policy. Almost every increase in personal taxation is designed to hit those on average or below average incomes but not to hit those who can well afford to make a small contribution to solving the problems that the Government have created. Instead of raising income tax, the Government have chosen to freeze personal allowances. They did so deliberately because it will hit those on lower incomes to a far greater extent than those at the top. The married couple's allowance has also been frozen.

The worst proposal—the extension of VAT to fuel—has been dressed up in green clothes. The Chancellor cannot have his cake and eat it. The Chancellor and the Chief Secretary told us that this was an environmental measure which would save billions of tonnes of carbon in the next few years. If it is to raise tax revenue, as explained in the figures before us, how on earth is it to reduce carbon consumption? The measure has been cynically dressed in green. There is no intention of saving carbon; it is a measure for clawing back revenue. Again, it will hit the poor, and ordinary people, to a much greater extent than the better off.

If the Government want to prevent carbon consumption, they should be promoting home insulation and further investment in new technology for vehicles. They should have pursued such ideas with some vigour, instead of putting VAT on fuel bills. The move is a deliberate and cynical betrayal of all that the Government said during the general election campaign, when they pledged not to extend VAT.

Another proposal that will deliberately hit those on average or below average incomes is the extra 1p on national insurance contributions rather than on income tax. Anyone earning above the threshold figure will not pay that 1p, which means that those who could well afford to make a contribution are protected while others bear the full burden. We need to assess how much further that proposal will take the trend of taxing the poor to protect the rich.

Politics, pre-election promises and the distribution of tax are all important, but the overriding issue facing us all is the state of the economy. Does the Budget do anything to get people back to work or to lift the economy out of the doldrums? The proposals are minuscule and ill directed. The big issue confronting us is not the plight and dilemma of the Lloyd's names. There are many Lloyd's names among Conservative Members, and I understand that they consider their plight to be of profound importance. However, in view of the Prime Minister's recent statements, and if he wishes to maintain any credibility, he should be agreeing that manufacturing industry is the way to get out of the mess we are in.

Where in the Budget were the capital investment allowances which could encourage British industry and lift us out of the difficulties that exist in so many of our trading partner countries? There were none. Where was the commitment to infrastructure to give the British economy the boost that it needs? The Budget contained two proposals for infrastructure. The first involved 6 miles of railway line between Paddington and Heathrow. What a wonderful and profound piece of work. It will really set people alight. The second, dressed up as a commitment to infrastructure, was the announcement that the St. Pancras rail link to the channel tunnel would go ahead. What does that mean exactly?

It meant that the Government were considering the St. Pancras option as opposed to the King's Cross option. It meant that the decision will automatically be delayed for at least two years because of the change in policy. It meant that even if it is agreed and financed—although the commitment was not for public but for private funding, which has not yet been arranged—we shall have a cheaper and, I believe, inferior scheme to the one that had been stressed before. It meant that our effective transport links with the European markets via the tunnel and for the country north of Watford will be at least 10 years behind the opening of the tunnel. That is a complete disaster.

In other debates in the House we have heard Conservative opinions of our position in Europe, and the economic consequences of our membership. They justify their refusal to embrace the social chapter of the Maastricht treaty on the basis that we have to offset the disadvantage of our geographical position, compared with that of our neighbours, by keeping our wage costs and non-wage social costs below those in Germany, Belgium, northern France and elsewhere. Because we are on the periphery of Europe, we apparently have to take lower wages, lower social security provision, lower levels of health and safety at work and all the other features that add to manufacturing costs.

Yet at a time when there is a massive need for investment in the infrastructure that will help the economy to grow, support our manufacturing industry and help to solve the problem of our not being at the geographical centre of the market, here we are deliberately kicking into touch the one proposal for a major piece of infrastructure investment that would largely solve the transport problems and give manufacturing industry, especially in the west midlands, a major boost. We are copping out, deliberately kicking the ball up the park. We refuse to take a decision, and then dress up that refusal as a decision that will help the economy. I suggest that that is a deliberate lie.

I do not believe that the Budget will solve our problems. Some Conservative Members have explained that, despite the £10 billion in tax increases proposed, which will form a wedge over the next two years, there will still be a substantial problem at the end of it all. By the way, I estimate that £10 billion in tax is the equivalent of 7p on the income tax rate. So all the supposed reductions in tax that the Government have introduced over the past 14 years have just been effectively undone by the Chancellor's imposition of those tax increases yesterday. Yet they will not solve the problems; they will not even shut the gap that has opened in our public sector finances.

We have heard some proposals by Conservative Members. I listened to the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), who is a little more straightforward than some of his colleagues. At least we know exactly where the man stands, and what he proposes. In his opinion, more massive cuts in public expenditure are needed—that is his only answer.

Public expenditure means hospitals, policemen and teachers. The hon. Member for Bridlington was honest enough to accept that. He said, "Let us get rid of the community care burden. Put people back into Rampton-style hospitals. That was cheap. Community care is far too expensive." Everyone who has seen the budget provisions made for local government knows that community care is massively underfunded. People are being decanted from institutions—that is a diabolical expression to use about human beings, but that is what is said—and there is no provision for them. They are walking the streets. Everyone knows that community care is already hopelessly underfunded. When we talk about cutting public expenditure, that is the sort of thing that we mean.

The real problem is that our economy is not big enough to support the standards of living that we all want to enjoy, or the public sector proposals. That is because of the policies pursued by the Conservatives over the past 14 years. Our manufacturing output grew by 12 per cent. between 1979 and 1990, yet our consumption grew by 40 per cent. Anybody, even a 10-year-old schoolchild, could tell us that that divergence could not be sustained.

What are we doing? Do we actually intend to take action to start the economy growing, and to catch up with our partners again? Or shall we simply try to close the gap by more public expenditure cuts that exacerbate the growing rift in our society, the gap between the rich and the poor, and increase crime and lead to all the other problems that we have seen grow so massively already? The Government are totally bankrupt of ideas about how we can take ourselves forward and get ourselves out of the mess into which they have taken us.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Winchester): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth), except to say a word or two about business initiatives. I shall devote my remarks to the initiatives on capital gains tax that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced yesterday.

The attack by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) was nothing short of extraordinary. He made not a single positive suggestion about what the Labour party might intend to do about the country's economic situation. The Labour party and its official spokesman espouse a series of public spending measures that outstrip anything that would be proposed by the Government, yet fail to confront the difficulty caused by the deficit in the economy today. Furthermore, they decry the fact that there is a deficit, say that we should reduce it more quickly and then, rather absurdly, say that there is no scope for doing so by raising taxation.

I thought, as I expect Ministers did, that the rather unusual practice followed by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, when he loaded the Dispatch Box with several significant and threatening tomes at the beginning of the debate, might provide us, for the first time, with a solution. I thought that those weighty documents might be Labour's solution to the economic problems, and might tell us how to get out of recession. Sadly, the tomes only threatened; they provided no clue or aid to the hon. Gentleman's argument. They were as worthless a prop and addition to his speech as were other Labour Members' arguments about the economic situation.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement on capital gains tax. Over the past 14 years, the Government have been building an enterprise economy. Trade union powers have been curbed, restrictive practices have been swept away—one of the latest to be got rid of is the dock labour scheme. As a result of our enterprise economy, Britain is now a magnet for investment. In 1991, 40 per cent. of Japanese investment and 30 per cent. of United States investment in the European Community came to this country, because we are an enterprise economy. One of the essential elements in the enterprise economy is that small businesses, which are so crucial to its survival, must be encouraged. One of the ways to do that is to reform capital gains tax.

Capital gains tax is Labour's envy tax. It was introduced in 1965, just as the white heat of Harold Wilson's technological revolution was turning into a rather dull socialist glow. Since then, the tax has become more complex. A huge range of exemptions and anti-avoidance provisions have been built up over the years, as one Government after another have decided that the tax is basically unfair.

I was attracted by a remark by Lord Wilberforce, who said of capital gains tax in the other place last year:

"It is absolutely impossible for the ordinary citizen to understand. It is impossible for many accountants to understand . . . it is also impossible for the officials of the Inland Revenue to understand."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 January 1992; Vol. 534, c. 119.]

I echo his remarks, because it is also extremely difficult for politicians to understand.

Capital gains tax is dealt with in 291 sections, 12 schedules and more than 300 pages. The legislation has become unmanageable, and I am delighted that some steps have been taken in the Budget to change all that. I must confess that this is a personal grudge match for me. The tax was introduced in the 1960s, when I was a law student at university, so I had to try to cope with it. I did not. It was the one subject that held back my qualification as a practising lawyer for a number of years, until I borrowed somebody's understandable notes and managed to pass the examination. I assure the House that, after 30 years or so, my sense of vengeance is not quelled; I am delighted at last to have an opportunity to strike back.

Capital gains tax does not raise a lot of money. The forecast yield for 1992-93 from individuals and trustees is only just over £1 billion, and in 1987-88, 60 per cent. of CGT payers paid on average only £1,800 each. No wonder there are so few rich taxpayers and so many rich tax lawyers and accountants.

Reductions of CGT levels and a change in the rules would encourage greater realisation and mobility of capital. Especially when there is clearly a capital shortage following the recession, it is important that we introduce new regulations which allow capital to become more mobile and to increase. That is why I extend a warm welcome to the changes announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will bear in mind experiences elsewhere of reforming capital gains tax, and that he will not just relax the rules, as he announced yesterday he intended to do. When the United States cut CGT rates in two years—in 1978 and in 1982—realisations went up, in 1979 by 45 per cent. and in 1983 by 11 per cent. Government revenue actually increased. That suggests that such capital taxes are extremely stultifying, that they are avoided as a result of the many exceptions that Governments build into the rules, and that they are regressive.

When my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary looks at capital taxes in the future, perhaps he will take a leaf out of our own book. I refer to the time when we considered taxation on personal income. When we got rid of penal rates and made the tax fair, overall receipts increased. I am certain that, if my hon. Friend took that approach to capital taxes, and especially to capital gains tax, the experience would be repeated.

I encourage my hon. Friend to look at the body of evidence, which shows that, when capital taxes are reduced and the rules are modified, more venture capital can be raised. In the United States, when the rate was cut to 20 per cent. in 1982, $12·5 billion was suddenly raised by public offerings of shares. When the rate went up in 1986 to 28 per cent., there was a fall of $2 billion.

Similar evidence and similar statistics are available for the venture capital sector. Venture capital will be extremely important, as we move out of this recession into a period of growth, in sustaining the recovery and building a strong future. I suggest to my hon. Friend that, when he considers the tax, one useful change would be completely to exempt shareholdings in unquoted companies. So many of those companies are the result of personal enterprise and of the build-up over a period of years of capital that people should be entitled to realise. I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will build on our right hon. Friend's reforms.

I very much welcome the retirement relief measures, and especially the reduction in the qualifying shareholding from 25 per cent. to 5 per cent. That will benefit the growing number of firms in which the founding investors have reduced their equity. That often happens during the lifetime of a company when outside equity is introduced.

My right hon. Friend's deferment provisions are also welcome. They will allow entrepreneurs to move their investments between companies in the marketplace. It is crucial that, when fresh capital is to be moved from one business that is successful to another within a group which is ailing, it should be moved without the burden of taxation. That is a sensible reform, and I welcome it very much.

The importance of my right hon. Friend's measures is that they will ensure that small businesses benefit from maximum flexibility. No longer will conventional entrepreneurs who buy and sell companies attract CGT. In contrast, there are other absurd rules that enable people who realise some capital assets to invest elsewhere. It may interest my hon. Friend to know that, if a farmer selling potatoes under quota happened to reinvest the money in a space station, one of the strange anomalies in the system would mean that he would not be required to pay CGT on the transaction.

I should like the exemption to be extended to more conventional business enterprises, and I am sure that that is precisely what my hon. Friend has in mind. The reform is very welcome. I am certain that it will be welcomed not only in the House, but in the broader business community, and I am sure that it will underpin the economic revival that is under way.

I address my next remarks to Opposition Members. Of course Conservative Members do not like to see an increase in taxation. However, if Labour's policies and not the Government's were being implemented, the changes in taxation that a Labour Budget would bring would be enormous and damaging, and would stop growth in its tracks.

By targeting domestic fuel, we are not merely introducing a sensible environmental measure. Over the course of privatisation, prices—especially gas prices—have been reduced in real terms by 20 per cent. The regulator has insisted that that should happen, and he has now set new parameters for increasing the cuts in prices by another 6 per cent. below the retail prices index. The important point is that, once the transformation has taken place and once the policy is fed through, the bills in people's pockets will be reduced by far more than would have been the case if taxes had been levied in another sector where prices had been increased.

I welcome the Budget, and I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary says in support of the measures on capital gains tax reform. I look forward to hearing his response to my few suggestions tonight.

7.36 pm

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): We all realised when the Chancellor made his Budget statement last year that he was introducing an election budget. That was widely recognised in the House at the time and the point was made to him often enough by Opposition Members. In those circumstances, the Chancellor painted a picture of fairly rosy prospects for the coming year. However, he was constrained at that time by membership of the exchange rate mechanism which meant that he could not reduce interest rates. There were many things that the Chancellor would have liked to have done which he simply could not do. In September, as a result of the market forces that Conservative Members so much admire, he was freed. Black Wednesday set him free to introduce his own Budget this year for the first time. He has done so, but it is a year late.

The Chancellor has introduced the Budget after setting spending targets last November for the next year of two. Those targets are fixed—they cannot be reduced. A few months later, therefore, the Chancellor has found himself in a firm bind because he faces public expenditure which he must meet although tax revenue will come nowhere close to meeting the figure required. There is an old saying that hope deferred is hope denied. On this occasion, it is a matter of tax deferred being revenue denied, in a year when it is very much needed because the public sector borrowing requirement, with which I shall deal in a moment, is far too high.

I am sure that the Financial Secretary will recall that when the Chancellor made his autumn statement on 6 November 1991, I asked him about the rise in public expenditure, which he told us would be £53 billion over the next three years. The Chancellor replied:

> "It is an extremely important point that our intention and our policy are to balance the budget over the cycle . . . As he knows, corporation tax is paid a year in arrears and corporation tax receipts, therefore, lag very much behind the cycle. That is why I expect the public sector borrowing requirement to continue to be high next year, even though the recovery will be well under way. The plans that I have announced today and what I have said about the PSBR are consistent with our firm policy of balancing the budget over the cycle."—[Official Report, 6 November 1991; Vol. 198, c. 461.]

We are now moving into the third of those years, and that £53 billion increased expenditure appears as a £50 billion deficit—not quite what the Government and the Treasury had in mind at the time, I suspect. That £50 billion is a horrifying figure.

One wonders exactly what the public sector debt is. I intervened in the speech of the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) to say that I thought that it was over £200 billion. I have found a number of figures one way and another. It is the one figure that no one seems too willing to broadcast. It is, however, self-evident that, whatever our public sector debt is—and my figures vary from just under £200 billion to £240 billion—this year, we are adding £50 billion to it. We are increasing the public debt by anything up to 25 per cent. in one year.

That figure is based on the Treasury forecast. I do not think that, given the record of the past few years, any hon. Member will be prepared to take any Treasury forecasts—of expenditure, revenue or anything else—with anything other than a great big fistful of salt. Last year, a £28 billion deficit was forecast. That was in March. By November, the figure was £37 billion. Now March dawns again, and it is down to £35 billion. One would need better figures than those if one wanted to reach sensible conclusions about what the situation will be in November this year or March next year—never mind in 1997-98.

On 12 November last, the Chancellor told us in his autumn statement, at column 1004 of Hansard, that the deficit was about 6 per cent. of GDP—far too high, he said—and that next year it would be 8 per cent. That 6 per cent.—never mind the 8 per cent.—was well over the Maastricht trigger point for substantial cuts in public expenditure. This Budget is not exactly in keeping with the spirit or the letter of European union—not that we on these Benches will weep about that.

Why should we believe the Chancellor's forecasts? He is probably doing his best, but that is really a question of reaching in the dark and pulling down a figure. The forecast is a wild educated guess—if that makes sense—and it must be treated with a fair degree of suspicion.

The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale drew attention to the public sector borrowing requirement —£35 billion this year; £50 billion next year; £44 billion the year after; £39 billion in 1995-96; £35 billion in 1996-97; and £30 billion in 1997-98. We are talking about a total of £233 billion or a doubling of public sector debt over six years. That is not a prospect that anyone who has the future welfare of this country at heart will view with pleasure.

We need to ask ourselves what percentage of GDP the total public debt will be at the end of 1997-98. I suspect that it will be 50 per cent. or possibly higher. The Financial Secretary may be satisfied with that, but he will find many on the Conservative Back Benches who are not. It is not a figure that anyone can view with pleasure—and I certainly view it with great concern.

We were also told in the autumn statement that the broad money target was 4 per cent. to 8 per cent. The scale has expanded at both ends: it is now 1 per cent. to 9 per cent. With a broad range like that, I am not sure that the target means anything any more. It is a general target at which to aim. It is as big as a barn door and, if we hit it anywhere, I suppose someone will be able to say, "At least we are within target". That is not really quite what one expects from a Conservative Government who claim financial rectitude.

In November, the Chancellor also expressed concern about the amounts being paid in interest charges on Government debt. At the time I thought that that figure was £18 billion or £19 billion. But according to the table on page 20 of the Red Book, it is £17·5 billion this year. It will be £19·5 billion next year, and keeps right on increasing—to £29·5 billion in 1997-98. In other words, in that year, we will have to borrow sufficient to cover our debt interest. No householder or business would like to do that.

If the forecasts are anywhere near right, and with the total of public debt being well over £400 billion, I do not see us getting away with an interest charge of £29·5 billion. We would need to find someone to lend us a lot of cheap money if we wanted to do that. I think that we shall be paying considerably more than that. In fact, I do not think that the Government can allow us ever to reach that position. Whether the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Malone), to whom I listened with great interest, or anyone in the House or the country likes it or not, there will not only be swingeing tax increases but considerable public expenditure cuts—unless, that is, the Chancellor gets a lot of people back into profitable work very fast indeed.

The Chancellor stated that he would balance the budget over the cycle—at the time, he was talking about 3 per cent. above and 3 per cent. below balance; it is a lot more than that now—but he did not ever tell us how long the cycle was. He did not tell us when it started or finished. It is starting to look to me like a 30-year cycle. I do not think that the Financial Secretary, who is smiling from the Treasury Bench, wants to finish his days in the House, after a long and honourable career, wrestling with the end of this cycle. Perhaps he will deal with that in his reply.

Having been told by the press and others that the Chancellor is not exactly in favour of the straitjacket of the Maastricht agreement and the rest, and that he sings in his bath, I have not been quite as critical of him as many in the newspaper world and in the news media generally. The poor chap is doing his best no doubt. He and I entered the House at the same time and he has climbed to much greater heights than I am ever likely to attain. I like the Chancellor; he is quite a nice chap. But he has a really hard task ahead of him if he is to get the country's finances back on to some sort of stable footing. He now has the freedom of movement to take remedial action.

I have also noted—as, no doubt, have other hon. Members, although no one has mentioned it yet—the dangers of a structural deficit appearing. It seems to me that, if we are not already suffering from a structural deficit, we are half way through the door, and I think that the Chancellor knows that perfectly well. As a result, he started yesterday on the construction of a structure to deal with that emerging difficulty.

There is no short-term salvation. The Chancellor must get more people back to work. He must help small business —he made some efforts in that direction yesterday— because small businesses can involve an awful lot of labour. He knows quite well that there will be increased output in this country for some time—perhaps a considerable time—before there is a marked drop in unemployment.

There is one matter on which I must express severe disappointment. The Chancellor did not use the Budget to help shipyards. I wish that he had taken a careful look at early-day motion 1225 signed by 210 Members from all parties. He will be aware that since 1970 United Kingdom shipbuilding has been reduced by some 75 per cent. while in the EC there has been a reduction of only 53 per cent.

I hope that when the President of the Board of Trade next meets the European Commission he will demand the removal of the hidden state subsidies paid to shipbuilders in other member states and that he will provide the same assistance to our shipbuilding, ship conversion and ship repairing industries as our competitors in Europe receive from their Governments. There is a great deal of heavy engineering in shipbuilding and many skilled people could be put back to work.

Especially in view of the problems which were brought to light by the terrible incident in the Shetlands a few months ago, which was thankfully averted by a storm, the Chancellor could have earned himself some kudos with the green movement if he had done something to help shipbuilding. Something must be done and the sooner the better. It would be helpful to the economy of Britain.

The Chancellor must also raise some revenue in the short term—in the coming year. So what has he done? Sadly, not very much. He told us that the Budget was broadly neutral, as if that were something to be applauded. It could have been applauded if the national finances were in equilibrium, but they are not. So the Chancellor hit the pockets of the drinkers and smokers. I must confess that I am happy that he did something with the ad valorem aspect of tobacco tax. That will certainly help what remains of our cigarette manufacturing industry, a fair chunk of which is in Northern Ireland. It will help our industry compete with the cheap imports from elsewhere. I do not smoke so no one can say that I am gaining any personal benefit out of that measure.

The Chancellor hit fuel and power, especially domestic fuel and power. Many people in rural parts of the United Kingdom, north, south, east and west will not be happy with the changes in the fuel tax on vehicles. In rural areas there is no public transport worthy of the name so people depend on a personal vehicle. It will make life difficult for lower paid members of the population in those areas, not least in my constituency.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that the 17·5 per cent. increase in fuel bills over the next two years would apply to standing charges for gas and electricity. I hope that that is not so, but I fear that it will be. What will be the effect on bottled gas? We do not yet get gas down a pipeline in Northern Ireland, although it is coming. The people who use bottled gas might well escape the increase in standing charges because they do not pay them.

However, in Northern Ireland we have the highest costs of fuel and energy in the United Kingdom and the 17·5 per cent. increase will hurt our constituents badly. Large increases are also in the pipeline for large users of electricity in the next year or so as a result of privatisation. That will not help job prospects in the Province. We cannot afford to allow job prospects to worsen in any part of the United Kingdom in the coming year. In Northern Ireland we face other possible increases in domestic electricity prices. So our domestic consumers will suffer a great deal more than the 17·5 per cent. increase in the next year or two.

By way of an aside, there used to be a spade factory at Templepatrick. I suppose that it is still there. One of its products was spades for cutting peat. It may well find that there is increased demand for its product. Not that I advise cutting peat as a job even for the Minister. I did it and it is pretty hard work. I am not sure that peat is all that cheap a fuel in any case.

If the imposition of VAT on fuel is a gesture to the environmentalists' demands, it is a costly one for the country. More seriously, it has broken through the zero VAT barrier. Once a barrier is broken down, one must expect others to pour through afterwards, so undoubtedly we shall see further extensions of VAT in future years.

The Chancellor hit car owners twice. That was explained to us carefully in the autumn statement so we cannot complain about that. We knew that it was coming. What he has taken with one hand, he has taken back twice over now that March has come round.

The Chancellor hit mortgage payers. They are a captive tax constituency so for them there is no escape. That measure will not be popular. Although mortgage interest is low at present, tradition proves that that does not necessarily hold for long. I suspect that it will increase. Then we shall really hear the noise.

[Mr. William Ross]

The Chancellor tried to avoid thumping house sales —in the eyes of some people—by offsetting the changes in mortgage interest tax relief by increasing the exemption from stamp duty to £60,000. However, that helps only people who are going out to buy. It does not help the existing borrowers, who will find their mortgage payments increased for every month.

In his effort to create a new tax structure, the Chancellor must consider ways of creating immediate income for the Revenue. He does not seem to have done that. He gave everyone two bites of a very sour and bitter lemon. He told folk that the abolition of the special car tax was coming. Now he has done it. Now he has told people what he will do next year, the year after and the year after that. Every time that he comes back to the House to explain that the new taxes will come into operation, he will receive another hammering from everyone in sight.

I assume that one of the reasons why the Chancellor has had to give such long notice of the tax changes that he spelt out yesterday is that it will take time to make them. But unfortunately for him and for the public finances, it is all revenue tomorrow, not today when the Chancellor needs it to reduce the huge deficit. So when he grasped the nettle of raising income tax by 1 per cent. via the national insurance contribution and froze the personal allowances, why did he not go a little further and bang income tax up immediately? It would not be popular but it is not popular anyway. So why not get most of the pain over in one fell swoop? After all, as others have said, a penny on income tax brings in about £1·7 billion and 3p would bring in £5 billion.

From what I was told by the better-off in my constituency, many people in the United Kingdom would have been prepared to put up with an increase in income tax to see us through this tough period in our economic life. The Chancellor will have to do it sooner or later. Income tax has great benefits. It is a sensitive tax. Increasing it has an immediate effect. It is easy to increase it and easier than any other tax to reduce. He could do it immediately. The Chancellor should have gone down that road. It is not a happy or welcome measure but it is a necessary one and one which people would have accepted.

If the Government are to apply harsh measures, they should get it over with in one fell swoop. If the Chancellor had done it this year, he would have been a year further away from the next election. We would all have called him the most terrible names, but if Chancellors are doing their job, they can never be popular. He admitted that last night. Chancellors should not be popular people; they should just do what is right. In any field of human endeavour, that leaves one out of sorts with many of one's neighbours.

The Budget maps out the way ahead but does not address the immediate problems of our huge deficit. I wish the Chancellor and the Government well because if they do not succeed, heaven help us all. However, I believe that we shall be back here in November with real tax increases.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Many people will say, "What a Budget!" It was sensible, fair and skilfully delivered and the phasing of tax increases was a masterstroke. The Budget was good for jobs and especially good for small businesses—I say so as chairman of the Conservative Back-Bench smaller businesses committee.

The Budget contains some measures to help small businesses. The loan guarantee scheme has been successful, but has not been as widely taken up as one would have liked. By extending the scheme to cover 85 per cent. of the total loan, and to a total amount of £250,000, the Government are effectively implementing a radically new guarantee scheme, which will be able to service the needs of virtually every business apart from the largest.

I hope that no hon. Member will refuse to draw the scheme to the attention of all the small businesses in their constituencies. I hope that Labour, Conservative, Liberal and Northern Ireland Members will draw its benefits to the attention of businesses in their areas. The extension of the scheme is good for small businesses, it is a valuable measure and it should be welcomed by the House.

I also wish to draw hon. Members' attention to the deferral of the uniform business rate. Many small businesses were badly upset when the change to UBR was introduced, not because the change was wrong but because it incorporated about 17 years of non-revaluation. As we did not bite the bullet and revalue business premises, there was a considerable increase. Businesses were rightly concerned about their future as we entered a worldwide recession. As a result, many business men were worried that they would lose their businesses, but the Government listened and deferred the increase in UBR—apart from inflation—last year and for the coming year. That was a major achievement for the Government and it has benefited small businesses significantly.

The third measure that I shall draw to the attention of the House is really a series of mini-measures, which will be of inestimable benefit to small business men who are fed up with filling in forms for Government officials. Sensible changes will be made to value added tax. Various measures will take many businesses out of the VAT registration requirements and some sensible measures will relieve businesses of the penalties and problems that they face because of innocent delays or errors in completing VAT. Those penalties and difficulties have been magnified during the recession and have been unfair on many small businesses. It is good to know that the Government have a means to listen to those concerned, that they have listened to people such as myself who have brought such worries to the attention of Ministers, and that they are adopting sensible changes.

I pay tribute to Customs and Excise for no doubt being prepared to help Ministers to implement the changes. All too often recently, the small business community has been concerned that as the Inland Revenue has shown more flexibility and understanding, Customs and Excise has become the bugbear of the small business community. I welcome the changes and the recognition by Customs and Excise that its principles for implementing the VAT regime can sometimes be onerous for small businesses.

The Budget has successfully tackled the big issues. A deficit of £50 billion could not be allowed to continue of long as the effect on, and increase in, our national debt would have been enormous. By tackling the deficit in such a way we know that, as we come out of recession, there will be a significant reduction in the annual increase in our national debt.

There are also good signs that we are already coming out of recession. Industrial production was up in the fourth quarter, and productivity has increased significantly during the past 12 months, making our country attractive for more overseas investment of which we already attract a significant amount.

I hope that further measures to reduce public expenditure will be included in the Budget in November, but I disagree with Opposition Members who think that one can reduce public expenditure only by cutting hospital building programmes. That is the Labour way to do things. If we have to reduce or curtail public expenditure, we do not do as Labour does. We do not cut school building programmes, as Labour did in the 1970s, and we do not have to cut the capital hospital building programme —we look to other areas.

I hope that my right hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will take note of my proposal that we should study civil service numbers. In recent years the private sector has had to reduce numbers and we should do so, too.

The skill of the Budget will be appreciated at the next general election because by then we should have achieved, or be on the doorstep of achieving, a 20 per cent. basic rate of income tax. I hope to be fighting the next election campaign on a manifesto pledge for a 15 per cent. rate of income tax by the year 2000; it is within our sights and we have to go for it.

In the longer term, I hope that the Government will seriously consider abolishing the 40 per cent. rate of income tax. I remind hon. Members that the Victorian era, when income tax was 5p in the pound, was the last time that large amounts of risk capital were available for investment in small businesses. People had 95p in every pound in their pockets and many more people could afford to risk much more of their income on capital investment in risk projects to start businesses.

I also hope that we shall consider measures to help the shipping industry. During the Finance Bill and at every other opportunity I shall continue to advocate a continuation of the 40 per cent. first year allowance for that industry, as that would help shipping, would not cost a fortune and should certainly be continued. I lobbied heavily for the increase in the capital allowance writing-down regime and I hope that it will continue.

I congratulate Treasury Ministers on their incredibly skilful handling of the surplus advance corporation tax problem. For technical reasons, the solution to the problem defied the imaginations of many people. It has been solved not only with considerable skill, but in a way that should encourage many international companies to base their headquarters here. In that way, we can attract many companies to locate here and to employ more people in this country and to bring skilled people to this country, who are capable of employing them.

Let us consider the implications of applying VAT to energy and the effect that that will have on pensioners and those on income support. I was shocked by the extension of VAT to energy—I am always shocked by any tax increase, because I should prefer not to have increases. For the reasons I mentioned earlier, however, this Budget required some measures to deal with our deficit. The Labour party's expression of shock was utterly false indignation. Labour's proposals would have cost the nation even more, would have damaged businesses and would have involved increased regulation. Labour did not say what regulations would stop people and businesses from consuming energy. Regulation can be more damaging to the economy than tax increases.

An important issue was raised earlier. Yesterday my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said:

"Social security benefits will, of course, rise automatically to reflect the price effect of this change"—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 183.]— that is the increase in value added tax.

It is important that the words "price effect" are qualified. I take them to mean the full price effect, because they do not specify a half, a quarter or one third. The words are not clear.

Opposition Members, and in particular the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), have tried to frighten pensioners on income support about the future real level of that support. I will have no difficulty in going through the Lobby in support of the Government next week because I know that the Conservative Government will not let down pensioners on income support. Only the Labour party has a history of doing so. It is the Labour party which has put the stiletto knife into the backs of our pensioners. I remember when the Labour party refused to pay the Christmas bonus for two years in the 1970s. It was the Labour party, when Barbara Castle was Secretary of State for Social Security, which in 1975-76 fiddled the inflation rate in such a way that the inflation rate for 10 months was left out of the increase in the old-age pension.

The Labour party has fallen into a trap carefully constructed by my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench, because, by raising the issue of old-age pensioners, it has drawn attention to its record of failings in the 1970s when it fiddled the retail prices index calculation, as it affected pensioners. We will have the opportunity to say that we will not let down the pensioners or those on low incomes; it was only the Labour party, desperately in hock to the International Monetary Fund, which was forced to do that.

The extra money for the training and enterprise councils, the community action programme, the business start-up scheme and the educational allowance will help more than 100,000 people towards finding work. It is the unions' attitude which has damaged job prospects in this nation. The Labour party tie up with the unions did enormous damage. Lord Scanlon, Hugh Scanlon as he was in the 1970s, admitted that in a massive recantation of his beliefs in a recent article in the Financial Times. He admitted that the Labour party and the trade unions of the 1970s destroyed our car industry. We have rebuilt it.

One special measure missing from the Budget, which I believe should be given careful consideration, is one that I have designed especially for trade union officials. I advocate that special financial help should be given to trade union officials who want to start businesses. Those officials are organisers of men and women and, instead of organising strikes and causing problems for businesses, they could organise them in new businesses.

Why can we not give special help to trade unionists to become entrepreneurs? I believe that such help is needed because if 10,000 experienced trade union officials became entrepreneurs and employed 30 people each, 300,000 people could be taken off the unemployment register. That would be a significant change. Such special help should be given to trade union officials and committee members—we could even include Labour Members and other active members of the Labour party. They could all join in helping to get the nation going through the establishment of small businesses. I have read Labour's alternative

[Mr. David Shaw]

Budget programme and I therefore realise how much the Labour party and the trade unions need that special assistance.

I welcome the help that has been given through capital gains tax relief for entrepreneurs who, having got their first businesses going, want to invest in others. Under the old system, tax relief was only available to a successful entrepreneur, who sold out his first business, if he went abroad. The new system means that that person can stay in this country and help to start new businesses. The change has long been advocated, and responsibly so, by the British Venture Capital Association. I support what the Government have introduced.

The Budget is good for jobs, good for small businesses and good for the nation. It is wonderful, and the only problem with it is that faced by the Labour party, because it points up its deficiencies, lack of policies and ideas. It is an excellent Budget from our point of view and from that of the nation.

8.14 pm

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): The traditional bluster from the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) cannot conceal the fact that yesterday's Budget was a disaster for Britain. The country was looking forward to a Budget for jobs, but I am afraid that it was served a diet of broken promises and steep tax rises.

Opposition Members have already alluded to the fact that the Conservative election pledges of no tax rises and no VAT rises have been broken. If the Governor of Hong Kong were in his seat tonight, he would be able to say, accurately, that the Government have served up a double whammy of VAT and tax rises.

Yesterday's announcement amounts to one of the biggest tax rises in British history. The extension of VAT to domestic fuel bills, the 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions and the freezing of personal allowances will hit every family.

Conservative Members have made much play of the fact that the Budget is good for the poor. The changes mean, however, that a further 200,000 people will be dragged into paying tax for the first time because of the freeze on personal allowances. Yesterday's announcement also means that 4·5 million people who currently pay tax at the 20p rate will lose out, once again, because of that allowance freeze. Because the national insurance contribution is more regressive than income tax, about 500,000 people who are too poor to pay income tax will instead pay higher national insurance contributions.

The Chancellor's window dressing cannot hide the grim reality. Once again, those least able to afford to pay will be penalised. The extension of VAT to fuel bills is not a green tax—it is a vindictive one, levelled against the poor, the elderly and the disadvantaged. After 14 years, however, I suppose that we should be used to that.

Since 1979, the poorest 20 per cent. of households have seen their tax bills rise while the richest 20 per cent. have seen theirs fall. I have never been convinced by the argument that the wealthiest people in our society need the carrot of lower taxation while the poorest need the stick of higher taxation in order to contribute to our economy.

Since 1988, the top rate tax cuts have given the very rich some £10 million. We were promised that that tax-cutting bonanza would provide a long-running, sustainable economic miracle, but that has proved as illusory as the Prime Minister's general election commitments of April 1992.

The Budget means that we are all now paying for the mistakes of the past, without being given a basis to build for the future. In particular, the Budget will do nothing to help the regions, such as my own, to get back to work.

In April last year, the Prime Minister promised that a vote for the Conservatives would be a vote for economic recovery, but since then the economy has gone from bad to worse. The economy, indeed the country, is tottering on the brink of collapse. The north, more than any other region, is paying the price for the broken election promises of the Conservatives.

The facts speak for themselves. Since the Prime Minister usurped his predecessor, a further 40,000 people have joined the dole queues in the north. The region has the highest unemployment rate in Britain, with 32 people chasing every job vacancy. Unemployment affects every person in my region and throughout the country. It costs the taxpayer £9,000 for each man and woman who is unemployed. The north's dole bill amounts to a staggering £1·5 billion.

Yesterday's Budget presented a unique opportunity for that money to be put to work stimulating recovery and creating new jobs, but it failed the most crucial of all tests. It will not make one single person feel any more secure about his or her future employment prospects; nor will it create a single new job. The Government's policies will ensure that unemployment continues to rise relentlessly. According to independent forecasters, unemployment is due to rise by a further 200,000 this year alone.

The Budget represents no basis for sustained recovery. The Chancellor admitted as much yesterday, when he said that our trade deficit would widen to £17·5 billion. It will do so because of the Government's lamentable failure to tackle the investment gaps that hold our country back. We are now paying for the neglect of 14 years of Government inactivity and mismanagement. Since 1979, the gap between the United Kingdom's economic output and that of the rest of the industrialised world has grown to £250 billion. If our growth had managed to keep pace with the European Community average, we would be £65 billion better off today.

Closing that gap should be the Government's key priority, but to close it requires a concerted strategy, diligence on the part of Ministers and, most important, investment. It requires investment in our infrastructure, our skills base, our manufacturing and our regions. It requires more than fine words from the Prime Minister, who has apparently rediscovered the importance of manufacturing; it requires action. But yesterday's Budget promoted inactivity, not activity, in the manufacturing sector.

Yesterday's Budget contained not a jot to stimulate economic recovery or put manufacturing industry back on the road to success. Yesterday's Budget once again signalled that the Government have simply given up the ghost and are not ambitious for Britain to succeed. They clearly believe that we cannot compete against the successful industrialised economies, such as Germany's, and the only way of competing is on the basis of lower and lower wages. The Government are not only talking down Britain, but actively dragging down the British people.

The Budget contained only a few training gimmicks, which cover only one in 30 of the nation's unemployed. According to our estimates, the gimmicks would mean a derisory extra £1 a week for each person on the dole register. Apart from those gimmicks and some rehashed project announcements, the Budget contained next to no new investment in the nation's infrastructure and skills base.

Where was the commitment to my region to restore the £21 billion-worth of training cuts that the training and enterprise councils are having to suffer this year? It is the economics of the madhouse to cut training budgets in the region with the highest level of unemployment, but that is precisely what the Government have done. We have the worst training record, not just among our European partners, but among the newly industrialising countries such as Taiwan and South Korea. Yesterday's Budget did not prove an opportunity for the Government to correct that training deficit.

The Chancellor announced a number of capital projects, which were mainly rehashed, and all in the south-east or London. He threatened to cut off the north from the rest of Europe by locating the chunnel link at St. Pancras instead of King's Cross—[Interruption.] The Financial Secretary to the Treasury may scoff, but that is the reality. When the letters start to flood in to his office, as they will in the next few weeks, I hope that he will have a suitable response to them.

Our region, on the periphery of Europe, requires through trains, through traffic and through ticketing to allow us to compete effectively in the single European market. There is no lack of skill, no lack of enterprise and no lack of ideas among the businesses and people of the north. They require a helping hand from Government, but I am afraid that they received nothing yesterday.

Allowing the regions to wither through inactivity means a massive loss of productive capacity, but that is what we have been witnessing for a decade or more. According to the statistical supplement to the autumn statement, in the period 1987-92, the peripheral regions suffered Government disinvestment, while the south and East Anglia received an enormous level of additional investment. In the period leading up to the 1992 general election, the Government bought votes in Conservative regions on the back of active disinvestment in Labour regions.

The late 1980s boom in the south of England was based on massive levels of state subsidy for housing, transport and industry being diverted from the peripheral regions. That policy did not work for the north or the south, as it resulted in under-resourcing in one instance and overheating in the other. The brakes had to be slammed on, with all the consequences about which we now know.

We also know from the supply estimates that the Government are pledged to cut further the regional aid budget, to the tune of £10 million during the next financial year. The Government should be sowing the seeds of regional prosperity. Investment today will pay dividends tomorrow. Instead, they are laying fallow a tract of this country. Their failure to realise the potential of Britain and its people is holding our country back; it constitutes a massive waste. Regions such as the north have the skills, the enterprise and ideas to make a vital national contribution to reviving our manufacturing industries. Yesterday, the Conservatives decided to ignore that potential, and their Budget has written off the regions, particularly the north.

8.20 pm

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): I join my hon. Friends in welcoming the fundamental economic principles contained in my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's statement yesterday. We all recognise the primacy of monetary policy in pushing forward recovery in this country. All Conservatives firmly believe in the need for sound public finances.

The Budget contained many measures to lead us in the right direction. The Opposition's response to the Budget has been disappointing. It seems that no level of public expenditure satisfies Opposition Members; whatever the circumstances, they always want a higher level. In addition, there is no level of public borrowing that satisfies them; they always require a higher level——

Mr. William Ross: Not all Opposition Members.

Mr. Legg: I agree that the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) is an exception, and his speech today was a welcome breath of fresh air in the Chamber.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor drew some wise international parallels yesterday. He said that recovery was coming in the United States, but not in Europe. Britain is now leading the recovery in Europe, and the projections that the European Commission has made of growth for the coming 12 months show that the United Kingdom will take the lead among the European Community countries. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was wise to draw parallels with the United States, where there has been a strong and substantial recovery.

We need to look at how that recovery has been generated. It has been generated basically by monetary means—by reducing interest rates and relieving the burden of interest rates on consumers and businesses. That process is also taking place in the United Kingdom. In addition to the Budget measures, there has been a reduction in the costs to business of about £4 billion as a result of reductions in interest rates since white Wednesday.

I also welcome the changes set out in the Budget concerning the monetary framework, particularly in the full funding rule. Again, there are parallels with the United States, where in recent years the Federal Reserve, an independent central bank, has been underfunding the deficit and providing support to financial institutions and banks in that country. We need the same mechanism to operate here because our financial institutions have been hard hit during the United Kingdom's membership of the exchange rate mechanism.

The results of the main clearing banks and building societies announced in recent weeks show bad debt provisions totalling £6 billion, equivalent to 1 per cent. of GDP. So the change of abandoning the full funding rule in respect of British monetary policy is absolutely vital, since it will substantially strengthen our banking system, which must be in a position to lend to businesses and aid the recovery.

The Chancellor has made some changes in the monetary indicators that he is using to monitor the economy. I am glad to note that he has downgraded the M0 indicator—the indicator of growth in coins and notes in circulation—to a monitoring range and has put it on the same level as the M4 indicator. He was right in his comments about wishing to see some growth in M4 in present circumstances. But the range that he has set, of 3 to 9 per cent. for growth of M4 over the whole of the medium term, like many of the policy indicators, leaves too much to discretion.

The indicators for a broad money range must be adjusted from year to year as financial conditions change. To allow oneself such discretion over monetary indicators, and to have such a wide range of indicators—including asset prices, broad and narrow money and the exchange rate—will not add greatly to confidence in the marketplaces. Markets wish to see some certainty in the instruments by which the Government are guiding the economy and how changes in interest rates reflect those indicators.

There are probably some dangers in relying too much on forecasts. The Chancellor has set up his panel of independent forecasters and has drawn attention to the fact that the forecasts by the Treasury are not too far from those made by the independent forecasters. But many of those independent forecasters use similar economic models, and the fact that the Treasury model is close to the average does not mean that its forecast will be accurate. In recent years, there have been too many attempts to set and guide policy according to forecasts. We must have a set of clear financial principles by which we guide the economy —there were many indications in the Budget statement of an awareness of that.

Much concern has been expressed from the Government Benches, and by the hon. Member for Londonderry, East, about the size of the public sector borrowing requirement as revealed in the Red Book. Those concerns are well founded. The Chancellor has changed his policy on the deficit. The policy has been to try to balance the deficit over the period of the cycle. We now have a vague phrase about trying to move the deficit towards balance over the period of the cycle.

There is some disagreement and uncertainty about the length of the cycle. If we take the length of the parliamentary cycle—one might imagine that five years should cover an economic cycle—then, looking to the end of this parliamentary cycle in 1997, one sees a Budget deficit of 4·5 per cent. Not only is that well outside the criteria laid down in the Maastricht treaty, but it is probably well outside the criteria that Conservatives who believe in sound public finance should be supporting.

Further measures will probably be needed in the coming years to make sure that the deficit is set at a much lower level. I still believe that the deficit should be balanced over the cycle, which means that in the good years we run a surplus, and in the more difficult years we run a deficit. But we must balance it over the cycle to get the level of public debt down. As many hon. Members have pointed out, running up the level of public debt runs up interest costs for future years and burdens succeeding generations with too high a debt burden. Let us return that principle firmly to the forefront of our economic policies.

There are some interesting changes in the Budget by way of tax reliefs, and I detect some movement afoot to move more towards tax neutrality. If we can go in that direction, with the downgrading of the value of allowances, and, at the same time, reduce overall direct tax rates, we shall be undertaking a beneficial move.

I welcome the changes in mortgage interest relief. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French), who is no longer in his place, I believe that this is a good time, with interest rates falling, to reform mortgage interest relief. I am concerned about the effects of its having been put off by the Chancellor for a full year. In the coming year, we should be driving recovery through monetary means, and reducing interest rates if recovery does not come through. I fear that waiting a further year may mean interest rates rising slightly in 12 months' time, when we shall be reducing tax relief on mortgage interest. So the timing could have been better, with the changes being made in the current fiscal year.

Considering the other tax changes, I am glad that the Chancellor has given high priority to reducing the deficit. Without that priority, the financial markets would have waned in their confidence that the Government could meet their deficit financing requirements. What will be the effect on confidence and recovery of delaying that step for a further year? If consumers know that tax increases are coming 12 months hence, they will undoubtedly factor that into their spending patterns in the current year. They will know that tax increases are coming, but will not have the certainty of knowing exactly how much of their income will be taken by those tax increases.

There are benefits from achieving certainty, and addressing the deficit, at an earlier date. It would strengthen the Government's finances. In political terms, it makes more sense to address the deficit at an earlier stage. We need in the coming two or three years to get the economy back on to a sound financial basis, after the deep recession we have gone through. Once that has been done, we must change the balance of taxation and make sure that our pledge to reduce the basic rate of income tax to 20 per cent. becomes a reality. The increases in the 20 per cent. band of £500 for the two coming years can be only a gesture at this stage. We must redefine our fiscal priorities, and the sooner we do that the better.

I welcome the development of the unified Budget in December; much will need to be done at that time. The level of public expenditure must be given much thought. The reduction of public expenditure must be the other element balancing the increases in taxation that have been made. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will look at housing matters. In reducing the tax benefits of mortgage interest relief, there is also the opportunity to consider housing benefits in the public sector. We need to ensure that they are more closely directed to those who need them, rather than indiscriminate subsidies being directed towards properties.

I welcome the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Malone) about capital gains tax. I took examinations in capital gains tax when I was studying to be a member of the Institute of Taxation. Unlike my hon. Friend, I enjoyed the capital gains tax sections, which I managed to pass on my first attempt. I welcome the changes introduced in the Budget, but I fear that the sections and schedules of the Capital Gains Tax Act will increase. It would be better to have a wider-ranging reform of capital gains tax in due course, probably with the introduction of a tapering system.

Although I enjoyed taking the examinations, over the years I have not enjoyed paying substantial amounts of tax on capital gains.

Several hon. Members have commented on the changes in advance corporation tax. They were certainly one of the most interesting technical sections of the Budget, but we should be quite clear about the businesses and companies that are affected by surplus ACT. The Chancellor appeared to suggest that the United Kingdom should be a mecca for international companies investing here. I agree with that, but the companies with the problem of surplus ACT are, in fact, companies resident in the United Kingdom which are investing overseas, which do not have sufficient income from trading in the United Kingdom to absorb their ACT or sufficient foreign dividend credits to absorb it. Therefore, I do not believe that making those changes is a high priority. I welcome the other changes in the ACT system, especially the ACT reduction for pension schemes, which currently have very substantial tax privileges.

Other measures that will be helpful over the coming months and years include the loan guarantee scheme and the further extension of the export credits guarantee system. These will be especially important because the detail of the Red Book shows that growth in the United Kingdom will not be a repeat of the 1980s. It will not in the main be generated by British consumers, who will be under some tax pressures over the coming years. Therefore, it is important to ensure that businesses export more and take full advantage of export opportunities throughout the world. The widening of support for that is very welcome.

The Budget gives us some principles on which to work, but there is a long road ahead. A great deal of financial change will be necessary over the coming years to ensure that the British economy is rebalanced so that it can take full advantage of being outside the ERM; so that it continues to be a mecca for overseas investment; so that Britain will be not only the country with the highest growth rate in Europe in the coming 12 months, but the country that will achieve the highest level of growth throughout the 1990s, just as we so successfully achieved in the early and middle 1980s.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): The Budget is a triumph of hype over hope. The Chancellor has been preoccupied with protecting his own job, not the jobs of more than 3 million unemployed. He should forget the autocue and tackle the dole queue with a credible strategy for sustainable growth, without which shipyards will continue to turn into scrapyards and the wheels of British industry will remain clamped to a standstill.

To tackle the underlying structural weakness of the economy, we need a major and permanent shift from consumption to production. On present policies, high unemployment will become a permanent feature of the British economy and living standards will go into long-term decline. The stark fact is that Britain still consumes far too great a proportion of its national income. The so-called Thatcher miracle was a mirage. The 1980s boom was a consumption boom. Real living standards for most of us rose on the back of the squandered £100 billion North sea oil revenues and an explosion of credit.

During the 1980s, consumption increased by an average of 2·5 per cent. per year, whereas gross domestic product increased by an average of 1·6 per cent per year. Since 1979, consumer expenditure rose by 37·2 per cent. and GDP by only 22·3 per cent. That catastrophic gap was bridged by increasing debt as the Government virtually incited the nation to live on tick. Consumer credit has more than doubled. At current prices, consumer credit was £512 per adult in 1979 and £1,147 per adult in 1992—and that excludes the impact of negative equity affecting some 1·5 million households. Whereas, in 1981, for every £100 of disposable income household debt was £57, by 1990 that had doubled to £114.

The so-called Thatcher miracle has bequeathed a debt mountain that is crippling the prospects of long-term sustainable recovery, and the Chancellor has not even begun to address that. British consumption as a proportion of GDP is already the highest in the industrialised world, and is completely unsustainable. That has to be turned round as a matter of extreme urgency, but the Budget does not begin to deal with the task. Even the Government's preoccupation—some would say obsession—with low inflation is unsustainable. Some time next year, given Britain's ravenous appetite for imports, rising import prices will inevitably push inflation above 4 per cent., and it will remain there.

In those circumstances, what can the Government do? Either they slaughter their sacred cow of low inflation by abandoning it, or they go back to spending squeezes and slow growth—no U-turn, no policy reversal, just contra-flow Conservatism again. Indeed, from the Government's view the prospects are even more catastrophic than that. The huge budget deficit will soar to £50 billion and will stay at that level, as the Red Book figures show. The Chancellor is tackling it by slashing public services and public investment and by tax rises. That is not only hitting the poorest the hardest and damaging the quality of life for us all; it is self-defeating, because it undermines the real economy that cries out for investment.

The problem is also that, under the Conservatives, Britain has become allergic to Government intervention and investment, which it so desperately needs. We must overturn the suffocating conventional wisdom of Thatcherite and non-Thatcherite economics, otherwise the Budget will be another instance of where the operation was pronounced a success, but the patient died—another stage in a process of Britain's historic economic decline.

We need massive public investment and a radical programme on institutional reform. First, a £20 billion programme of public expenditure-driven investment in infrastructure, training and skills is essential. That should be financed partly by increasing borrowing and partly by mobilising wasted or idle resources, such as the £8 billion in housing capital receipts and the £27 billion cost of maintaining more than 3 million people on the dole. Japan showed the way with that sort of package only last year. The £43 billion Japanese recovery package in August 1992 was designed to boost output by 2·5 per cent., concentrating upon public investment and leveraging the banking system. We can do that kind of thing as well.

Beyond the immediate programme, the City needs complete restructuring. The Chancellor has merely fiddled at the fringes of the problem. Britain's financial institutions have to be forced off their chronic addiction to short-termism. We must make a break from casino capitalism, where the City conducts its affairs without any regard for the national interest.

We should begin by establishing new public banks with the specific remit of mobilising private debt: a housing and construction bank, a national investment bank and a small business bank. Their capital base would be funded by the Government and, equally important, by the financial institutions. Pension funds and insurance companies own some two thirds of the shares in British industry. They could be required, if necesssary by legislation in the absence of voluntary co-operation, to buy multi-billion pound bonds for the new banks.

The housing and construction bank would pioneer cheap mortgages to those on low incomes. The national investment bank would not simply provide cheap, long-term loans; it would also take equity stakes and force the commercial banks to do the same, so altering the whole relationship between loan finance and industry. This needs restructuring along the lines to be found in Germany and Japan, for example, where banks become positive actors in the industrial economy, not simply pursuing short-term returns.

The small business bank would provide cheap long-term loans. The Government could subsidise bank loans to small businesses and give tax breaks to individuals who provided equity finance, or they could provide a tax incentive to banks to take an equity stake in client companies, as happens abroad, especially in Germany.

Radical tax reforms are also needed to go further in phasing out tax relief on mortgages, which will cost £4·3 billion this year, and on personal pensions, which will cost a further £1·6 billion. That money should be used to sponsor and redirect resources into investment and production.

Credit controls of the kind widely adopted in more successful competitor countries are also essential. We need reserve asset ratios to curb liquidity leakages which merely increase indebtedness and consumption. To manage our exchange rate, we also need curbs on speculation. Some 95 per cent. of foreign currency transactions are not in support of international trade but simply speculative gambles which enrich the speculators.

In short, our overriding aim must be to promote industrial growth through Government intervention and expansionary macro-economic policies which are nowhere to be seen in the Budget and which the Government are incapable of and unwilling to produce. We have to break with a tradition of failure—of under-producing corporate Britain, over-indebted household Britain, parasitic financial Britain and collapsing public Britain.

8.52 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): Yesterday was a happy day in my constituency because I have the great honour to represent the town of Newmarket, the historic racing capital of the world. The Chancellor's announcement will give hope to thousands employed in the horse racing industry and will help secure the future of the reputation of that industry as the finest bloodstock industry in the world.

Therefore, I thank my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and most particularly my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, who spent many days working out a successful scheme. Yesterday was a memorable day for British racing. I hope that the Chancellor's announcement will spur on the revival of a great and long-standing British industry.

Someone recently told me that being in favour of small business was like being in favour of motherhood and apple pie. If so, I plead guilty, and I am glad to welcome the Chancellor as well to motherhood and apple pie.

Parts of the press have described the Budget as a Budget for jobs. The 1980s saw a flowering of entrepreneurial activities that resulted in growth, in rising living standards and in repayment of national debt. It is significant that, in the period 1987-89, when unemployment fell so rapidly, fully 70 per cent. of net job creation was accounted for by firms with fewer than 100 employees. Similarly, firms with fewer than 20 employees accounted for half the new jobs.

Therefore, I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for the range of measures which will be welcome to the small business community. Those measures will help enormously small business men at a difficult time.

All countries have suffered recession. In Britain, company liquidations rose two and a half times in the period 1988-92. The number of smaller companies registering for VAT fell last year, for the first time since 1979. What clearly emerges from that is the need to revive the enterprise culture and to underline the importance of small business in the whole process of job creation.

In East Anglia in the 1980s, the number of businesses registered for VAT rose by the second largest percentage in Britain. It is estimated that, in my constituency, up to 85 per cent. of the work force are employed in small businesses. In villages in rural west Suffolk, there are dozens of small manufacturing businesses employing perhaps only half a dozen people each.

It is not only the recession that has so severely damaged small businesses; the growth in bureaucracy and the cost of compliance, as well as the difficulties of obtaining finance and acceptable terms for that finance, have also played a part. My right hon. Friend sought to address that in part yesterday. The lack of viable long-term finance has been hugely difficult for small business. Many hon. Members have alluded to that. All of us have had to deal with distressed constituents who have suffered the consequences.

The banks are under severe pressure. It is instructive that the big four clearing banks have recently increased their provision for losses and bad debts to a monumental £5·8 billion, as my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) pointed out. That is an increase of £0·5 billion from last year. I welcome a specific fund launched by one of the big four clearing banks in my constituency this week to help small businesses. However, we are talking about a major, continuing structural difficulty which may bedevil small businesses in future.

In boom times, the friendly bank manager is awash with cash and generosity. In recession, the unfriendly bank manager is seeking to restore his employer's battered margins precisely when the business man needs him most. Do I exaggerate? I think not. At the heart of the matter is the worldwide recession, yet it is clear from bankers themselves that, following their recent traumatic experiences, they are reluctant to lend to small businesses without the restructuring of lending practices as such.

No one is more ill-disposed to involving the state in lending money or making business decisions than I am. The results in our own country and of our own history manifestly have proved that to be disastrous. Nevertheless, the business community—the lifeblood of our economy—has been beset by a roller coaster ride of interest rates, which has been deeply damaging over the past 20 years. I therefore greatly welcome the prospect of limited fixed interest rates announced yesterday.

The loan guarantee scheme introduced in 1981 has undoubtedly been helpful. To its credit, 30,000 guarantees have been issued for loans of nearly £1 billion—a gap for companies lacking a history or track record has been closed by the scheme. Its extension is good news. The reduction in premiums is also welcome. The increase in the size of eligible and the higher proportion guaranteed will be most helpful.

However, given the banks' attitudes in the present climate, will that be enough—or should we look to a different structure to help finance our small business community? After the war, under the Marshall plan, the KfW was born in Germany. It is now self-financing, and that is critical. Essentially, the KfW's role is to pass on to small German companies the low interest rates at which it can it borrow in international markets. It is not the German Government who lend the money but the guarantor and owner of the majority stake.

By its construction, the KfW does not even appear in the German budget or impose on the public sector borrowing requirement. Does that impinge on free market principles? Yes, possibly it does—but given Britain's unique reliance on the lending institutions and the unsatisfactory experience of them, that alternative is one that we should explore.

The KfW operates in a way similar to the World bank. It has established a good credit rating over the years, and thereby attracts loan capital. It is a wholesale operation that affords smaller companies the opportunity to borrow on terms similar to larger companies. Any comparable institution here should not be based on access to loans but on the terms.

Interest rates are no more than 1 per cent. above long-term rates and loans are for up to 10 years. The emphasis is on the long term. Although commercial banks make the actual loans, the KfW is not in competition with them because it does the refinancing.

The Small Business Bureau has made that a central pillar of its thinking, and that has to be the logic of yesterday's announcements by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I urge him to consider such an arrangement in the months to come. The German experience is regarded as excellent—and such a scheme need not be part of the PSBR.

As we on this side of the House know so well, this country's ability to survive and prosper is dependent on the goods and services that we produce and sell. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was right to emphasise growth over the next 12 months, to effect speedier economic recovery. However, I appeal to my right hon. Friend, as a number of my hon. Friends have done this afternoon, if growth is faster than expected, to attempt to reduce the £50 billion deficit projected for the next financial year. Fiscal restraint will inevitably afford opportunities for further monetary relaxation. I wholeheartedly support the review by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to examine critically every aspect of Government expenditure. Control of state spending is not only an economic but a moral issue.

Recovery, particularly for smaller businesses, will be spurred on by the relaxation in the full funding rule, which will help the liquidity of banks and their ability to finance smaller business needs. The last three years have been extremely difficult. We can now see light at the end of the tunnel when our competitors can see only darkness. As we continue to recover and apply fiscal rectitude, we can put in place the regeneration of the British economy. The foundations are now in place. I greatly welcome yesterday's Budget.

9.3 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): Before making my substantial points about the Budget's economic consequences, I will mention one or two positive aspects. The first concerns the loan guarantee scheme, and I declare an interest as an unpaid director of Pendleton's Ice Cream in my constituency, which is in the process of trying to put together a package to create jobs in the ice cream industry.

It is probably too late for that company to take advantage of the enhanced loan guarantee scheme possibilities that the Budget creates, but as someone who has just gone through the process of trying to fund a business, I acknowledge that improvements to the scheme are to be welcomed. In that instance, it is not the case of an individual but of a group of workers who intend to own 51 per cent. of the company's equity. Nevertheless, the financing opportunities for small businesses are welcome.

Secondly, I echo a point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). Ironically, this concerns the withering of mortgage interest tax relief. Let us recognise that that is what the Government are embarked on. One of the ironies here is that, during the last general election campaign, I was castigated by my Conservative opponent for having at one time had the temerity to advocate such a thing. Indeed, my opponent circulated to all owner-occupiers in the constituency a leaflet saying that if this dreadful socialist man were re-elected, mortgage interest tax relief would be whipped away. How strange that the Government of whom he wanted to be a supporter here should be doing that very job without my help. In any case, this is a move in the right direction.

The final positive point to which I wish to refer is the way in which the export credits guarantee scheme is being extended. In this regard, I shall say only that I am sure I was not alone, over the past few years, in making approaches to the Department of Trade and Industry on behalf of firms. This has been a major problem for exporting companies—particularly those in the machine tool industry, but undoubtedly for others as well. Unfortunately the move is a bit late. For instance, I know of a £5 million order that failed to go ahead in my constituency because of the lack of export credit guarantees. None the less, this long-overdue reform is welcome.

I wish to refer now to the problems that the Government have not resolved. The key question, which Ministers and many other hon. Members have acknowledged, is this: how are we to achieve growth in the economy, and, with growth, how are we to resolve the problems of unemployment? Time does not permit me to go into all the consequences of unemployment for individuals, but I have to point out that my constituency is probably one of the economic black spots of Europe. I do not say so with any pride; this is a simple fact of life with which we have had to deal over the past 15 years or so.

Unemployment has enormous economic and public finance consequences. For example, benefits alone cost £30 billion a year, and lost output and lost income amount to £60 billion a year. Unemployment cannot be lightly brushed aside in economic terms—to say nothing of its effect in human terms. What sort of growth is needed to stop the growth of, and then reverse, unemployment? I listened with close attention to much of the debate yesterday. The hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) spent some time discussing this matter. His estimate, with which I more or less agree, is that it is necessary to have growth rates above 2 per cent. before one starts to eat into the problems of unemployment. Yet the Chancellor admitted yesterday that the Government expect a rate of only 1·25 per cent. this year, rising to 1·75 per cent. next year. Thus, we shall not begin to reverse the tide of unemployment that is sweeping the country. If we are to start to take the long-term unemployed off the register, we must have growth rates of about 2·5 per cent.

As I expect even Ministers would concede, there are several constraints. The most pressing of these is the horrendous balance of payments situation. If the Government achieve the wrong sort of growth—if, as was intended up until yesterday's Budget, growth is led entirely by the consumption of private individuals—the balance of payments problem will simply be exacerbated, as happened in 1987, 1988 and 1989, and the deficit will again spiral to £20 billion or thereabouts.

That is not the most appropriate means of achieving growth in the economy. It strikes me that there is only one sensible way out of our problems—public borrowing and public spending. I do not want to specify a target figure over and above the £50 billion, but it seems to me that, in so far as that amount will produce a growth rate of only between 1·25 per cent. and 1·75 per cent. and will therefore fail to eat into the unemployment problem, we need to think in terms of a higher rate of public sector borrowing. The PSBR must be pitched at a level that will lead to a growth rate of 2·5 per cent. The ultimate failure of the Budget is the fact that it will not achieve that, and thus will not begin to solve the problems of unemployment.

The Government will say that recent history shows that such solutions are no longer possible. The Labour Government of 1964-70 have been much denigrated—certainly by Conservative Members—but that Government achieved a consistent growth rate averaging 2·8 per cent. throughout their period of office. It is no accident that, during much of that period, virtually full employment was achieved.

That strikes me as a sensible target. The only way to achieve it is to devise capital expenditure programmes that do not necessarily have large revenue implications—and, my goodness, any of us could find dozens of such projects in our constituencies. Creating demand in the private sector is surely the most sensible way to create growth: it would minimise problems relating to the balance of payments.

The Budget contains some useful innovations, but its ultimate failure lies in the fact that it will not begin to solve the problems of unemployment. Any measure that does not solve those problems must, in the end, be deemed a failure.

9.11 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes): I am grateful for the chance to speak, if only to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on what I consider to be a courageous Budget. I use the word "courageous" advisedly: I think that my right hon. Friend had to make an immensely difficult decision. He had to decide between financing an enormous deficit and preventing the undermining of the recovery that has begun. I do not envy his position, and I respect the decision that he made. Until yesterday, I believed that financing the deficit was a priority; following my right hon. Friend's Budget speech, however, I accept that—having had to balance those two factors—he concluded that it was essential to give the recovered economy a chance to flourish, at least for a year.

For that reason, I am amazed by the reaction of Opposition Members. All that they have done is call for more and more expenditure; with one honourable exception, none of them has suggested how that expenditure should be paid for. The honourable exception is the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain): his recipe was not one to which my hon. Friends or I would subscribe, but at least he tried.

Do Opposition Members live in a fantasy world? I think that it was Lord Healey who once said, "If you find an elephant on your doorstep, it is worth recognising the fact." I should have thought that a £50 billion deficit was a very large elephant, however it was measured; but the Qpposition seem to think that such a deficit can be ignored, and that we can proceed as though it did not exist —that it is possible to continue to get something for nothing. The truth is that, in this world, we never get something for nothing, and that is certainly not possible in terms of my right hon. Friend's Budget.

Over the next few months, my hon. Friend must seriously consider the question of the deficit. I agree with what many other Conservative Members have said today: my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling), for instance, made an important point about the cumulative effect of the deficit over the years, and the need to start financing it as soon as possible. I join my hon. Friends in hoping that a large part of that financing can be achieved through substantial public expenditure cuts.

I believe that the programme must be advanced as soon as possible, and I hope that Ministers will be courageous. There is enormous scope: examination of the universality of benefits, for example, could produce dividends, and I consider that it would be difficult for any hon. Member on either side of the House to argue against such action in the long run.

It is interesting to hear the Opposition call the Clinton experiment in America far-sighted and courageous, but, when we are doing essentially the same thing on this side of the Atlantic, they say that it is dishonourable.

I believe that the imposition of VAT on energy and domestic fuel is necessary, but do the figures for the take from the charge allow for the fact that we expect energy consumption to decrease as a result of the charge? The answer should be an important part of the presentation of the Chancellor's strategy.

I have been surprised that, yesterday and today, we have heard nothing about what the Chancellor did not do. In the lead-up to the Budget I received countless letters saying that we must not levy VAT on newspapers, books, adult education, children's clothes or food. My right hon. Friend yesterday announced that he would not be levying VAT on those items and that he had listened to the representations. I should have thought that at least those who had been speculating or making accusations in the past few months would recognise that my right hon. Friend had taken proper account of their representations.

The Budget has been greatly welcomed in my constituency, especially for its proposals for small businesses of which there are many in my constituency. They welcome the freezing of the effect of the business rate and the changes in the loan guarantee scheme of which they will take great advantage in the coming months.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) in welcoming, on behalf of my constituents, the announcement about VAT on bloodstock. I was interested to hear the leader of the Liberal party on radio yesterday suggesting scathingly that the Budget was good for racehorses but bad for everything else. I can tell him that many people in my constituency and in neighbouring constituencies such as Newbury rely on the bloodstock industry and racing for a living and will not take kindly to his scathing remarks.

Mr. Beith: I hope that the hon. Gentleman realises that not only have we called for the type of changes that the Chancellor announced but my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) called for them some months ago.

Mr. Ancram: I heard the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) calling for them in the Chamber just after the vacancy in Newbury became known. I was surprised because I have lived in his constituency and I know that the racing industry does not play a very large part in it.

There are, of course, worries in my constituency about elements of the Budget and I hope that the Chancellor will take account of them. There is a feeling that some measures could discriminate against rural areas. I am referring especially to the increases in petrol prices. I know that it is very difficult to talk to petrol producers about pricing differentials for remote, rural areas. There is a difference between buying petrol at a motorway filling station as opposed to anywhere else. I hope that my right hon. Friend will join me in approaching petroleum companies to see whether the discriminatory effect on rural areas of increases in petrol prices can be mitigated.

As for VAT on domestic fuel and power, we must take account of the fact that in rural areas there is much less ability to choose the power source for heating one's home. Perhaps we could find a way of dealing with that anomaly.

Having listened to all the arguments, I believe that the key to the Budget did not appear in the Budget: it is to be found in the word "confidence". Whether or not my right hon. Friend's strategy succeeds depends on restoring confidence in the economy. I view the recession as being like a circle, with many people facing each other's backs and all waiting for the person in front to start moving before they move. I believe that we are beginning to see the first signs of movement within that circle. If my right hon. Friend's strategy is to succeed, we must inspire in people the confidence to go out and invest, and to feel safe to spend their money again. Only when that begins to happen shall we see the circle beginning to move, and the growth that my right hon. Friend wants beginning to occur.

That, above all, is why I found the speech of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) so intensely depressing. Again, all we heard from him was a litany of despair, and of talking down this country, its economy and its workers. It almost seems to me now as if the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues do not want the recovery to occur. They are going out and telling people, "Don't spend, don't buy, don't invest,"—because they know that if people start spending, buying and investing, the recovery will come, and their chances of ever being elected as the Government of this country will be gone.

I support my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I congratulate him on his courage, and I shall certainly support the Budget in the Lobbies.

9.20 pm

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): The aftermath of the Budget is inevitably dominated by its immediate effect on taxes, excise duties and national insurance. I do not want to dwell on those, except to say that, despite the efforts of the Tory good news machine, which is clearly not what it used to be, the public's verdict on the Budget was best expressed by the Sun today. I am not known for my devotion to that newspaper, but it is becoming increasingly shrewd and perceptive, for on its front page it summed up the Budget with the headline, "Nightmare on Norm Street". That clearly shows that the Sun increasingly intends to make an honest paper of itself at last.

It is clear from the public response, and from today's newspaper coverage of the Budget, that the price that the Chancellor has paid on behalf of his party and the Government is that the Tories are now indelibly stained as the party of devaluation, high taxes and broken promises. That has tremendous political significance. As we know —the Opposition have a special reason for knowing it, to our cost—the Tories have had a remarkable run of good luck on the subject of taxation. That subject dominated the 1987 election and the end of the 1992 election campaign —without justice, but I am afraid that the Tories managed to do us a fair amount of damage. As a consequence of the Budget, the Tory tax spell is now lifted, not only for now but for ever. I suspect that Conservative Members realise that, even if they dare not acknowledge it in public.

I shall put the short term on one side and concentrate, if I have time, on one or two comments on the fundamental question about the Budget—whether it makes Britain's economy stronger or weaker in the long term. First, the Budget should have squared up to the scale of unemployment, which is sapping the economy's strength. Clearly it did not do that, with the pathetically inadequate direct measures that the Chancellor proposed to combat unemployment. If he had been less concerned and preoccupied with the threat to his own job, he might have devoted more energy to creating jobs for others. Lamentably, he did not do that.

[Mr. Peter Mandelson]

Instead, the Red Book reveals not hope but despair about unemployment. It makes an average forecast that 200,000 more jobs will disappear this year—and that is coupled with what, although it is gloomy enough, I fear is an understatement:

"it will be some time before it"—

that is, unemployment—

"starts to fall again."

None the less, the measures described offer opportunities for only one third of the people who have been made unemployed since the Tory election victory last year. That is only a pin prick in the Government's own total of 3 million. I do not say that the schemes are wrong in principle and I do not think that the measures proposed should be damned by anyone because of their association with the Prime Minister's utterances on workfare. However, I believe that they are woefully insufficient. Leaving so many people out of contact with work for so long means that there is a risk of never being able to recruit many of them back to productive work. That is the long-term danger to our economy.

Unemployment is not just a social evil. On this scale and with so little possibility of an early reduction under present policies, it is an economic calamity. When people are laid off, their skills are unused and dissipated, and productive capacity is scattered and lost for ever. The unemployed lose and the country loses. The Budget has simply failed to square up to that reality and to offer a way out.

My next point concerns industry and British manufacturing capacity in the long term. Although the Government now mouth words about the importance of manufacturing, there are no signs that the attitudes of the Thatcher years are being reversed. There was no trace of that in the Chancellor's speech or in the Red Book. Why is this point so important? If anyone has any doubt about the importance of the manufacturing sector, they need only to have read The Sunday Times this week which contained revelations about the Government's secret report on the state of British manufacturing.

There is a unique feature in this recession. Unlike the recession of the early 1980s, this recession is cutting into the productive capacity not only of old industries, but of modern, hi-tech, precision-goods engineering industries —the manufacturing of the future. Crucially, along with that loss of capacity comes the loss of skills and the loss of a presence in vital areas of engineering, in micro-technology and in other sophisticated, new markets of services and of manufacturing. That is the biggest dagger in our economic heart in the long term. We shall never be able to conjure back the industrial capacity lost in the past, yet we now face the destruction of modern, productive capacity which is desperately needed if our economy is to succeed in future.

The threat to our future is confirmed in a highly pessimistic forecast of growth and trading performance in the Red Book. That forecast is all the more remarkable because on page 37 the Government claim that there is an "underlying improvement in competitiveness" in many sections of the economy and of manufacturing industry. The Red Book says that our competitiveness has improved —that improvement is, no doubt, from a very low base and is insufficient in comparison with the improvement of our rivals—but that economic growth will be slight. Our competitiveness, despite the claims for it, is not, in the Government's view, leading to economic growth.

The damning explanation is that, despite improved competitiveness, industrial capacity has shrunk so much that we simply do not have the size, the diversity and the versatility of tradeable manufacturing activity to take advantage of the opportunities available to us. That is the crushing indictment of the Tory record which is exposed in the secret report published in The Sunday Times. The report candidly admits:

"the flaws in British industry will take decades to remove."

The Budget fails to address that point and it fails to present any measures to deal with it.

Uniting the point about work and unemployment and the point about industry and manufacturing is the absolute necessity of investing in and developing human potential, and thereby genuinely transforming the competitiveness and size of Britain's trading sector in goods and services. We need a fresh ambition and purpose to achieve that. I have a suggestion that the Government may like to consider. We need to introduce a new target to spur Government and to galvanise the nation, and to turn this decade into a genuine investment decade.

The new target for the real economy should be investment, defined as an annual proportion of gross domestic product and including investment in people as well as investment in technology and the infrastructure. It would be a target that the private sector and the public sector would work in partnership to achieve and, if private investment fell back, it would be right for the public sector to fill the gap. I hope that the Government will consider putting in place that target and indicator for the real economy, alongside the nominal and monetary targets that they follow at the moment.

Until we put investment and the development of our people, as our essential economic resource, at the centre of economic policy, I fear that we shall continue on a path of long-term economic decline—a path which is all the more tragic because it is so clearly avoidable.

9.29 pm

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): People need a sense of where the country and its economy are going. After yesterday's Budget statement and today's debate—or, at least, Conservative Members' contributions to it —they have no such sense. People need to have confidence in the Chancellor; they have none. They need to believe that the Prime Minister, who has drifted from one problem to the next, has some clear vision of where he wants to go. Today, they are no wiser than they were last week.

Neither the Chancellor nor the Prime Minister has managed to salvage his position. They are linked together in devaluation and tax increases. We are told that the Budget is modelled, at least to some extent, on President Clinton's approach. The difference is that President Clinton inherited the economic problems in America whereas, in this country, the Prime Minister and the Chancellor created the problems that they are now trying to tackle.

The Chancellor has drained every last drop of his credibility. This is the same Chancellor who said:

"we will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

This is the same Chancellor who told us that he saw green shoots, among other things, when we now know that, at the time when he said it, there was every sign that the economy was continuing in recession. We know that the Conservatives won the last election on a fraudulent prospectus. We are talking either about gross incompetence—they did not see what was happening to the economy—or about a calculated deception of the people of this country.

It is not as though this is a Budget for investment in the future. The tax increases that the Chancellor announced yesterday were to pay for mistakes made by the Government over the past 14 years. It was an interesting Budget, because, for the first time, the Chancellor has attempted to tie his successor—whoever that may be—for the next three or four years. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) made an interesting point—I say that not just because he is my pair—when he asked whether the commitments and tax increases promised by the Chancellor yesterday ran with the Government or with the Chancellor. We shall have to see. The Government have no vision; for them, "long term" means some time next week.

Credibility is important not just for the markets but to show that the Government have a strategy for recovery in the long term. Credibility is also important if politics is not to be further debased in the eyes of men and women in Britain. It is important that, when politicians make promises, they should be prepared to keep them. It will be emphasised again and again over the next few years that the Government said that they would introduce no new taxes. We watched their lips. It was interesting to see the Chief Secretary squirming this afternoon when he protested and spluttered, "We have no plans—honestly. That's the plain truth." When people resort to that form of words, it is quite obvious that what they are saying is not the case.

Just before the election last year, the Prime Minister said:

"we have no plans to increase VAT . . . there will be no VAT increase."

For the Chief Secretary to characterise a tax increase as a green tax is absolute nonsense. Taxes do not become green simply by the addition of the word "green" above the proposals in the Budget paper. The Chief Secretary also said that the Prime Minister put his signature to the treaty at Rio and that the VAT increases were part of that process. The Prime Minister also put his signature to the manifesto, so that does not prove very much. The Prime Minister said:

"we have no plans and no need to extend the scope of VAT."

The Prime Minister flies by the seat of his pants.

The chairman of the Conservative party—perhaps the next Chancellor, from what we are told—said that increased national insurance contributions were a "stealth" tax. If he says that they are a tax on income, surely they are a tax on income.

The Chief Secretary told us this afternoon that he was not in favour of direct taxation. Surely an increase in national insurance is an increase in direct taxation. It is one which will hit low-paid people particularly hard because of the ceiling on national insurance contributions.

People know that Tory Governments mean more tax for most people. Let us examine the Tory record since 1979. Most people are paying a bigger tax bill. Indeed, the poorest 10 per cent. of people pay the most tax. The richest 10 per cent. pay the least. We knew that the trickle-down theory of tax would never work. That has now been demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt.

When we examine what the Government propose this year, we find the same pattern yet again. The top 10 per cent. of earners will lose about 1·5 per cent. of their income. The bottom 10 per cent. will lose 3 per cent. of their income as a result of the Government's proposals. So, again, those on low incomes are paying and those on high incomes, who are better placed to shoulder the burdens, are let off lightly.

As for the effect that the VAT extension will have on people on low incomes and those in receipt of income support, it was instructive to watch how the Chief Secretary found himself impaled on a hook that came from behind him, rather than from the Opposition. The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) said that he was confident from what the Chancellor had said that income support would be fully indexed to ensure that the increase in VAT would be met. The Chancellor said:

"Social security benefits will, of course, rise automatically to reflect the price effect of this change . . . My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security will take this into account when the income-related benefits are uprated next year."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 183.]

There is no guarantee whatever that income support will be increased by 3 per cent. above inflation to take account of the effect of the Chancellor's announcement yesterday. He made no commitment whatever.

It was nonsense for the hon. Member for Dover to say that if the Chancellor had not meant that there would be a full increase in income support, he would have said that the increase would be only half as much or a quarter as much. Time and again, social security increases do not take account of the increased burdens that people have to meet. The Government know it and the country knows it. It is no use the Chancellor or the Chief Secretary protesting that those who will have to meet the full cost of VAT on domestic fuel will have the burden eased by increased income support. That is not the case. There is not a shred of evidence to suggest that it is the case. Indeed, if it were the case, the Government would have said so in clear and unambiguous terms.

Gas and electricity bills account for about an eighth of the expenditure of people on low incomes. The increase will hit people on low incomes and those who have no income at all especially hard, and the Government know it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) said, pensioners may be forced to make a choice between heating and eating.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) observed, under the Conservative Government VAT is becoming progressively regressive. The Government have described their proposals as a wedge of revenue. We are entitled to ask whether it is the thin end of the wedge. VAT has now been imposed on domestic fuel. How much longer will it be before other previously zero-rated items are brought into the scope of VAT? Perhaps the Financial Secretary will tell us when he replies.

We were told that the Budget would be a Budget for jobs. It was certainly a Budget to save the Chancellor's job. We were told that it was a Budget for investment. Look at what has happened. The House will recall that in his autumn statement the Chancellor heralded the go-ahead for the Jubilee line, now stalled. We are now told that the crossrail scheme has been put off until some time in the future. The central Scotland link is at least two or three years away.

The Chancellor promised that the Heathrow Express would definitely go ahead, yet in its press notice the Department of Transport said that agreement had been reached in principle. The Heathrow Express link—the sole firm commitment in the Budget—is just six miles of railway line. That is the only commitment that the Chancellor made yesterday. The only reason why it has been held up is a dispute between accountants and the impending threat of privatisation, which is effectively blocking many schemes for rail development.

The Chancellor has promised the channel tunnel link again, 10 years late. Trains will travel between Paris and the channel tunnel next year at a speed of 180 mph. They will have to slow down slightly to go through the tunnel and then they will travel through Kent at 47·5 mph. That is an indictment of the Government's stewardship of the transport infrastructure. What about links to the north? The Chancellor had nothing to say about that.

What is the Government's strategy for the economy? We left the last century as the workshop of the world, but we are about to leave this century in the second division. We seem to have lost our ability to invest in and manufacture goods of high added value. In the 1980s, our share of world high-tech exports fell from 11·2 to 9·2 per cent. We also lost our market share of medium and low-tech exports, and not just to European or US competitions.

All the time, on the other side of the world on the Pacific rim, economies have been growing at between 6 and 9 per cent., despite the recession in the United States, to which they were supposedly linked. Those economies have mastered basic manufacturing and the ability to exploit our innovations and are now increasing research and development, to move into high added value products. The evidence is to be seen from what is happening with British Aerospace. We invented and developed the 146 aircraft, but Taiwan wants to take it over and develop it.

The Pacific rim countries are looking to low-cost countries such as Indonesia and India to assemble the goods that they have invented. The Government seem determined that we should compete with countries that assemble goods rather than with those that invent them.

The Department of Trade and Industry report seems to have fallen victim to what I would call the "Spycatcher" syndrome. Hon. Members will remember that the Government spent millions of pounds of tax payers' money trying to stop the publication of that book around the world. This is the Government who impounded copies of Pravda at Heathrow airport, so that we could not read what Russians could read if they had cared to buy a copy. Exactly the same is happening with the DTI report. Our competitors know the problems of British industry, but the Government do not want the people of this country to know—so much for the Prime Minister's commitment to open government and the citizens charter.

We have heard nothing about research and development. The temporary period granted for capital allowances in the autumn statement has not been extended. I happily welcome what the Government have done for small businesses, except that the measures only ameliorate the problems that they face. For example, the relationship between banks and small businesses has not been examined. The inquiry commissioned by the Chamber has not resolved the problems that many small businesses have with their banks. I agree with the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring)—in times of plenty banks are happy to lend money, but at present their conduct towards many small businesses leaves much to be desired.

While I am broadly sympathetic to the problems faced by our insurance companies in competition with European insurance companies, we shall consider carefully the proposals for Lloyd's. Lloyd's is not a corporation but a collection of individuals and I do not understand why individuals should be given tax breaks and concessions unless it can be proved beyond doubt that they have alienated the money in question and are not simply receiving advantages that other taxpayers would not enjoy. I look forward to the day when Conservative Members with vested interests, as members of Lloyd's, declare their interest, not only in their speeches but by declining to go into the Lobby with the Government when we discuss that matter.

We must consider the relationship between the Government, the economy and the financing of businesses. We must also consider the availability of finance, following deregulation of the market. I do not believe that we shall ever return to a regulated market and the controls that were a feature of economies, but is is important that the Government recognise that more and more people will use financial services to provide for their short and long-term needs. That means that it is important for the Government to put in place an efficient regulatory system, which will promote confidence if we are to encourage people to make provision for themselves or simply to put their savings to good use. They must be confident that this country's financial services are in sound shape and are properly regulated. We wait with interest to see what the Government will produce next year.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury only hinted at his plans for public spending, but he hinted that there will be hard cuts to come. The House should realise that public spending is not some sort of luxury, but in many cases means spending on essential infrastructure, on education and training, and on providing for health which is a social and economic need. Public spending means providing police, about which the Government say plenty but often do completely the opposite. Public spending cannot be cut with abandon without any consequence to the economy. I hope that, in the next few days, hon. Members will remind the Government time and again that cutting public spending is a false economy.

We must tackle the structural problems in our population. Those problems, together with immense demographic changes, should condition our economic thinking, but we have heard nothing from the Government about that. Although I welcome new technology as something to be embraced, it will mean that the number of job opportunities will decrease in the immediate future. Unemployment is a drag in economic terms as well as a catastrophe in social terms. We have heard nothing from the Government about what they propose to do as a result of those structural problems.

Tomorrow, we shall consider jobs and training. There is no point in converting employment training and youth training into short-term schemes. Many schemes already endeavour to give young people the proper training and skills. To convert such schemes into six-month courses may get more people off the unemployment register and more people through those schemes, but those courses will not give those people the highly skilled, highly motivated life style that is essential for the development of our economy.

It seems that the Government's only strategy appears to be to get people off the unemployment register in order to make it more politically acceptable. What we need is a highly skilled, highly motivated work force. As my hon. Friends have said, nothing that the Chancellor said yesterday gives us any cause to believe that the Government recognise that problem. To say that we shall have competition between TECs for innovative projects debases the problem that we face. It is no wonder that training providers and trainees are becoming increasingly cynical about the Government's proposals.

The Government have been in power for 14 years. They were elected on a fraudulent and false prospectus, and they know it. People know that the Conservative party is the party of devaluation, high taxation and economic failure and that it is the architect of profound social unease. The Budget will haunt the Government for years to come.

9.46 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): Let us begin on the common ground that has been revealed by the debate. Every hon. Member would agree that the Chancellor's key objective in presenting his Budget was to ensure that the recovery is nurtured and that it prospers. It is widely recognised that the only way in which we can create jobs for those on the unemployment register and hold out the prospect of improved living standards and social services is by ensuring that the British economy performs well and that British business is successful.

On that front, as my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) said, the news is better than the Opposition would like. Today we published figures for retail sales that show that they are up by 2 per cent. on what they were this time last year. Recently, we published figures on industrial production in Britain that showed that, despite the rhetoric from the Opposition, it is nearly 1 per cent. higher than it was this time last year. I accept that that is not an enormous amount, but it compares favourably, as my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) said, with the 8½ per cent. drop in industrial production in the same period in Japan, the 6½ per cent. drop in Germany and the 3½ per cent. drop in France.

We have heard from the Opposition that the Government have no interest in industrial production, but the next time they use that argument I hope that they will analyse those figures that compare our industrial performance in the past 12 months with that of our industrial competitors.

When the Opposition are considering our economic prospects I hope that they will note that car sales have gone up 7 per cent. in the most recent quarter in comparison with the sales recorded in the previous three months. They should also bear in mind that, so far this year, new house sales have gone up 20 per cent. on the level achieved at the end of last year. That increase led the chief executive of Wimpey to say just last week,

"Demand is coming back and the affordability message is coming through. Last week was our best week for sales since 1990."

I hope that they might also reflect on the fact that the chief executive of Bryant Homes, a competitor of Wimpey Homes, was quoted—accurately, I think—as saying that there was no doubt that the recovery was under way, at least in his sector.

Every recovery starts with a series of anecdotes about people doing better than they had previously expected. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) quoted several important anecdotes from his own constituency experience of how investment was holding out the prospect of jobs and improving output in his part of the world. Kimberly-Clark is bringing 2,700 jobs to my hon. Friend's constituency. We heard not a word of welcome for that from the Opposition today. We heard not a mention from the Labour party about how Norsk Hydro is investing in a new nitric acid plant in my hon. Friend's constituency. Recovery starts when people make investment decisions because they believe that they have found the place where their business will be able to secure economic progress for itself and its employees. That is the fundamental truth, remarkable only for its absence today from Labour Members' speeches.

When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor presented his Budget to the House yesterday afternoon he had two objectives: first, to nurture the recovery now and, secondly, to ensure that that recovery is sustained into the medium and long term. My right hon. Friend acknowledged in terms that the only means by which we can deliver the second of those objectives is to ensure that the Government's borrowing requirement—the public sector borrowing requirement—is reduced. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) and several other of my right hon. and hon. Friends rightly stressed, unless that deficit is reduced, it is certain—not a matter of conjecture—that the recovery will run into the buffers.

The commitment to ensure that that recovery is sustained in the short term is translated into a commitment to reduce Government borrowing in the medium term as that is the only way of ensuring that the recovery can be sustained and we can hold out the realistic prospect of long-term job opportunities. That is the answer to the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) and one or two of my other right hon. and hon. Friends as to why effective action to address the deficit is being taken in later years, not the first year.

It seems to me—my right hon. Friend the Chancellor reached the same judgment—that the key in the first year is to ensure that no action is taken now that will damage confidence and inhibit the recovery process. My right hon. Friend did not announce a set of proposals for the first year that involved inaction. Taking a neutral fiscal stance, my right hon. Friend was concerned to ensure that substantial help is provided for business in the first year of his three-year programme to ensure that the recovery gets under way and is soundly based. That is why my right hon. Friend gave a commitment that no business, big or small, need face an increase in the real level of its rates bill this year.

My right hon. Friend announced proposals which, when taken with the autumn statement proposals on the same subject, involve an increase in export credit support of £2 billion on its previous level. My right hon. Friend announced complex changes in the advance corporation tax provisions that will provide a £2 billion cash inflow into the balance sheets of British industry. That series of measures—within a neutral first year overall effect—is designed to strengthen the recovery and address the needs of British business in the short term.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out a clear strategy to reduce Government borrowing in later years for the reason that I have given. In doing so, he is in sharp contrast to the Labour party. Since my right hon. Friend the Chancellor delivered his Budget speech, Labour spokesmen have been repeatedly asked, both in the House and in television and radio studios, what they would do about the deficit figures published in the Red Book yesterday. Not one Labour spokesman has offered any proposals which would address that fundamental need in our economic planning to ensure that the Government's borrowing requirement is brought under control.

I can think of no factor more certain to undermine recovery, to ensure that recovery does not take place, to make sure that jobs are not created and to see that living standards do not improve than for the Government to stand back—or to run away, as the Labour party appears determined to do—from the question of how action should be taken now to reduce in the medium term the Government's borrowing requirement. My right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale and my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) rightly said that we must address that issue, otherwise the prospect of recovery is purely a chimera.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman was talking about living standards. Will he now answer the question that was put earlier to the Chief Secretary? Will the Government fund in full the cost of the increased charges following VAT on domestic fuel supplies?

Mr. Dorrell: The Chief Secretary answered that question by quoting the clear words of the Chancellor on the subject in his Budget speech.

The Chancellor set out our plans. Opposition Members have sought to argue that in some sense they are at variance with what was said during the general election campaign, but Opposition Members are on a very bad point—[Interruption.] The proposals that my right hon. Friend announced yesterday are absolutely in accordance with the commitments and the direction of policy that we pursued in the election campaign last year and have pursued in office since 1979, and I will explain why.

The first point that my right hon. Friend made clear is that we shall address the question of the Government's borrowing requirement by restraining Government spending, and that answers the points made by some of my hon. Friends who stressed the importance of that side of the spending and revenue balance.

Mr. Darling: The Financial Secretary said that the Government had not given an undertaking on VAT. During the election campaign the Prime Minister said:

"We have no plans and no need to extend the scope of VAT."

He said that in Westminster on 27 March, during the campaign. How on earth can the Financial Secretary say that what the Government are now doing is not in stark contradiction with what they said then?

Mr. Dorrell: We did not have plans at that time—[Interruption.] What we are doing is entirely in accordance with what we said we would do because we are determined to address the need to control Government spending. On our tax policies, we said that if necessary, if we faced the need to raise revenue—and no Government can rule out that possibility for all time—we would do it by extending the scope of taxation, not by raising the rates of tax.

That is what we did yesterday afternoon, and we took that step for a reason, the reason identified by my hon. Friends the Members for Winchester (Mr. Malone) and for Dover (Mr. Shaw). We have set out since 1979 to create in this country an enterprise economy. As the Chief Secretary said, as the result of those measures, we have created over 3 million new jobs since 1984, with 1 million new self-employed people. That led the OECD to describe Britain as having by far the best job creation record among the larger EC countries.

Throughout the debate, Opposition Members have scoffed at the proposition that the way to solve the unemployment problem and to get Britain back to work is by recognising that business men, not politicians, create jobs. The story of the Budget is that we share in all parts of the House a desire to tackle the recession. What we disagree about profoundly between the two sides of the House is how that should be done.

Labour Members believe that the answer lies in the wisdom of politicians. We believe that the answer lies in encouraging business success. We believe that jobs are created by investment in the private sector by business activity and that business men, not politicians, create jobs.

If the Opposition find a success, what do they do? First, they envy it and then they tax it. If we find a success, we admire it and then we nurture it. That is why the wish of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will come true. He said that he wanted a re-run of the 1992 general election. So do I. The Budget will help to ensure that that happens.

If I have one regret about this afternoon's debate, it is that the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) confined his remarks to eight minutes.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Caribbean Bananas

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Sir John Cope.]

10 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): A prominent and senior member of the civil service, now working for the European Commission, told a meeting in London three years ago that the problem of establishing a single European market in bananas was one of the most intellectually demanding and difficult problems that he had confronted in his professional career. Therefore, the House will understand why we must pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who, when he was President of the Agriculture Council in December, over many days and nights negotiated an agreement to establish a Europewide market for bananas. His perseverance and determination have resulted in an agreement which, while not perfect—indeed, it can be improved—is one with which I believe all the partners supplying bananas to the European Community can live.

That real marathon by my right hon. Friend did not take place only in December last year; it has been a four-year programme, in which many Ministers have taken part, including my noble Friend Lady Trumpington, my hon. Friends the Members for Calder Valley (Sir D. Thompson) and for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) and, of course, my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), who is the current Minister of State. I would add to that list many people in the industry and outside it, as well as the West India Committee, which assisted by educating and then cajoling in an attempt to produce the agreement.

My right hon. Friend the Minister said that the agreement is important for economic, social, political and moral reasons. That is true. He recognised that it was an economic necessity to find a solution to the problem. I have to declare an interest, because I have the honour to serve as a consultant to the banana company Geest. I pay tribute to that company because it has enabled me to take a close interest in the welfare and well-being of the banana farmers in the West Indies, with whom I have been associated since I first went to the West Indies in 1961. It was then that I first saw the banana ships of Geest coming every week to collect bananas from those four small islands of Grenada, St. Vincent, St. Lucia and Dominica.

The system that Mr. John Van Geest instituted and stuck by doggedly throughout hurricanes, strikes and all sort of problems over 40 years was what he said to the banana farmers—"If you will grow bananas, I will put my ships in regularly every week to collect whatever exportable bananas you have. I will market and ship those bananas in partnership with the many hundreds and thousands of banana farmers in the islands."

One thing not often understood is that the banana industry of the West Indies is a small farmer industry. The farms are on precipitous hillsides, with inhospitable soil conditions and difficult climatic conditions such as droughts and floods. There are 47,000 farmers, and the industry involves 189,000 people. Many of the farms are under 10 acres. They are family farms which have built up a first-class industry for their country. It is a wonderful success. They have turned it from a minor industry into the major industry to replace sugar, which previously dominated the Windward Islands.

The reason why sugar had to be replaced as the major product of the islands was the European Community and this country decided to subsidise beet sugar farmers by giving them supported prices. That meant that the West Indies could no longer produce sugar profitably and viably. Consciously, we said that we would reserve the British market for bananas produced in the Windward Islands. At that time, they were small producers, but the industry developed because of the intervention and doggedness of Geest and the skill of the farmers.

It is often said that Windward Island bananas are not of the same quality as those produced in central America, but the quality is of the best. We all know that Marks and Spencer, for example, would not market anything that was not top quality. Their main suppliers of bananas are the Windward Islands. Despite the inhospitable conditions, the farmers produce some of the sweetest and best bananas marketed throughout the world. It should not be said that we are being asked to consume low-quality bananas.

Let us get it into perspective also that the world market is 9 million tonnes in total. The market is divided 85 per cent. to Latin America, 2 per cent. to the Windward Islands, 5 per cent. to African, Caribbean and Pacific countries, and 8 per cent. to world production from Martinique and Guadeloupe, the Canary Islands and Madeira. All that the Windward Islands ask is that they may retain the 2 per cent. share of the world market that they currently enjoy.

Why, therefore, should the Germans complain, and the Latin Americans state that they will be deprived of 50 per cent. of their production, if 2 per cent. of the market is reserved for the Windward Islands? Can the request of the Windward Islands be described as unreasonable? It is unreasonable that the central Americans should seek to supply the whole European market, as they thought they would be able to do. That is why the area in central America planted with bananas increased by over 30 per cent. between 1988 and 1992. They increased their market share in Europe from 57 per cent. to 63 per cent.

No wonder prices dropped 30 per cent. in the past year. No wonder the United Fruit Company, a major world producer of bananas, has gone into loss to the extent of $170 million. That is not because of the European marketing arrangements but due to market over-supply.

The central American producers thought that they could take the whole European market and eastern Europe. It is their own doing, and although it will be painful to contract the area under bananas, the difficulty is due to serious over-production in Latin America, and has nothing to do with the Windward Islands or the new European regime.

The new agreement will allocate 66·5 per cent. to traditional dollar supplies, 30 per cent. to ACP and European Community supplies, and 3·5 per cent. to newcomers. On the basis of the market share previously enjoyed, that seems entirely right. The tariff will be increased to 100 ecu on imports throughout the Community other than from ACP suppliers, which will mean that German supplies must bear that tariff.

That need not necessarily result in higher prices, despite the hysteria in Germany. Although Belgium and Holland paid 100 ecu per tonne on imports over the past three or four years, prices in Belgian and Dutch supermarkets are no more than those in Germany. I have refrained from saying where the extra margin went, but that is the situation.

Above the quota limit of 66·5 per cent. of the market of 2 million tonnes, 850 ecu per tonne must be paid for further imports to protect the Windward Islands and the Community's own production from predatory pricing, and the fact that production in central America, under ideal conditions, is at much less cost per tonne than can be achieved under present arrangements in the Caribbean, Madeira and the Canaries.

The Windward Islands do not entirely applaud that agreement, because they will have to accept many conditions that will lead to significant changes and restructuring within their banana industry. They will undoubtedly face increased competition, which, in spite of the protective tariff, will lead to lower prices. The whole of their present production is capped, and as the market grows, the Windward Islands will have a diminishing share of the total European market. Also, the whole arrangement will come to an end in 10 years' time.

That means that the Caribbean banana industry must change. It will have to alter its production methods, introduce extra infrastructure in the form of ports, apply much more quality control, and increase best-quality production so that it can secure higher prices and maintain income. It is most important that the industry can continue to enjoy increased assistance to meet restructuring.

I shall be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister will answer a series of questions. I am particularly grateful to him for returning from Brussels, at great inconvenience to himself, to reply to this debate.

Can my hon. Friend reassure the House that the 17 December agreement that was confirmed at the Agriculture Council in February is compatible with our GATT commitment, that it cannot be successfully challenged at the European Court of Justice, and that the regime will start on 1 July?

Secondly, may I have an assurance that a reference price, thought by the Select Committee on Agriculture to be about 680 ecu, or £464, per tonne, will be established, and that below this figure compensatory payments will be made to ACP producers? Thirdly, I should like an assurance that a substantial aid package, in addition to Lomé aid, will be available to assist the restructuring of the banana industry and improve infrastructure, for the purpose of increasing productivity and improving quality.

Fourthly, can my hon. Friend assure me that he will continue to press for increased quota for countries that increase their productivity and quality to enable ACP countries to benefit proportionately from any increase in the size of the market? Undoubtedly the Minister will say that that is not part of the current agreement. Nonetheless, I think that it is unfair and does not encourage Caribbean producers to increase their productivity and raise their quality, as I am sure the European Communities would like. I should like my hon. Friend to continue to bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues in Europe.

Fifthly, will my hon. Friend ensure that adequate enforcement machinery is established to prevent smuggling or to keep unlicensed or unquoted bananas from entering the system? Sixthly, will he see that the administrative machinery set up to implement the single banana market in Europe has adequate means taking account of ACP interests as the programme develops?

The agreement that my right hon. and hon. Friends have been able to negotiate in Europe is an excellent one. Ministers deserve the gratitude and admiration of the House for their perseverance and their commitment to finding a solution to this intractable and difficult problem.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for his very kind words about my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. My right hon. Friend is a man of such innate modesty and self-effacement that he would have been deeply embarrassed if such praise had been uttered to his face. However, I shall convey my hon. Friend's praise to him, and I am sure that he will overcome any embarrassment.

The negotiations were indeed extraordinarily difficult. First, the political agreement had to be put in place, and that was possible only in December, in the context of a rather complex package, as part of a whole series of measures relating to agriculture. Then the legal text had to be brought forward, and that caused an entirely separate spat and a marathon session to ensure that the political agreements that had been reached in December were followed through in January.

This was despite the fact that the Belgians and the Dutch changed their votes in the meantime, and we have to be grateful to the Danes, who had the courage to assume their chairmanship responsibilities by changing their vote in order to see the agreement home and dry, even though they had been consistently hostile to it. Thus, while I accept praise on behalf of my right hon. Friend, I have to say that it is only fair that we should acknowledge the fact that the Danes' presidency played a very noble part in achieving the agreement.

I shall try, at the beginning, to answer my hon. Friend's questions. Some of his points are dealt with in the body of my text, and I shall deal with them as I come to them.

On the ACP traditional quantities, the agreement total is 857,700 tonnes. This is based on the highest recorded exports from each individual ACP country before 1991, in line with Lomé commitments. ACP imports in 1991 were about 600,000 tonnes, so quite a margin has been built in to take account of investments in the pipeline, which will produce further fruit in coming years.

On the safeguard provision, with a reference price of 680 ecu per tonne, the Council's text does not include a specific Dunkel-type clause. This matter will have to be looked at again in the light of the settlement in the Uruguay round. The Council and its legal services are certainly of the opinion that the deal is compatible with GATT, and that therefore no waiver is required. I cannot guarantee that it will not be possible to challenge it successfully in the courts, but the opinion that we have received is certainly that it will not, the Council believing that it is proof against court challenge. I can confirm that it will start to operate on 1 July.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Are not the areas that produce only 2 per cent. of the banana market very vulnerable to the threat posed by larger producing areas? Is the Minister satisfied that the agreement affords sufficient protection to those areas?

Mr. Curry: I fully recognise that the Caribbean producers face much greater difficulties than the Latin American so-called dollar producers, because of the climate. The risk of hurricanes may sound comic, but it is a serious problem for small farmers in that part of the world.

We sought two aims in the negotiations. First, we wanted to ensure that the entitlements of such countries were comfortably ahead of their records of sendings, so that a margin could be built in. Secondly, we wanted to ensure that the quota enjoyed by the dollar fruit reflected the realities of the European market, rather than the frankly speculative sendings of last year, when the aim was to build up positions in the market place in anticipation of the introduction of a quota system.

I think that we have secured seafeguards, although I echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) said about the Windward Islands. There is a programme of quality control, and Jamaica and the Windward Islands are the two principal suppliers to which it has related; considerable progress has been made, but it must be accelerated.

In our discussions, we have made it clear that the deal does not mean that from now on everything will be frightfully comfortable, thank you very much; the process of quality control must continue, in simple matters such as storage—especially cluster storage—and shipping. Such action will, of course, make the bananas much more readily available and acceptable in the market place.

As for aid for ACP banana producers, the Commission has issued a separate proposal. That was not addressed by the Council in February, but the negotiations will continue. Up to 130 million ecu remain to be committed from existing funds for national indicative programmes in the Caribbean, as provided for in the Lomé convention. Financial resources are available.

The Council text makes no provision for an increase in ACP quantitities in line with production, but I think that that is because traditional quantities are ahead of sendings. For instance, St. Lucia's sendings in 1991 amounted to just under 103,000 tonnes, while the traditional quantity allocated is 127,000. St. Vincent's sendings are 63,000 tonnes, while the traditional quantity is almost 20,000 tonnes more than that. In 1991, Dominica had 55,000 tonnes of sendings, as against 71,000 tonnes of traditional quanitity. That represents the amount that can be sent under the agreement within the special provisions for ACP countries. Like other senders, they can send in quantities above their allocation, paying the higher rate of duty.

In 1991, Grenada had 8,000 tonnes of sendings, compared with a 25,000-tonne traditional sending quota. Jamaica—which, along with St. Lucia, is in the big league—had 70,000 tonnes of sendings as against 105,000 tonnes of traditional quantity. Those figures were set so that the investments in the pipeline would be thrust out, and could be realised in what was sent to the European Community.

I believe that the deal that we achieved was not merely the best on offer; it was well beyond reasonable expectations. Of course, it incurred considerable flak. The reason why it was so difficult to achieve was the existence of genuinely conflicting criteria. We have a categorical obligation to the ACP countries. The fourth Lomé convention of 1991 specifically states:

"in respect of its banana exports to the community markets, no ACP state shall be placed, as regards access to traditional markets and its advantages on those markets, in a less favourable situation than in the past or at present".

Nothing could be more categorical than that. It was spelt out in the Lomé convention. It is an obligation on the whole Community, not only the United Kingdom. In addition, there were obligations to GATT, which is why, although the Commission had originally proposed a quota formula, the United Kingdom effectively brokered a compromise based on tariffication, and tariffication is the mechanism compatible with GATT. As this was happening, there was not a squeak from the Americans, if I can put it that way. We believe that the agreement is "Gattable" because it pursues the favoured mechanism of GATT.

In addition, there were obligations imposed by the single market itself. It is true that, if one does not have the ability to intervene at the frontier—as one would traditionally have had—it is more difficult to monitor and control. None of us intended to try to prevent the completion of the free market. There were various obligations which, if not in conflict, were difficult to reconcile, and they were all perfectly legitimate.

We believe that the ACP countries have had a reasonable and fair arrangement, but it must be said that built into the provisions is the ability to review the 2 million tonnes allocation. We are not telling the dollar producers, "That's it for all time". They have the opportunity to review their sendings in the light of the markets. In any case, they have the ability to send over the quota, but there is also an ability to review the basic quota itself. We have built in a sensible flexibility.

No one is in the business of trying to tell people what sort of bananas they should eat or to create a banana cartel. We want to ensure that obligations are observed in the context of a regime which looks to the consumer. At the end of the day, the key person is the consumer willing to buy bananas. Bananas are a growth market. Those of us who watched Wimbledon will have noticed how much free publicity bananas get—they are apparently the great dynamic fruit. Instead of the traditional occasional tincture being offered to the Council meeting during the agricultural and fisheries price marathons, perhaps a basket of bananas should be passed around to give Agriculture Ministers high levels of energy in the wee small hours of the night.

The agreement was achieved with some difficulty, and it would not have been reached without the United Kingdom's actions. It was fortuitous that we had the presidency and that, when we had to settle the whole complex package in December, we were able to ensure that bananas formed part of the package. Had we not had it in the package, the ability to deliver that in isolation would have been virtually impossible, given that the countries on the so-called liberal wing of the argument would have comfortably formed a blocking minority. The ability to keep a lot of balls in the air at the same time achieved a political breakthrough. In January, it was a hard slog to ensure that it was translated into the legal text and followed through.

The reason we were so insistent was that we are aware of precisely the facts mentioned by my hon. Friend. The islands are extraordinarily dependent on the banana crop. It is a vulnerable crop in any case, but it is very difficult to suggest an alternative—there is no obvious alternative. If there were, we should have thought of it, because the competition is severe from the dollar producers. They have better climatic conditions and, perhaps, more competitive structures. Therefore, we had an obligation to discharge, and we were determined to do so.

The detailed rules provide for the allocation of 2 million tonnes of quota and have still to be negotiated, but a proportion of that—30 per cent.—will be allocated on the basis of the past trade in traditional ACP and European Community fruit. That is intended to give an important incentive for the continuing marketing of European Community and ACP fruit, so that it continues to find a place in the whole European market.

People have criticised the so-called partnership arrangements, but we believed that the mechanism would give a little extra security to the ACP countries to see their bananas finding a market across the European Community. As my hon. Friend said, their bananas are sweeter and better suited to many people's tastes. I do not wish to engage in a consumer test, but I have always thought that bananas are greatly improved by being fried in butter and flambéed in a large quantity of rum. Rum is also a Caribbean product, and therefore naturally compatible with that extraordinary fruit.

We are proud of the negotiation. Presidencies are pretty grim affairs, but when we come to look back, the agreement will not be the least of our achievements. Although there was an EC obligation, we felt that the United Kingdom had a particular role, and we have discharged it.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Liquidations (Departmental Debts)

1. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many companies in Northern Ireland have gone into liquidation or bankruptcy while a demand was outstanding for payment of debt owed to a Department of Government, in each of the last three years.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Robert Atkins): During the year ending 31 March 1993 the number of High Court generated insolvencies, and companies starting creditors' voluntary winding up, will number approximately 655. This compares with 463 in 1991-92 and 457 in 1990-91. It is estimated that debts owed to Government Departments would be found in at least 90 per cent. of these insolvencies.

Mr. Beggs: I thank the Minister for the information that he has delivered to the House. He highlights how serious the problem is. Will he confirm that it is estimated to cost £9,000 per annum in benefits and lost revenue to keep someone unemployed? Will he give me an assurance today that there will be better departmental consultation to ensure that no arm of government acts on its own to force a liquidation, bearing in mind that 50 per cent. of wind-ups in 1992 in Northern Ireland and 20 per cent. of bankruptcies in that year were as a result of intervention on VAT? I hope that he can give that assurance.

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman raises a technical point. I should like to give some consideration to it. Clearly, it is not always possible to delay an insolvency or the crash of a company for the time that the hon. Gentleman suggests that it takes to look into it. However, it is not the wish of the Government to put more people out of work than can be avoided in cases such as those of which the hon. Gentleman gives evidence today. If he would drop me a line or perhaps talk to me later about how we can progress, or if there is a particular instance or company about which he is worried, I should be more than happy to take it up.

Dr. Hendron: Will the Secretary of State and the Minister with responsibility for economic development pledge their support for the new survival plan that has been worked out between the Industrial Development Board and Stoy Hayward for the Clarence Clothing company in west Belfast? That company is in an area which is probably one of the blackest unemployment spots in these islands.

Mr. Atkins: I am familiar with the case. The hon. Gentleman will find me particularly sympathetic, although as yet I have not made a final decision.

Republic (Constitutional Changes)

2. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the effects of the proposed constitutional changes in the Republic of Ireland and of the consequent effect on the whole of Ireland.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Sir Patrick Mayhew): The Irish Government have expressed their willingness to initiate and incorporate constitutional change in the context of an overall political settlement. I welcome this. I believe that it provides an encouraging context for fresh political talks.

Mr. Fabricant: In that connection, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with me that the comments by Dick Spring on 5 March at the Dublin Mansion House were particularly helpful? Does he further agree that the comments by the United States foreign relations committee recently about a possible investigation into human rights in Northern Ireland were particularly unhelpful?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I was much encouraged by the content and tone of the Tanaiste's speech. It was a most substantial speech which plainly had been carefully weighed.

As for the second part of my hon. Friend's question, I had perhaps better wait to see what may be proposed, but I might properly say that human rights are, indeed, abused in Northern Ireland. They are abused on purpose and with authority. They are thus abused by terrorists pursuing their evil and fruitless campaigns at the behest of their leaders. I sometimes think that if a national of a foreign country were to become their victim—which I would wish on nobody—and were murdered, for example, like woman police constable Colette McMurray at Newry in March last year, or merely deprived of his legs at the hips, like constable Paul Slaine, who was sitting in the car beside her, we would hear rather more about the matter from overseas commentators and rather less unspecific calumny of the brave men and women in the police and Army, who strive to prevent that by every means in their power within the law.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: When will the British Government challenge the Irish Government's claim over Northern Ireland in an international court, on the basis of article 29 item 3 of the Irish constitution?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The more promising way to overcome what is without doubt a serious difficulty is to heed what the Tanaiste, Mr. Spring, said recently—that the Irish Government are prepared to put articles 2 and 3 to the Irish people—with a referendum in mind—as part of an overall settlement or accommodation reached during discussions.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the Secretary of State of the same mind as his predecessor—that articles 2 and 3 are illegal? Is it not a fact that nowhere from the south of Ireland, including Mr. Spring's recent statement, is there any declaration that that is looked upon as an illegal claim and that anyone is prepared to do away with it?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have just given my understanding of Mr. Spring's speech in that context and I welcome it very much. Naturally, a claim—which has been described by the Supreme Court of the Irish Republic as a constitutional imperative—to bring the six counties that form part of the United Kingdom, known as Northern Ireland, within the jurisdiction of the Republic, is extremely unhelpful. As matters have been developing in a hopeful way, at this stage of our discussions I do not think that the exchange of epithets is very constructive. I prefer to proceed in the way that I suggested.

Mr. McNamara: Can the Secretary of State explain the statements in his speech to the area council of the Conservative party in Northern Ireland last weekend? Given the integrationist tenor of the statements, does he repudiate the neutral stance that the Government have been taking over affairs in Northern Ireland?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I really do not know what the hon. Gentleman has in mind. I said that the United Kingdom is already—

Mr. McNamara: I have the speech here.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have it here, too, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has studied it. If his party committed those who support it in Northern Ireland—there must be a few—to organise as the Conservative party has done, he would have an opportunity to test his policies for a united Ireland on the electorate, but those supporters are not allowed to do so. In my speech, I said that Northern Ireland is already an integral part of the United Kingdom and that I thought that the time had come to move the debate on, away from ill-defined notions such as integration and devolution, and towards considering how Northern Ireland can best be governed, while it remains part of the United Kingdom pursuant to the wish of the majority.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Most of us would agree with that statement. Could my right hon. and learned Friend pass a message to the Senate foreign relations committee and its sub-committees that the constitutional position is well spelt out in the Anglo-Irish Agreement and that they would be welcome to come here, to Belfast or to Dublin to speak to constitutionally elected politicians and to meet groups such as New Consensus, which are trying to get rid of the killing and to let people live together?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Anglo-Irish Agreement makes a substantial advance towards a mutual expression of the current status of Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend will have noted, however, that both Governments have said that they would support a new and more broadly based agreement or structure, provided that it secured wide acceptance. As we have made clear, we would wish part of such an agreement to be a shared and unambiguous expression and understanding of Northern Ireland's current status.

Housing Benefit

3. Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Housing Executive tenants are receiving housing benefit.

Mr. Atkins: On 5 March 1993, 110,367 Housing Executive tenants were receiving housing benefit.

Mr. Forsythe: Under what legislation is confidential benefit information shared between the Department of Health and Social Security and the Housing Executive, leading on the one hand to many housing benefit claimants losing benefit, and on the other allowing hundreds of giro drops to continue in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Atkins: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State has particular responsibility for this matter. I know that he has been in conversation and correspondence with the hon. Gentleman. I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman's concerns are related to my noble Friend. I suspect that the detail for which the hon. Gentleman is looking requires a detailed letter in response, and that I will try to provide.

Adrian Carroll

4. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken to review the original police inquiry into the murder of Adrian Carroll in Armagh in 1983 following the judgment of the Court of Appeal in July 1992.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have received a range of representations about the case of Mr. Latimer, mostly seeking a further reference——

Mr. Trimble: This is the answer to a different question.

Madam Speaker: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman replying to question 4?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: That is exactly what I am doing —at least I am attempting to, Madam Speaker.

I have received a range of representations about the case of Mr. Latimer—which bears upon the murder of Adrian Carroll, referred to in question 4—mostly seeking a further reference to the Court of Appeal. I have found that none contains material to justify making a reference; nor has any been found to justify commissioning any review of the original police inquiry into the murder of Mr. Carroll.

Mr. Trimble: Thank you. I fear that questions 4 and 9 may have been too closely linked by the Secretary of State because my question relates to the original police inquiry into the murder of Adrian Carroll in 1983. Does the Secretary of State intend to follow the precedent set in England with regard to the May inquiry and appoint, when the time is appropriate, a judicial inquiry into the conduct of that original investigation so that the whole truth can come out? Does he also agree, in view of the disappointing decision of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal last summer, that it would not be fair to ask a Northern Ireland judge to head such an inquiry?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I completely repudiate the implication in the hon. Gentleman's last remark. I never make comments on judicial decisions: I think that that is a good principle to be followed by anybody in the House. Nothing has been represented to me that justifies an inquiry into the police investigation.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Will the Secretary of State take it from me that the overwhelming majority of the people of Northern Ireland find it an outrage and a scandal that Neil Latimer is still in prison? Those who have bothered to acquaint themselves with the facts and details of this case recognise that the Crown prosecution witness who gave forensic evidence in the case corrupted the whole of the case for all four of the men who were convicted and not just three of them. Latimer is left as a figleaf behind which the establishment may hide the awful fact that there are policemen who are not perfect and judges who can make mistakes.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: It is not for me to express a view as to what the majority—overwhelming—or otherwise—of the people in Northern Ireland may consider in this context. I have, in response to many letters I have received about the judgment of the Court of Appeal in July last year, read very carefully again the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice. It is perfectly clear to me that this is a matter which has been gone into with the very greatest care—as the sheer volume of the judgment shows. If I thought that the criteria, which have been long established for making a further reference to the Court of Appeal, had been satisfied in this case, I would have no hesitation in making such a reference. I am perfectly certain, for the reasons I have set out in letters to hon. Members, that those criteria are not satisfied.

Mr. Canavan: Is the Secretary of State aware of the concern on both sides of the House and throughout the country about the possible miscarriage of justice in this case because of the unreliable evidence of witness A and the disgraceful behaviour of the RUC in the whole affair? Has he had the opportunity to study the evidence produced by Mr. Andrew Morton, who conducted an investigation on behalf of the BBC's "Newsnight" programme, and who came to the conclusion that there was no way in which Neil Latimer could have been the author of the statement described in court as his confession? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman therefore refer the case of Neil Latimer back to the Court of Appeal for further consideration?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The short answer is no. I am aware of the programme to which the hon. Gentleman refers. If it will not take too long, I should like to cite a few lines from the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice—the House will find it of interest:

> "We are satisfied that the ESDA findings in relation to the interview notes of Latimer do not create a doubt as to the correctness of his convictions, because on his own evidence at the trial as to what happened in the interviews and as to what he said in the interviews, it is clear that on the night of 2-3 December 1983 he confessed to murdering Mr. Carroll. We are further satisfied that those confessions were true and were the confessions of a guilty man and not of an innocent man who, by improper police conduct, was pressed into confessing to a murder which he had not committeed.
> No one reading the full transcript of the evidence of Latimer at the trial, and reading that transcript in an impartial way and with commonsense can doubt that he was a guilty man".

If any further evidence were put to me that would constitute material of a substantial kind that had not previously been raised before the courts and which gave rise to a possibility that this was an unsafe conviction, I would refer the conviction again to the Court of Appeal —but none has been.

Mr. McNamara: Is the Secretary of State aware that after most terrorist-related offences in Northern Ireland have gone through the Court of Appeal, there is no appeal thereafter and communities generally accept that justice has been done? In this particular case, however, there is a general sense of unease throughout the whole community about the legitimacy of this man remaining in prison. That is why I am concerned: in most cases no one challenges the convictions.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I do not doubt that that is correct. I have had about 70 letters from hon. Gentlemen——

Ms Short: And hon. Ladies.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Quite so. We have also received about 550 other letters, most of them in a standard form. I quite understand why there has been concern, because in this case four people were originally convicted, of whom three had their convictions overturned by the Court of Appeal. The fourth did not, even though improprieties concerning the police notes in connection with the fourth case were present, just as they had been with the other three.

The purpose and point of the Lord Chief Justice's judgment, however, explaining why Latimer's conviction was not considered unsafe is as follows. Leaving aside the question of the notes prepared by the police, other evidence, including evidence emanating from Latimer himself and confirmed at the trial, made it quite clear, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, that this was a safe conviction.

Voluntary and Selective Schools

5. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of children in Northern Ireland are educated in voluntary or selective schools.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): Of the total school population—that is primary and secondary—54 per cent. attend voluntary schools and 39 per cent. of secondary pupils attend selective schools, about 75 per cent. of which are voluntary.

Mr. Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is extremely significant that a high proportion of children in Northern Ireland attend schools after having been selected either by ability or aptitude? That is accompanied by the fact that in terms of GCSE results, A-level results and staying on rates, results in Northern Ireland are significantly better than those in the rest of the United Kingdom. Does not that have implications for the way in which we organise our education system in the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hanley: My hon. Friend is right about the excellence of schools in Northern Ireland. Some statistics might bear that out. The House will be interested to know that 32 per cent. of Northern Ireland school leavers achieve at least one A-level compared with 26 per cent. in England; 75 per cent. leaving grammar school achieve at least one A-level; 45 per cent. of all school leavers achieve five or more GCSE grades A to C compared with 40 per cent. in England; over 55 per cent. continue in further or higher education compared with 34 per cent. in England. However, in Northern Ireland more pupils leave school with no GCSE qualifications than in England. I believe that to be a corollary. it is 13 per cent. in Northern Ireland compared to 7 per cent. in England, but the position has greatly improved from 27 per cent. 10 years ago. We must concentrate just as much on that end of the spectrum as on the excellence that is achieved in Northern Ireland education.

Mr. John D. Taylor: Following the recent decision to give 100 per cent. funding for new Roman Catholic voluntary schools, will the Minister assure the people of Northern Ireland that there will be no discrimination and that similar 100 per cent. grants will be available to the Protestant churches, such as the Church of Ireland and the Presbyterian Church, if they decide to build their own schools?

Mr. Hanley: The right hon. Gentleman is right that Catholic schools have recently been able to apply for 100 per cent. grants, the same as most other schools. That removes discrimination and gives equality of opportunity to the majority of children in Northern Ireland. With that comes a change in the constitution of the schools' boards. As long as schools comply with those constitutional changes they will receive the same grant.

Sir Giles Shaw: Will my hon. Friend take a little further the answer that he gave to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor)? What proportional grant is given to the relatively few schools that are seeking to be integrated into the education system on a Roman Catholic and a Protestant basis? Is my hon. Friend encouraging the development of such schools?

Mr. Hanley: Yes, indeed, I am helping to encourage the numbers of pupils who attend integrated schools in Northern Ireland. The schools receive the same level of grant. At the moment, they educate about 1 per cent. of all children in Northern Ireland. I believe that they give an excellent education and I hope that their future will be encouraged.

Mr. Stott: The Minister will surely be aware of the deep unease that is felt about curriculum assessment and testing by the teaching profession throughout all the schools in the sector which he has mentioned. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the largest teachers' union in Northern Ireland recently held a ballot in which 95 per cent. of teachers voted in favour of boycotting testing and assessment? When the Minister spoke in the appropriation orders debate a couple of weeks ago he said that he was a listening Minister. Will he listen to the voices of the teachers, as expressed in the ballot on whether testing should take place?

Mr. Hanley: I am in regular contact with the teaching unions. I am extremely pleased that many teachers are trying to use the opportunities that are provided by a pilot year of assessment. They will, therefore, be able to practise the new assessment techniques and provide feedback to the Department for Education so that we can get assessment absolutely right. There will be no benefit to children or teachers in boycotting the assessment procedures. I am glad that the National Union of Teachers, for instance, is being constructive in this regard.

Security

6. Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Mates): Since I answered a similar question on 18 February, six people have been killed as a result of the security situation in Northern Ireland, including three civilians, two Royal Ulster Constabulary Officers and one soldier.

The Government, through the work of the police and armed forces, and with the support of the public, will defeat terrorism from whichever side of the community it comes. There is no lack of will or determination on the Government's part or on the part of the security forces. An example of the level of police success is that so far this year 63 people have been charged with serious terrorist crimes, including 14 with murder or attempted murder.

Mr. Molyneaux: In expressing deep sympathy with the families of those who have been murdered, including the young soldier who was shot yesterday by an American bullet from an American rifle, probably fired from the territory of the Irish Republic, may I ask Her Majesty's Government to seek the wholehearted co-operation of the American and Irish Governments in totally suppressing those who carry out such murderous activities?

Mr. Mates: I understand and share the sentiments that the right hon. Gentleman has expressed. We do have the wholehearted co-operation of the Government of the Irish Republic in our attempts to defeat the terrorists. That has been one of the concrete results of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Co-operation is much better than it has ever been, as has been shown by the joint successes of the Garda and the Royal Ulster Constabulary. We shall continue to try to get the message across in the United States of the importance of neither directly nor indirectly supporting the root cause of the terrorism, but inevitably some arms and money will slip through the net.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Nobody knows better than my hon. Friend the dedication of the British Army to eradicating terrorism in Northern Ireland, but, in view of the considerable overstretch that the British Army is facing, what proposals is his Department putting forward to reduce the burden on the British Army in the years ahead?

Mr. Mates: The overstretch of the British Army is a matter for my colleagues at the Ministry of Defence. We shall ask for and hope to get a sufficient level of Army personnel to support the police as and when the police need that support. If we can reduce terrorism and obtain some political development, we can achieve what we all hope to achieve: more primacy of the police, more areas in which the police can operate without the support of the Army, and thus a reduction in the Army presence in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mallon: The Minister will be aware that the six deaths to which he referred took place in my constituency and I express my anger and resentment about them, not least the killing of the young soldier yesterday when everyone else was celebrating the memory of St. Patrick. However, that anger and resentment should not be allowed to cloud the fact that certain statements made recently by senior members of Sinn Fein may show a change of policy and tactics. If that is the case, would it not be wise to encourage those people away from violence? Our real strength is not in our determination but in our ability to capitalise on the potential for peace rather than dismissing it out of hand. Will the Minister and the Secretary of State keep an open mind and use every opportunity to explore that potential for peace?

Mr. Mates: I agree that anger should direct us in nothing that we do. If members of Sinn Fein or the IRA see the pointlessness of what they do, and if they show by their actions that they are prepared to repudiate violence, they will see a response from the British Government. But the initiative lies with them and with the many in the community who know about their activities and could persuade them of the futility of the killing. We all want to see the violence end and it is up to us to try to achieve it.

Lady Olga Maitland: In view of the appalling number of killings which have taken place, does my hon. Friend agree that it was vital that we renewed the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 and despicable that the Opposition obstructed it?

Mr. Mates: The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act is a most important tool which the Government need and which the House was asked to support. I am happy that the House did so.

Further Education

7. Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from the further education review group regarding current funding for further education in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The report of the review group on further education made a total of 48 recommendations about future arrangements for the planning and funding of further education in Northern Ireland, a number of which called for additional resources to be made available. In my response to the report, I indicated that I could maintain spending at its current level, which in recent years has received increased funding, but that there were many competing claims for additional expenditure. However, I gave an assurance at the time that obtaining even more resources for further education would remain one of my top priorities.

Ms Short: Is it not the truth that the report recommended a strengthening of further education provision in Northern Ireland, but also recommended some mergers and closures? The Minister has accepted the mergers and the closures but found no new money. He is using the report as an excuse for cuts rather than for a strengthening of the service.

Mr. Hanley: I am sorry to disagree with the hon. Lady in one respect. The mergers and closures are not to seek cuts in the number of students who go to these colleges or in the number of teachers, who provide an excellent and ever-growing service in Northern Ireland. The purpose is to allow even more teachers to be hired to teach even more students, to benefit the situation in Northern Ireland with the money that is available. It is therefore not in any way a financial cut.

Mr. Sykes: Has my hon. Friend any intention of centralising the administration of further education in Northern Ireland, as has been done in England?

Mr. Hanley: My hon. Friend is perhaps referring to one of the recommendations of the Stewart committee. At this moment a review of the administration of education in Northern Ireland is out for consultation. Whether the further education colleges are brought together under one funding body with one regional control is part of the whole consultation exercise. Therefore, I can tell my hon. Friend that we are looking at that at this very moment.

Mr. William Ross: As this country faces a deficit of £35 billion this year and £50 billion next year is it not amazing that we are still spending some £10 million educating students from the Irish Republic without any reciprocal arrangement on that side of the frontier? Is that not a scandalous situation, and will the Minister try to do something about it regardless of the European Community?

Mr. Hanley: I am proud that the United Kingdom adheres to its responsibilities within the European Community.

Pupil-teacher Ratios

8. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current pupil-teacher ratio in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools; what the figures were in 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The latest available pupil-to-teacher ratio, at January 1992, was 22·6 in primary schools and 15·3 in secondary schools. The figures in 1979, for which my hon. Friend also asked, were 23·8 and 15·6 respectively.

Mr. Greenway: I welcome that improvement in the pupil-teacher ratio since 1979. Will my hon. Friend confirm that the pupil-teacher ratio in Northern Ireland is better than that in England? Will he also say what he thinks that the pupil-teacher ratio should be, and against what kind of criteria it should be decided? Who decides what the best pupil-teacher ratio is?

Mr. Hanley: My hon. Friend is extremely knowledgeable in these matters and I believe that he takes a regular interest in pupil-teacher ratios, but I am afraid that I shall have to put him straight on one aspect. In secondary schools in Northern Ireland the PTR is lower than in England, 15·3 compared with 15·8, but in primary schools the PTR is 22·6, which is above the 22·2 for England. So we cannot look at the figures and say that Northern Ireland is better all round. The second part of my hon. Friend's question related to the optimum PTR. The pupil-teacher ratio under local management of schools is increasingly a matter for each individual school; the school must decide what its staffing levels should be within its own delegated budget and it must, therefore, decide the priorities for teachers. It is not down to the Government to dictate the PTR, and it is certainly not for us to say what an optimum PTR might be.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister accept that the lack of universal nursery education is penalising many young people in Northern Ireland, particularly those from deprived backgrounds where they do not get the stimulus required to equip them for primary and secondary education? Does he agree that if we had better nursery provision many of the difficulties that arise later would be removed?

Mr. Hanley: I am a great believer in the benefits of nursery education, but I believe that Governments should adhere first to their statutory responsibilities while trying to find additional revenue for their non-statutory responsibilities. I agree that nursery education can benefit children for the future.

Mr. Barnes: What is the pupil-teacher ratio in integrated education, which is the best form of education in Northern Ireland? A good pupil-teacher ratio in those schools would encourage the further development of integrated education. Has the Minister seen the recent issue of Fortnight which contains articles with extracts from essays written by students at Lagan college? One 15-year-old student pointed out that there are borders in the mind, borders in prisons, borders in education and even borders in entertainment. The removal of those borders would improve the situation in Northern Ireland, and integrated education will help to achieve that.

Mr. Hanley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support for integrated education. The figures that I gave relate either to primary schools or secondary schools and are not sub-divided into those for integrated schools, but I will certainly provide that information to the hon. Gentleman.

Neil Latimer

9. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about the imprisonment of Neil Latimer of the UDR Four, since July 1992.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: My hon. Friend will recall, because I mentioned it a few moments ago, that I have received a range of representations about the case of Mr. Latimer, mostly seeking a further reference to the Court of Appeal. I have found that none contained material to justify making a reference.

Mr. Hunter: I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to take to heart that on this particular subject many people fear that he is making a dreadful mistake and that any conviction based on the testimony of witness A is unsustainable. They are therefore deeply disquieted by the continued imprisonment of Mr. Latimer. I beg my right hon. and learned Friend to reconsider.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I know the strength of my hon. Friend's feelings. I hope that he will pay careful regard to the letter I sent him yesterday containing citations from the Lord Chief Justice's judgment, which I have already mentioned in the House this afternoon. I repeat that the basis for that judgment was by no means limited to the evidence of witness A; it was founded also on the evidence given in the trial by Mr. Latimer himself. I shall not repeat what I said earlier, but I must assure my hon. Friend that I have given great attention to the matter and I do not find any grounds on which I can properly refer the matter once again to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Maginnis: While three of the UDR Four have been freed on the basis that police notes used in evidence were tampered with, is it not a total injustice that Neil Latimer remains in prison solely on the alleged identification by witness A, a person who has been medically diagnosed as having a psychopathic personality, subject to delusions and misinterpretations?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: As I have already tried to make clear this afternoon, it is not the case that the judgment of the Court of Appeal said that Mr. Latimer's conviction depended solely on the evidence of witness A. I do not wish to repeat what I said this afternoon, but I am happy to write to the hon. Gentleman about it. I know that he has already signed the early-day motion on this matter.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Has the Secretary of State no concern for the case that we are discussing? Is he aware that 13 people were arrested, six of them were charged, one charge was not proceeded with, five came to court and the judge threw out the charge saying that the police had put undue pressure on the prisoner to make a confession? But is it not a fact that all the prisoners made confessions? Is it not a fact that four were condemned, that the cases went to appeal and that they were still condemned, yet when the Secretary of State's predecessor passed the cases back for review, three were discharged and one was kept in? Now the Secretary of State is saying that that one is kept in on his own confession when in fact they all made confessions.

Mr. Mayhew: The facts of the case are a matter of public record and may be discovered within the extensive judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice in the Court of Appeal. I have to exercise the discretion that Parliament has given me by reference to consistent principles. I have already today described those principles. It is essential that I continue to apply them and that I do not yield to campaigns, however sincere or however loudly delivered, because it is not by reference to decibels that justice is done in this country.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Coombs: Does my right hon. Friend recall the agreement and the declaration on the environment reached in Rio last year, which achieved the support of all parties in the House and elsewhere? Does he not think it somewhat two-faced of those who support a cleaner environment in principle to reject any measures to achieve it in practice?

The Prime Minister: I cannot imagine who my hon. Friend may have in mind, but he is right. I seem to remember that after Rio we were attacked by more than one Opposition party for not going far enough on environmental matters. We made our commitment and we have now take action towards meeting it.

Mr. John Smith: Will the Prime Minister confirm that, as a result of his betrayal of his election promise not to increase taxes, a typical family will have to pay £8·50 per week in extra tax from next April and £12·50 per week in extra tax the following year?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is the wrong person to remind people about ditching election promises. As I reminded him on Tuesday, he said recently:

"We would be a very foolish party if we went into an election, say '95 or '96, with the same policies as '92."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] On his specific question, unlike the Labour party, we do not like raising taxes and we do it only when necessary. I said last year that we had no plans to raise taxes—nor did we—but we have an overriding commitment to return the deficit to balance and to take the action necessary to do that. In the Budget my right hon. Friend the Chancellor acted to meet that overriding commitment and in the interests of everyone in the country he was surely right to do so.

Mr. Smith: The country will have noted carefully that the Prime Minister did not deny that there will be an extra £8·50 per week of tax for a typical family next year and £12·50 per week the year after. Will the Prime Minister tell us whether people who qualify for income support, including millions of pensioners, will receive increases in benefit to cover in full the tax increases on their fuel bills?

The Prime Minister: I shall deal directly with the point, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman may care to reflect also upon this: does he or does he not agree with one of his Front-Bench spokesmen in another House— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. Members must contain themselves. These interruptions only waste time.

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will reflect on whether he agrees with his noble Friend in another House who called for all zero-rated items to be subject to the full rate of value added tax. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree with his noble Friend, or does he not?

As for the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question about the fuel increase, he should have read carefully what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his Budget speech. My right hon. Friend made it absolutely clear that there will be extra help for less well off pensioners and other people on low incomes. They will get that help from next April, before the higher fuel bills come in. That help will be additional to the future increase in pensions and other benefits which will take place automatically. Cold weather payments will also be adjusted to reflect increases in fuel costs. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has also neglected to welcome the fact that fuel prices have dropped since privatisation and that further reductions were announced this very morning.

Mr. Smith: The country will have noticed that the Prime Minister can never give a straight answer to a straight question. The country will also find it shameful that he cannot give a clear commitment to meet in full the increase in taxes for the most vulnerable members of our society. He has no conscience at all about short changing the poor as well as betraying his election commitments?

The Prime Minister: What the country may have noticed today, of all days, is that on this occasion the right hon. and learned Gentleman made no mention of and gave no welcome to the fall in unemployment. Neither has he mentioned the substantial real incomes increase in pensions; neither has he mentioned the uprating next April, or the fact that we have not taken back the money put in the base line for the community charge which pensioners will no longer have to pay. None of these and other matters have apparently occurred to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

North-west Kent

Q2. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to visit north-west Kent.

The Prime Minister: I am making plans for a series of visits and hope to include Kent among them.

Mr. Dunn: Is the Prime Minister aware that the people of north-west Kent have always been strong supporters of home ownership and, as such, welcome the changes in stamp duty which will encourage the housing market? They also welcome the new, exciting, radical right-to-buy campaign announced today.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I think he will find that that welcome will extend across not just north-west Kent but the whole country. In a recent survey, 89 per cent. of people under 30 said that they wished to own their own homes. We shall again give more of them the opportunity to do so. Raising the stamp duty threshold will halve the number of houses on which stamp duty has to be paid. That, with low interest rates and the lowest mortgage rates for nearly 30 years, will dramatically increase the possibility for millions to become home owners.

Engagements

Q3. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister : I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Prentice: Does the Prime Minister of manufacturing recall that this time last week he did not know the names of the two major competitors of Rolls-Royce and that his ignorance shocked my constituents? Will he join me in condemning the 24 per cent. and 35 per cent. pay increases for the chief executive and chairman of Rolls-Royce at a time when the company is sacking 5,000 skilled workers, including 170 in my constituency?

The Prime Minister: I have spoken before of my admiration for Pratt and Witney and General Electric. As for the wage increases to which the hon. Gentleman referred, if he were here more often he would know how often I have set out my views on that subject.

Q4. Mr. Sykes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Sykes: I know that, unlike the Jeremiahs in the Labour party, the Prime Minister will welcome the news on the unemployment figures that has been announced today. Will he also welcome the freezing of the uniform business rate that was announced on Tuesday, which will further help job prospects?

The Prime Minister: I am certainly happy to do that. The Budget was a Budget for business, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said. The freeze on business rates will help about 800,000 businesses. Nor was that the Budget's only boost for business. The chorus of welcome for the Budget from business speaks for itself.

Mr. Ashdown: How does the Prime Minister justify to the nation a Budget which, over the next three years, will require the poorest tenth of people to pay proportionately twice what the richest tenth will have to pay to bail the country out of his Government's financial failure?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman has clearly failed to notice the substantial increase in the proportion of the burden that we are asking people on higher incomes to bear. He has neglected that. I hope that he will join his hon. Friend sitting beside him who earlier this week said:

"I am in favour of taxes on things that pollute."

Q5. Mr. Ancram: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ancram: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many Conservative Members take grave exception to the heavy-handed behaviour of Chinese Government towards the Governor of the Hong Kong? Will he take up with the Chinese Government their threat to set up an alternative government for Hong Kong, and will he remind them that the whole international community expects agreements to be honoured?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The British Government stand four square behind the Governor and Government of Hong Kong. The Governor has acted sensitively, resolutely and correctly, and we shall continue to make that clear to the Chinese Government. In doing so, we shall underline three points: the Governor has acted entirely within the terms of the documents that we have agreed with China and we expect the Chinese Government to do likewise; the Governor's proposals for greater democracy are widely supported in Hong Kong, in the United Kingdom and in the international community, and I believe that they have wide support across this House; we and the Governor have gone the extra mile in our efforts to consult China. We remain ready for talks without pre-conditions, but no one should doubt that the Governor has our total support.

Q6. Mr. Turner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Turner: Does the Prime Minister accept that Budget day will be remembered for many years as Black Tuesday? It was the day of taxes on heating, taxes on beer, taxes on petrol and taxes on cars. Will the Prime Minister tell the House and the Country how many more taxes we shall have to endure before, mercifully, we get to the next general election?

The Prime Minister: It will certainly be a tax on Labour's ability to win that election when it comes, for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has put in place the right structure to make sure that we get back the growth, the jobs and the prosperity that we seek. If the hon. Gentleman had been a little more gracious he might, unlike anyone else on the Opposition side, have welcomed not only the drop in unemployment but also the new £100 million manufacturing centre for car components at Wednesbury near Wolverhampton.

Mr. Bowden: Will my right hon. Friend convey the congratulations of all Conservative Members to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security on his speedy clarification of the help that will be given to those on income support and low-pay pensioners? Will he also please look very closely at the position of the nearly 1 million pensioners who do not claim the income support to which they are entitled, as well as those whose income is very slightly above income support level? If my right hon. Friend could find some way of helping those people to pay the extra VAT on fuel, that would be a major step forward.

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend will agree with our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that it is right to concentrate extra help especially on the poorest households. He will also know that other benefits will automatically increase with prices through the normal uprating mechanism, and my hon. Friend at least—if not the Opposition—will join us in welcoming the fact that fuel prices have fallen in recent years.

Q7. Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pike: In view of the tax changes announced on Tuesday in relation to mortgage tax relief, will the Prime Minister state whether the Government intend, during the lifetime of this Parliament, to phase out tax relief on mortgages?

The Prime Minister: No. We made it clear earlier that we would retain the system, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out our immediate proposals.

Q8. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Winterton: My right hon. Friend will be encouraged by the welcome given by the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance, to which he recently sent a message of support, to the boost to British exporters from the £1·3 billion of extra export credit announced in the Budget, but will he acknowledge the growing concern about the erosion of our manufacturing base? Will he seek to have published the report on these matters prepared by the Department of Trade and Industry which has recently been the subject of much press speculation?

The Prime Minister: We have not only, of course, extended ECGD but my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has cut premiums over the past few months by as much as 27 per cent. in order to help exporters. We have over recent weeks announced a wide range of policies specifically geared to improve the prospects for manufacturing, both the efficiency of existing manufacturing and the widening of the manufacturing base. I made it clear earlier this week that the paper to which my hon. Friend refers was private advice to Ministers and will not be published.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 22 MARCH—Conclusion of the debate on the Budget statement.

TUESDAY 23 MARCH—Second Reading of the Agriculture Bill [Lords.]

Motion relating to the Funds for Trade Union Ballots (Revocation) Regulations.

At Ten o'clock, the question will be put on all outstanding excess Votes, supplementary estimates and defence Votes A.

WEDNESDAY 24 MARCH—European Communities (Amendment) Bill: progress in Committee, 17th day.

THURSDAY 25 MARCH—European Communities (Amendment) Bill: progress in Committee, 18th day.

FRIDAY 26 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 29 MARCH—European Communities (Amendment) Bill: progress in Committee, 19th day.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet on Wednesday 24 March at 10.30 am to consider European Community documents as follows: Standing Committee A—Document No. 4307/93, relating to sheep and goat farming; Standing Committee B—Document No. 4436/93, relating to establishing a cohesion fund.

[Wednesday 24 March:

European Standing Committee A:

Relevant European Community document—4307/93, sheepmeat: ewe premium.

Relevant reports of the European Legislation Committee—HC 79-xviii (1992-93), HC 79-xxiii (1992-93).

European Standing Committee B:

Relevant European Community document—4436/93, cohesion fund.

Relevant report of the European Legislation Committee—HC 79-xxii (1992-93).]

Mrs. Beckett: When does the Leader of the House think that he will be able to announce how the Government propose to handle, let alone schedule, debates on the defence estimates and on the Government's detailed public expenditure programme? I remind him that neither the defence estimates debate nor the scrutiny of the Government's public expenditure programme in full have taken place for two consecutive years. If he cannot give us a date, in particular for the public expenditure debate, will he give a commitment that there will be such a debate and, preferably, a debate on the defence estimates, well before the summer recess?

I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to early-day motion 1631.

[That this House views with considerable concern the rumours emanating from senior government sources that the review of the existing European parliamentary constituencies necessitated by the creation of six additional seats will be conducted by the Home Office with help from outside consultants; notes that such a decision will be a major departure from parliamentary convention that all boundary reviews are conducted by the independent and impartial boundary commissions for England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland; and calls on the Government not to prejudice the high international regard of the British parliamentary system and lay itself open to accusations of gerrymandering parliamentary boundaries for narrow political advantages.]

I hope that he will take heed of it and find time for a debate on the matter. It calls for an early boundary review for European seats, in view of the fact that there will be six new European constituencies. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, as expressed in that early-day motion, there is great concern in the House at the increasing signs that, instead of putting the programme to the Boundary Commission, which has said that it is quite able to handle it before the deadline, the Home Office proposes to make its own decisions about what the boundaries should be, possibly with the advice of a few, no doubt carefully chosen, individuals? That would not be acceptable to the House, and it is important that we are reassured as soon as possible.

Mr. Newton: Taking the right hon. Lady's latter point first, I understand that there is no truth in the rumours—to which I believe the early-day motion refers—that the review of European parliamentary constituencies will be conducted by the Home Office. The Government are simply formulating proposals for the best way of accommodating the six extra seats. When we have done so, we shall consult the Opposition parties in the usual way.

The right hon. Lady also asked about debates on the defence estimates—in fairness to her, I acknowledge that she has referred to that subject once before in recent weeks—and on the public expenditure programme. I cannot immediately give her the commitments for which she asked. Of course, we had a full debate on public expenditure in the wake of the autumn statement, although I accept that the right hon. Lady was making a somewhat different point. I should like to find time for a debate on the defence estimates, but I cannot undertake to do so before Easter.

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway): May I ask my right hon. Friend whether we can have an early debate on the recommendations of the Jopling Committee? I understand that the process of negotiation is now being held up by intransigence on the part of the Opposition. I find that extraordinary, given that many women outside the House look towards some reform of the hours worked here. I am astonished that the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) is not helping in the matter.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a debate before Easter, but discussions have been taking place through the usual channels, and are continuing. I have no doubt that the right hon. Member for Derby, South will seek to respond as soon as possible. I, at any rate, accept that such matters need to be considered with care, but I hope that we shall be able to make progress. I certainly recognise the strength of my hon. Friend's views, and the fact that she probably speaks not only for lady Members but for many Opposition Members.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Leader of the House advise us when he expects the Government to be able to make a statement about the White Paper resulting from the President of the Board of Trade's consideration of the pit closures? There is now some suggestion that there will be an unconscionable delay, which will have the knock-on effect of delaying the Government's conclusions to the consultation process set in train on redrawing the assisted areas map. Those are important matters for regions throughout the United Kingdom, and the sooner we get on with them the better.

Mr. Newton: I note what the hon. Gentleman says about the assisted areas map, but he will understand that that in itself is a difficult and complex matter on which representations have come from all parts of the country. Our aim remains to publish the coal review White Paper as soon as we can. As the hon. Gentleman will know, intensive contract negotiations are taking place, and as the President of the Board of Trade told the House yesterday, it is important that the base contracts should be in place so that the House can have a comprehensive view of the position.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the Foreign Secretary to make a statement next week on the situation in Bosnia —on the increasing number of atrocities there, on the evidence that they are committed by Serbians from Serbia, and on the fact that United Nations soldiers, including British soldiers, are having to stand by while women and children are killed in front of them?

Mr. Newton: I shall certainly bring that request to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Will the Leader of the House please consider carefully the workings of European Standing Committees A and B? It is often a very long time before the recommendations of the Select Committee on European Legislation come to those Committees, so that the scrutiny that they undertake is not as effective in influencing the outcome as it might be.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has put his point constructively, and I undertake to consider what he said. I have also received representations from a number of other hon. Members who are members of one or other of the Standing Committees about matters such as the balance of work between the two, and I shall consider that as well.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My right hon. Friend will have heard my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) refer to the warm message of support sent by the Prime Minister for the launch of the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance in the House only a fortnight ago. My right hon. Friend will also be aware of the Prime Minister's warm endorsement of the important role of manufacturing industry in this country in an interview that he gave to The Independent.

Bearing in mind the fact that this sector of our economy can play a major role in our economic recovery, will my right hon. Friend find time for a full day's debate on manufacturing industry in Government time, outside the debate on the Budget? Will he please not refer to the Supply day debate that was initiated recently by the Opposition?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend has sought to second-guess my answer. Given that the House has recently had a full day on manufacturing industry and that it is currently in the middle of a four-day debate on the Budget, which contains a wide range of very welcome measures to assist manufacturing and other industries, my hon. Friend may understand why, although I agree with him about the importance of manufacturing industry, I find it difficult to promise a separate debate.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Would it be a good idea for the Leader of the House to organise a debate on the Government's fiddling of statistics? We could start with the fiddling of the dole queue figures today and the fact that the Government have fiddled those statistics 21 times before. The cost of living figures are fiddled, and now the Government are fiddling the figures for the price reductions in electricity, bearing in mind the fact that they imposed 10 per cent. increases in gas and electricity charges, above the rate of inflation, a few years ago.

We could then explain how the price of coal has gone down by 6 per cent. in the course of the past eight years as a result of the 155 per cent. increase in productivity. That is something straight, to which the Prime Minister never refers, because he would not recognise the truth if it was sprayed on his eyeballs.

Mr. Newton: I should prefer, although I am afraid that I cannot promise this either, to have a debate on the quality of forecasting by Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said yesterday that he would make one Budget forecast—that,

"after the Budget, unemployment will rise this month, next month and for months afterwards."—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 289.]

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): May we have a statement next week on the decision to cut in half the number of British Army bands, whose high standard of excellence is the envy of the world and which, as a part of British tradition, have brought to this country visitors from abroad, whose spending generates income, employment and a tax yield to the Government?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend is obviously referring to the announcement earlier this week by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces. I emphasise that new arrangements will be provided for music in support of the Army, based on bigger bands providing a high standard of music.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the Leader of the House consider a debate on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty? Such a debate is urgent, because North Korea proposes to withdraw from the treaty, which sets a dangerous precedent and has increased tension in the region. Some of us are not happy with the Government's record on the treaty, either. A debate would be relevant.

Mr. Newton: I can do no more than note the hon. Gentleman's request; I cannot promise an early debate on the matter.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Can my right hon. Friend hold out the prospect of Report and Third Reading for the National Lottery etc. Bill before Easter? Such news would be much welcomed by many good causes outside the House, as I am sure my right hon. Friend agrees.

Mr. Newton: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is a member of the Committee. Perhaps I should know. If he is, he can give me an up-to-date report on progress.

[Mr. Newton]

Obviously we shall seek to advance the Bill as soon as possible, but I cannot give an undertaking that we shall do so before Easter.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): I am sure that the Leader of the House is aware that yesterday the Fire Brigades Union met the Home Secretary to discuss its pay claim. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to ask his right hon. and learned Friend to make a statement in the House about why he is prepared to ditch the national pay formula which has kept industrial peace in the Fire Brigades Union and in the cities and towns of Britain for the past 15 years?

Mr. Newton: I regularly speak to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and, indeed, have done so on various matters this morning and yesterday. I understand that he met representatives of the Fire Brigades Union to explain the background to the current public sector pay policy and made it clear, as would be widely accepted, that its members cannot expect special treatment. But he also made it clear that no decision had been taken to abolish the 1977 pay agreement.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that several Conservative as well as Opposition Members would appreciate an early debate on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty? It is arguably one of the most important international treaties, and we must ensure the maximum possible compliance with it.

Mr. Newton: I cannot say much more than I told the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), but I shall note the request even more now that it has come from both sides of the House.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): Will the Leader of the House take an early opportunity to ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether she would be prepared to make a statement to the House on employment practices in the ports industry? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, when the dock labour scheme was abolished, Ministers pledged that abolition would not lead to the return of casual labour to British ports? Is he aware that Southampton container terminal proposes to introduce casual labour on a large scale, with all the job insecurity and dangerous working practices that that involves? Does he agree that the matter should be examined in the House, in view of the pledges that were previously made?

Mr. Newton: If I may answer the direct question that I was initially asked, the hon. Gentleman will probably have observed that, as he was completing his question, I did indeed have a word with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate next week on the important effect on the education of children in Britain of the decision of some teachers to boycott standard assessment tests this year? Should not the House examine the important principle that all teaching and learning should be evaluated to judge what progress has been made in children's learning in order to improve their education, where it can be improved?

Mr. Newton: Many hon. Members on both sides of the House, and certainly on this side, will share my hon. Friend's views. I can only reiterate that our view is that we need the national curriculum and testing to help pupils and raise standards. We would all deplore any action that would disrupt those important tests.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Before the Budget debate begins on Monday, will it be possible for the Secretary of State for Social Security to make a detailed statement about the Government's plans for assisting, if they are going to assist, people on low incomes, and especially pensioners, once VAT is applied to heating bills? In any such statement, will it not be necessary for the Secretary of State to explain how pensioners who are just above the level of income support can be assisted, because such people, and, of course, the poorest, suffer nightmares even now as a result of their inability to pay to heat their homes adequately? A statement from the Secretary of State is needed before the vote takes place on Monday.

Mr. Newton: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I cannot and shall not attempt to add to the clear statements that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made in the Chamber less than an hour ago.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Could we have a statement early next week on the high-speed rail link as it passes through Kent? There are many environmental apprehensions in Kent which must be dealt with. Likewise, economic opportunities could arise, so could we also have a statement—a glut of statements next week—on the east Thames corridor and the opportunities for regeneration in north-west Kent?

Mr. Newton: I cannot at this stage promise a statement on the latter aspect in the time scale that my hon. Friend seeks. However, I expect my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement early next week on the channel tunnel link following what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in his Budget statement.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): The Leader of the House will be aware that, if someone uses their redundancy money to pay off their mortgage, in order to secure their future, they are liable to lose income support, or a section of it. He may not be aware that the only records kept centrally are on coal miners using redundancy. Records on five such in the Chesterfield area have just started. Should we not debate that matter to find out why there is this peculiarity?

Mr. Newton: I take it, in the best possible spirit, that the hon. Gentleman seeks to raise a matter that is of some importance to him rather than seeking a full debate on it.

Mr. Barnes: Either.

Mr. Newton: Well, I certainly cannot promise a full debate. From my experience of social security, I know that I would be rash to attempt a further reply off the cuff, but I shall draw the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): I hope that my right hon. Friend will not take it as a criticism of his arrangement of the business next week but, bearing in mind the answer that he gave to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), will he reconsider it? Will he consider the subject forecasting, as it would seem that a debate is urgently needed to set the record straight and improve accuracy? Some right hon. and hon. Members seem totally at sea on forecasting, and determined to talk down the prospects for this country, as shown in column 289 of yesterday's Hansard——

Madam Speaker: Order. What is the hon. Member's point?

Mr. Burns: The point is, Madam Speaker, that we need a debate next week on forecasting, given that the hon. Members for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) and for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) are totally at sea. For the past 24 hours, they have both claimed that unemployment would rise substantially today, when it fell.

Mr. Newton: I do not take my hon. Friend's remarks as a criticism in any sense. I am grateful to him for drawing attention once again to the almost instant inaccuracy of one of the main arguments of an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman yesterday—as I myself sought to do a few moments ago. I guess that the Budget debate may easily provide an opportunity for precisely the sort of debate that my hon. Friend wants.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Would the Leader of the House arrange for a statement or response next week to early-day motion 1439, on the causes of violence in society?

[That this House notes with grave disquiet the growth in vicious and unprovoked attacks on the most vulnerable in society, particularly on women and children; believes these developments stem from a decline in standards of personal responsibility and respect for others, aggravated by the easy availability of violent pornography, including snuff videos, and particularly the promotion of violence on television, which opposes the belief that 'thou shalt not kill' and gives people the liberty to watch murder, mayhem and child-abuse presented as entertainment; and therefore calls on Her Majesty's Government to establish a Royal Commission to investigate the causes of violence in society.]

It calls for the establishment of a royal commission to look into the reasons why there has been such a proliferation of violence. Bearing in mind that the Chief Rabbi, Jonathan Sacks, and the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, Basil Hume, also called last week for such a commission, does he agree that the Prime Minister should give the matter urgent attention?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman, whose concern about such matters is well known and widely respected, will know that many of my hon. and right hon. Friends, including the Prime Minister, have expressed concern in recent weeks. I am sure that they will take note of what he has said. If I cannot promise a debate in the way that the hon. Gentleman seeks, it is in part because it is a relatively short time since we had an opportunity to debate crime and its causes.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Will my right hon. Friend consider an early debate on the regulation of air transport? While many hon. Members on both sides of the House are pleased with the deal between British Airways and United States Air this week, which will be good for both the airlines and their passengers, we are concerned about the apparent threat by the European Commission, which has said that it wants to negotiate bilateral deals through the Commission and not through member Governments.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a debate, but I note my hon. Friend's concern and will bring the question to the attention of my right hon. Friends who deal with such matters.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): Can the Leader of the House tell me the future of the King's Cross Railways (No. 2) Bill, which is passing through Parliament? Could he arrange for a statement from the Secretary of State for Transport and an opportunity to debate the issue so that those of us who are worried about links between the channel tunnel and the north of England can be assured that any changes in plans ensure that we keep through routes, which will give us a direct service to the tunnel?

Mr. Newton: Having recently adverted to deficiencies in other people's forecasts, I shall not respond in quite the way that the hon. Gentleman sought, with crystal-ball gazing on the earlier part of his question. I do not need to engage in further crystal-ball gazing to know that he will have an opportunity to ask those questions, subject to you, Madam Speaker, when the Secretary of State for Transport makes a statement early next week.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Can the Leader of the House say when it will be possible for the Accommodation and Works Committee to know whether the Jubilee line extension will go ahead or not? The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that we have waited for five years for a decison, and that phase 2 of the new parliamentary building development would have been completed, and Members of the House accommodated in it, had it not been for the Jubilee line proposals. Is not it time that the Government made up their mind about whether the Jubilee line extension is going ahead, so that the Accommodation and Works Committee can plan accordingly?

Mr. Newton: Given the size of the project, I am not sure that I accept the hon. Gentleman's point about the speed with which it would have been possible to accommodate people in that major new building. I cannot add to what has been said on numerous occasions about the extension to the Jubilee line.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): On Tuesday, the Secretary of State for Employment washed her hands of the seven-week long Timex dispute and simply noted that the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service, ACAS, had not yet become involved. As ACAS has not become involved because the management of Timex will not agree to its involvement, can we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Employment next week that outlines what the Government intend to do about an employer who imposes cuts in wages and working conditions, sacks an entire work force for exercising their legal right and then refuses to accept arbitration?

Do the Government simply intend to look the other way while rogue employers wage war on the working conditions of British workers? If that is what they intend to do, they should be warned that, like the Timex workers in Dundee, workers across Britain will fight back. Far from being a recipe for a society at ease with itself, it will be a recipe for a society riven by class and industrial conflict, and that will be the fault of the Government.

Mr. Newton: Without in any way endorsing what I will call the political thrust of the hon. Gentleman's rather tendentious question, I merely note that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has heard his observations direct.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is there any chance of a debate next week on the public funding of political parties, which would give us an opportunity to discuss the way in which our major parties are financed?

As the Leader of the House is aware, the Labour party publishes its accounts in full; the Conservative party does not. During the debate, we could find out the source of the £17 million-worth of donations that went to the Conservative party immediately before the general election. The Prime Minister will not allow the accounts to be published, and I put it to the Leader of the House that that is because the right hon. Gentleman is ashamed to know that much of that money came from British crooks and foreign fascists.

Mr. Newton: I think that I will respond in much the same way as I did to the question from the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) rather than seek to raise the temperature by responding in similar terms. I do not have any plans for an early debate on that subject.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): When will there be a debate on London in Government time so that Members for London constituencies can raise their legitimate concerns about the lack of an overall elected authority for London that can undertake planning? That debate could also consider the chaos in housing, the current cuts in the number of hospitals and the disastrous proposal to deregulate the London bus service. That proposal has led to strong action by bus workers throughout London to protect the idea of an integrated public transport system in this capital city, for which they have massive support from the people of London.

Mr. Newton: I note the various points that the hon. Gentleman has made. I am unable, however, to promise a debate in Government time in the immediate future on that matter. I am aware that hon. Members on both sides of the House have an interest in the various issues in and around London, so I will bear that subject in mind for when an opportunity may arise.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [16 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the National Debt and the public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply, acquisition or importation;
(b) for refunding any amount of tax;
(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies, acquisitions and importations; or
(d) for relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lamont.]

Question again proposed.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

[Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 4683/93, the Commission's Annual Economic Report for 1993, and the draft Decision adopting the Report.]

3.58 pm

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): I greatly welcome the Chancellor's statement. He produced a Budget for recovery and for jobs. It will bring help and hope for individuals and for industry. Above all, it restores confidence, which is the key to recovery.

I shall return to the Budget later——

Madam Speaker: Order. It was remiss of me, but I should have pointed out that many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate today, and I shall have to limit speeches between 6 and 8 pm to 10 minutes.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Where are they all?

Mrs. Shephard: As the hon. Gentleman says, they are not immediately apparent; no doubt they will drift in later.

When I return to my right hon. Friend's Budget later, I shall provide more details, but I can say now that the new measures announced in the Budget will help unemployed people back into work.

This has been a good week for Britain. On Monday, we had improved manufacturing output figures; on Tuesday, we had a first class Budget for recovery; on Wednesday, we had improved retail sales figures; and only this morning I was able to announce that seasonally adjusted unemployment had fallen. These figures are welcome because they offer hope for what people want: real and lasting jobs.

I should like to set out the background to economic recovery. On Tuesday, my right hon. Friend announced his Budget, which is a Budget for recovery because the necessary economic framework for that recovery is already in place. In Britain, we have the lowest interest rates in the European Community. We have a competitive exchange rate. We have the lowest inflation for 25 years. We have the lowest corporation tax in the developed world. Our unit wage costs in manufacturing are rising more slowly than those of Japan or Germany. Our labour costs are 61 per cent. of those in Germany, and we have record productivity. We have low burdens on industry, and fewer strikes than at any time in our history.

We also have the people. We have the most flexible work force in Europe—a work force so productive that Britain now exports cars to Japan. We have a better educated work force, a society in which more than 90 per cent. of 16-year-olds are in education or training. Our work force are willing to go it alone. Nearly 3 million people work for themselves, creating new businesses and new enterprises, which in turn will create new jobs for others. This is the right framework to enable Britain to compete.

We should not forget the good news. Exports of manufactured goods are at record levels, up by 11 per cent. outside the EC in the year to January. Consumer credit is up; consumer expenditure is up; investment is up; export volumes are up, and at record levels; business confidence is up; car sales are up; retail sales are up 0·2 per cent. in February to their highest volumes ever; and, as announced on Monday, manufacturing output was up by 0·8 per cent. in January.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is good to hear all this good news, because we all want this country to succeed, but I suspect that the Secretary of State is using sophistry. She is giving us a litany of things that are up without telling us what they are up from. If she would give us a base year, we might get a more accurate picture of whether investment is truly up. It may be up compared with last year, but it is most certainly not up compared with 1979.

Mrs. Shephard: I would have put money on something else being up—the hon. Gentleman in this debate. He might like to know that manufacturing investment has been up for three successive quarters. As the Chancellor said on Tuesday, all independent forecasters—the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, and the European Commission—predict a resumption of growth this year. Indeed, the Commission expects growth in the United Kingdom to exceed that of any of our European partners, as Monday's output figures confirm.

Now to the best news of all. Today I announced that seasonally adjusted unemployment fell by 22,000. That is good news for unemployed people, and for us all. A fall in unemployment, especially so early in the recovery cycle, will of itself help to boost confidence.

As I have said before, however, and as I shall certainly say again, we must be careful not to place more weight on one month's figures than they will bear. In that, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and I are, for once, at one. None the less, the latest figures provide some reason for optimism.

The number of unemployed people placed into new jobs by the Employment Service is up on last year. The number of people becoming newly unemployed and joining the register is down. I am talking about one month's figures, but they provide news that I welcome, as I am sure does the whole House.

That is the background against which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer produced his Budget. It is a Budget for recovery and jobs. It will ensure a lasting recovery. It is a Budget for business. It will reduce tax and regulatory burdens on small firms, reform advance corporation tax, improve export credit insurance and permit entrepreneurs to reinvest their capital gains. Small wonder that it was widely welcomed by all the business organisations that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury quoted yesterday. All these reforms will create jobs as businesses expand.

Mr. Skinner: The Secretary of State could make a great difference to the unemployment figures if she and the rest of the Government did a couple of things during the next month. For example, the Government are in control of 100,000 jobs in the pits and in coal-related industries. There are 30,000 jobs in the pits and 70,000 in manufacturing and service industries.

If the Government decided to save the 31 pits over which there is a question mark, there is just half a chance that the unemployment figures would be announced during the next six months. If the Government saved jobs in local government and in hospitals during the course of the year, they would be on the verge of saving 300,000 jobs. It is no use blaming private entrepreneurs all the time. It is no good the right hon. Lady claiming credit for unemployment falling when the figures have been fiddled. The truth is that the Government never take the blame for all the misery they cause.

Mrs. Shephard: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we await the outcome of the pit closure review. I am sure that he is awaiting the outcome as anxiously as we all are.

The hon. Gentleman will know also that local authorities have had a real increase in funding of 3·1 per cent. That increase enables them to retain their work forces or to expand them, as Conservative-controlled Hampshire county council is doing, to the tune of 800 extra jobs with effect from April.

I also draw to the hon. Gentleman's attention the rather good example set by Sheffield city council, Sheffield being quite close to his constituency. It has made good management decisions to retain its work force in a cost-effective and efficient way. I can see that that does not commend itself to the hon. Gentleman, but that is no surprise.

The hon. Gentleman talks of what the Government can do. Jobs will be created directly by the construction of the Heathrow Express line, an investment of £300 million. The line is due to open in 1997. It will create 2,000 jobs during construction. Jobs will also be created by the construction of the channel tunnel rail link, which involves investment of £2·5 billion. As the House heard earlier, details of these projects will be announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport next week.

The reaction of Opposition Members, as ever, is predictable. They want extra resources here and extra expenditure there, but they always oppose every proposal for raising the necessary additional revenue. Fortunately, no one takes any notice of them. That is at least partly because they are all preaching different messages.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras continues to want to impose a tax on jobs. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) claims to be the friend of the small business man. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Leader of the Opposition, has not yet felt able, alas, to welcome the fall in unemployment announced today.

The Budget will help to create what unemployed people want—real and lasting jobs. It will encourage inward investment such as that by Toyota in Derbyshire, the biggest single Japanese investment in Europe, which will create 3,000 jobs, and by Kimberly-Clark in Humberside, the largest United States investment ever in the region, which will create well over 700 jobs.

Last week, we had an interesting little debate about Opposition Members' attitudes to inward investment. I was delighted to have the position clarified once and for all by the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who had the courage to follow the example of Mr. Gavin Laird, of the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union, who condemned the TUC's description of inward investment as "negative and racist", and he was right to do so. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Livingston was finally smoked out, although not his hon. Friends, in condemning that particular description.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Does the Secretary of State realise that, since October, when the President of the Board of Trade announced the programme of colliery closures, my constituency alone has lost 1,000 jobs? Over the next few months, we are likely to lose a further 6,000. How does that compare with a couple of hundred jobs at Toyota or Kimberly-Clark?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman is an expert in coal mining matters, and I know, because he is a sensible man, that he understands that, as in every other industry and with every other business, if the coal industry cannot sell its product, there has to be change. I also know that the hon. Gentleman is awaiting the outcome of the pit closure review, and that he will welcome the investment by the training and enterprise council and the Employment Service in his area, which are helping to create jobs, regenerate the economy and help those who are currently out of work.

The Budget will provide direct help for unemployed people. My job and that of my Department is to give that help, to renew people's confidence, and, above all, to give people the help they need to get back to work. That is my top priority.

It is sad that some Opposition Members like to give the impression that a person who has lost his job will be out of work for ever. They have tried over recent days to perpetuate the myth that there is only one job for every 27 unemployed people. That ignores two things. First, for every job notified to jobcentres, many others are not notified—jobs which are filled by other means such as advertisements or private agencies.

Secondly, that calculation is based on the number of vacancies that remain unfilled. It ignores the much larger number of vacancies that jobcentres have filled—filled with unemployed people. Last year, the Employment Service placed 1·5 million people into jobs.

I shall tell the House how, with our help, unemployed people are getting back into work. Every month, hundreds of thousands of jobs become vacant. Only this morning, I published the figures for February. In that month alone, 160,000 vacancies were notified to jobcentres—only a third of those actually becoming vacant.

People are taking up those vacancies. In February alone, again as I announced this morning, almost 400,000 people left unemployment—one in eight of the total. That happens every single month.

Most people leave unemployment very quickly—one quarter within a month, more than a half within three months, and two thirds within six months. That is the message that we should get across to people who have lost their jobs. It is a clear message that there are jobs out there—real jobs—and that TECs and jobcentres are there to help people to get back to work.

The range of help already available to unemployed people is considerable. The Employment Service has a staff of nearly 50,000 and a budget of over £1 billion. Day in, day out, the Employment Service helps people find new jobs. Last year, it found new jobs for 6,000 people each and every working day.

It is a pity that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras hates employers. He has made that clear; he never misses an opportunity to run them down. But I live in hope that one day I shall persuade him that there is a connection between employers and jobs.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to look at what employers are doing through training and enterprise councils and local enterprise companies. They now comprise 104 different sets of employers, business people, working in their own local areas to help unemployed people. The hon. Gentleman might disapprove of what TECs are doing, but the unemployed people they help approve, as do local Members of Parliament—on his own side as well as on this—and those trade unionists who sit on TEC boards.

I will give a few examples of what TECs are doing. Durham TEC is providing 100 engineering apprenticeships for young people. Northumberland TEC is sponsoring 160 students from firms in the region to undertake Open university management courses. Surrey TEC is working closely with the health authority to help 10 adults with Down's syndrome; all have been found work placements, and three are likely to be offered permanent jobs. I could give scores more examples. With the Employment Service and TECs, the framework is there, and so are the opportunities.

Our plans in the autumn statement already provided for 1·5 million opportunities—more than have ever been provided before. Those opportunities are targeted on those who need them most: the longer-term unemployed, the people most in need of help; people who have difficulty getting employers to give them an interview and who can now benefit from the job interview guarantee scheme, which has placed over 100,000 people in jobs; the disabled, who can get a three-week work trial with an employer; and job clubs, which improve by 50 per cent. people's chances of getting new jobs. Those programmes help unemployed people to get back to work, and they will help more people get jobs as the economy recovers.

In the new measures that we announced on Tuesday, we have responded to what unemployed people tell us about the help they want. They tell us that they want opportunities which are good for them and which represent a lasting investment in the economy and in their local community. The Budget will provide the framework for recovery, for growth and for new jobs. To make sure that unemployed people get those new jobs, we have listened to what they tell us and have responded.

That is why we announced on Tuesday an additional 100,000 opportunities, costing £230 million. That should be welcomed in all parts of the House. Above all, it will be welcomed by the individuals who want those opportunities and have asked for them.

The new package will provide 30,000 opportunities through learning for work, to finance unemployed people to pursue full-time courses of education—perhaps to learn a language, which would be a useful additional skill in a nation of exporters, or to acquire skills in business administration, catering or engineering. All these are skills which will improve people's job prospects.

The new measures will provide 60,000 opportunities under community action to enable people to do part-time voluntary work while continuing active job search—work such as restoring heritage buildings and inner-city sites, and work with elderly people, the infirm, the young, or the mentally handicapped, and to improve the environment.

There will also be 10,000 extra places on the business start-up scheme to provide financial support, training and advice to enable unemployed people to start their own businesses: businesses such as Elliot's in Leicester, where a family business has been created by unemployed people; or Thomas Ferguson Print Finishing in Accrington, which now employs 25 people; businesses which employ 83 additional people for every 100 self-employed individuals.

The package also contains TEC challenge, a fund to which TECs will bid competitively to develop new, innovative ways to help unemployed people into work and to create new jobs; and it contains workshop pilots—four in different parts of the country—to test how effective it is in encouraging the recruitment of long-term unemployed people by paying a temporary subsidy to employers.

This package, building on those opportunities already available, will help unemployed people to take advantage of the recovery and of the many thousands of jobs that become available each and every day.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): My right hon. Friend will be aware that nobody on this side of the House believes that it is possible to absorb the vast numbers of unemployed people simply by throwing money around, which is what the Opposition appear to think. If that were possible, it would have been done before, under Governments of either party. Is my right hon. Friend aware that some people have suggested that these measures are cautious and have limited scope? Could she say why the measures do not go further than pilots, when we have had so much experience of employment and training schemes over the past 10 years?

Mrs. Shephard: The measures should be seen in the context of the 1·5 million opportunities—a record number—that we have already provided and that will come on stream in April. Perhaps I could remind my hon. Friend of what I said when introducing the measures—that they will enable an investment in the people, in the economy and in local communities.

In addition, the workstart pilots are intended to test other approaches, so that we can see what might be of particular help to unemployed people and so that we can take the lessons and build on what we learn from those pilots. That is the essence of a pilot scheme.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): Is the Minister aware that Professor Snower, the originator of the idea, apparently believes that a subsidy of £150 a week is the only way to create new jobs? Why are the Government offering only £60?

Mrs. Shephard: I note that Professor Snower, whose work I greatly respect, has claimed ownership of the idea. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who is sitting next to the hon. Lady, might also claim that he had some interest in the idea, which has been discussed for quite some time by all those people interested in helping the long-term unemployed. I note Professor Snower's comment. We feel that the basis of the workstart pilot is correct, and that the subsidy given to employers is real and will be helpful, but we shall continue to see how the schemes develop, because, as I told my hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), they are in the nature of pilots, and we wish to learn from them.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): As the Minister has commented about people who have also submitted ideas to her on the workstart proposals, will one of the four pilot schemes be testing the idea that I put to her?

Mrs. Shephard: I have not quite finished the design of the individual pilots, and the hon. Gentleman will understand why. On Tuesday, I shall be meeting heads of TECs and the Employment Service to discuss a whole range of measures, including the design and location of the individual pilots, so perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be able to accept that the final design is not yet ready.

Mr. Field: If the TECs say that people should be able to keep the whole of their benefit for a year, provided that employers meet a certain wage level, will the Minister be prepared for all four pilot schemes to take that form if the TECs say that it would be the most marketable scheme?

Mrs. Shephard: No, I cannot reassure the hon. Gentleman in that way: we are basing the schemes on a flat rate payment, because that is simple to administer and enables us to achieve a standardised arrangement which we can test. However, as I have already said, these are pilots and we shall have to see how they go. I shall keep a watching brief, and no doubt the hon. Gentleman will do exactly the same.

What is most damaging to confidence is when Britain is talked down by Front-Bench members of the official Opposition. We are trying to bring hope and confidence. It was extremely sad last week to have to listen to the speeches of the hon. Members for Livingston and for Holborn and St. Pancras in the Supply day debate. Joined by several of their hon. Friends, they sought to deny the achievements of manufacturing industry. Sadly, speaker after speaker rose from the Opposition Front Bench to deny the facts.

They denied that exports are at record levels. There was not a word from them about the chemical industry, a net exporter; not a word about pharmaceuticals, also a net exporter, with exports growing 17 per cent. in 1992; not a word about the fact that car exports have doubled since 1986; not a word about the fact that Britain is a net exporter of television sets; not a word about the record export performance of British industry; not a word about the fact that, in the year to January, British exports outside the EC were up 11 per cent.

[Mrs. Shephard]

There was not a word about those achievements. There was not a word of encouragement to the men and women in industry who produce our manufactured goods and our services. There was not a word about those who sell them in tough export markets. There was not a word about the success of British industry brought about by policies aimed at encouraging enterprise, providing incentives, sweeping away unnecessary regulation and reducing burdens on business—policies which were greatly furthered by my right hon. Friend's Budget. There was not a word about the trade union reforms which have made industrial relations in this country the best in Europe.

In last week's debate, we heard speeches deploring the decline of Britain from the hon. Members for Livingston and for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), and from the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes). Today, unemployment fell in all those areas. That is good news.

It is a shame that the official Opposition spokesman on employment, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, cannot contain his hatred of employers. Indeed, last week he added to them bankers and financiers, accusing them of being incompetent financial institutions, on the make and exhibiting short-sighted stupidity. That is quite something for an hon. Member who represents a constituency in the heart of the world's major financial capital.

Last year, we heard much about Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen scurrying round the City, downing prawn cocktails in ever-increasing quantities, in an attempt to show that they and their party believed in capitalism. How many more prawns will have to be sacrificed to put right the words of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras? Instead of encouraging enterprise and business, instead of helping employers, Labour would introduce job destruction policies.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Does the Secretary of State say that Barclays bank has been well managed since Nigel Lawson joined it? If so, why is it running at a loss?

Mrs. Shephard: That is a cheap comment, even from a prawn.

The Opposition would introduce a national minimum wage; how many jobs would that destroy? At a time of high unemployment, they would sign up to the social chapter which the Prime Minister rejected at Maastricht; how many jobs would that destroy? As an incentive to training, they would put a training levy on employment; how many jobs would that destroy? Their latest idea is to subsidise jobs by taxing the utilities. That is not a positive message to business. Every time success was made of an enterprise, it would be taxed. How many jobs would that destroy?

Those policies are in complete contrast to the policies of the Government. The Labour party has never learnt that Governments do not create jobs, despite the fact that business, employers and industry tell it so all the time. Only businesses can create jobs, through producing goods and services that people want, on time and at a competitive price.

In this House we have, sadly, had to get used to Opposition Members running Britain down. They were running Britain down in last week's Supply day debate. They ran Britain down in Tuesday's debate on the Budget. No doubt they are longing to run Britain down today.

In commending this Budget to the House, I agree with the Opposition that some things in Britain are down. Inflation is down; interest rates are down; unemployment is down; and the Labour party is down—and out. But confidence is up; output is up; retail sales are up. Above all, Britain is on the up.

4.30 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I welcome, without reservation, the reduction in the jobless total that has been announced today. Like all Opposition Members, I am delighted if there are fewer people officially out of work. It is undoubtedly the only bit of good news on unemployment in the last three years, and it is welcome news. We hope that it will continue in future months and years, but we fear that it is a freak. If I have read the right hon. Lady's press statement correctly, she fears that it is a freak, too, because she says that we should not attach too much importance to it.

There are many, not just among the Opposition, but around the country, who will also fear that, besides being a freak, the reduction may be another of the Department of Employment's statistical fiddles. I plead in justification of that remark the fact that the Department of Employment has already done 27 fiddles, all of which have reduced the unemployment total. It may be that there is no fiddle this time, but if this is the start of a trend it had better be an accelerating trend because, if the total is to fall by 22,000 a month, it will take 11 years before all those out of work are back in work.

The Department of Employment also published today its labour force survey, headed "Key Results for Autumn 1992". One of the items, highlighted even by the Department, reads:

"66,000 more people were unemployed on the ILO definition than the average monthly number of claimants of unemployment-related benefits in Great Britain during the period September to November 1992."

In other words, by that international definition, 66,000 more people were out of work than the Government were acknowledging.

That is not all, of course. As you, Madam Deputy Speaker, know and as I, the Secretary of State and, I am sure, her statisticians know, there are, using the old definition, 4 million people out of work. Nevertheless, we welcome the reduction and hope that it is the start of a trend.

Harold Wilson said that a week is a long time in politics. Certainly 48 hours appears to be a long time when it comes to Budget debates. Things move rather quickly. The Guardian carried a headline after Tuesday's Budget which read:

"Lamont's stock riding high with Tory MPs."

By today, however, Tory MPs, according to The Guardian, are in revolt about the imposition of VAT on fuel for pensioners. Sadly, it is nothing new these days for The Guardian to be outflanked in concern by Tory MPs. Not long ago, the spineless leader writers on The Guardian welcomed the Prime Minister's workfare proposition, only to see it, to their embarrassment, dropped by the Government—at least for the time being.

This week The Guardian, in its response to the Budget, mocked my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition for objecting to the blatant Tory betrayal of election promises and the imposition of VAT on fuel, which will impoverish millions of badly off pensioners and families. Perhaps The Guardian will no longer run such moving articles about people dying from hypothermia.

Mr. Skinner: I do not think the paper's man is in the Press Gallery. He has probably gone to Cheltenham.

Mr. Dobson: That could well be. On the other hand, my hon. Friend is probably being unfair. I believe that the paper is represented.—[Interruption.] Surely The Guardian is not sold by newsagents. Newsagents sell the tabloids.

According to most commentators, the Tories won the general election of 1992 by managing to turn it into an election about tax. The commentators said:

"Labour lost because Labour said that tax would have to go up"— that is, Labour told the truth—

"and the Tories won because the Tories said that tax would not have to go up."

In other words, the Tories told lies. It may seem harsh to accuse the Tory party of telling lies.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) rose——

Mr. Dobson: I shall give way in due course, but I want to make some progress.

There are two possible explanations of what various leading lights in the Tory party said in the run-up to the general election. Either they were lying or they were ignorant and incompetent. All the time, Ministers had access to Treasury figures. They had all the official information at their disposal. The Prime Minister told the House that the Tories had costed their programme. Treasury officials had been used in the exercise. He said that they has also costed our programme. Well, the costing was rather strange. Having costed our programme, the officials said that it could be paid for only by tax increases. When the self-same officials costed the Tory programme, they said that it could be paid for without tax increases. There seems to be something wrong, either with the officials or with those who draw on their work.

Nevertheless, the Prime Minister told us that he had no plans and no need to extend the scope of VAT. He said:

"I have no plans to raise . . . the level of national insurance contributions."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808.]

For good measure, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

"We will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

The Prime Minister said:

"We have no need and no plans to extend the scope of VAT."

If that was not lying—and, under the rules of the House, it cannot be lying—it must have been an admission of incompetence on a monumental scale. If leading Conservatives were called to any court to answer the charge that they had lied to the electorate, they could plead incompetence. In doing so, they could call upon a considerable body of evidence that they are, and always have been, incompetent. They could probably call character witnesses to demonstrate long-term incompetence in handling economic affairs. They could reasonably claim that everything they said before the election was consistent with their usual behaviour. They could, indeed, ask that other offences over 14 years be taken into account.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the major reasons for the Conservative party's victory in the general election of 9 April 1992 was that the electorate listened to what the Labour party had to offer and heard what it and its leader had to say, did not like what it heard and went to the polls to vote Conservative?

Mr. Dobson: In reply to that, I can only say, "It wasn't what you said at the time, sunshine."

For the past 14 years, the Tories have been running the British economy into the ground. When they came to power, there was a trade surplus in manufactured goods. Now, despite the benefits of North sea oil, we have had trade deficits averaging £16 billion for the last seven years in succession. Now, despite the benefits of North sea oil, under this collection of clowns we have a trade deficit even in the fuel trade. When they came to power, just over 1 million people were out of work. Now, for the fifth time in 14 years, there are 3 million people out of work officially and 4 million people out of work in reality. That is despite the 27 downward adjustments carried out by statisticians at the Department of Employment in response to pressure from Ministers.

When the Government came to power, 7,300,000 people were working in manufacturing industry, making things for people here and abroad to buy. Now, there are scarcely 4 million people working in manufacturing industry, and it is clear that soon there will be more people out of work than working in manufacturing industry. After 14 years in power, putting their economic theories into practice, the Tories have got us to the top of the European unemployment league. We have the most people out of work—we are the only country with more than 3 million unemployed—and we have the fastest rising rate of unemployment.

Despite all that, the Chief Secretary had the gall to tell the House yesterday that the Tory party is the party of economic competence. He also spent a considerable amount of time talking about the public sector borrowing requirement, so let us consider the sacred PSBR under this Government. I refer specifically to this year's borrowing requirement.

The Tories, the self-proclaimed paragons of economic competence, have made six successive estimates of the PSBR. I remind the House that the latest estimate is £35 billion. The first estimate was that we would not have a PSBR but a surplus of £3 billion. That estimate was made by Chancellor Lawson. The second estimate, by the then Chancellor Major, was, again, that there would be no PSBR although, to be fair, he did not say that there would be a surplus. He had obviously turned himself into the Polonius of 11 Downing street:

"Neither a borrower, nor a lender be".

He said that there would be a balance, and hon. Members might recall——

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South West) rose——

Mr. Dobson: No, wait until I have read out the quotation.

Mr. Legg rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Gentleman should know well enough by now that if the hon. Member who has the Floor does not give way, he must resume his seat.

Mr. Dobson: In his one and only Budget statement, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), who is now the Prime Minister, said:

"For decades, successive Governments had spent more than they were prepared to raise honestly from taxation and they made up the shortfall by borrowing."—[Official Report, 20 March 1993; Vol. 169, c. 1014.]

At that point, the PSBR for this year was estimated to be nil; under his premiership it has shifted to £35 billion. It has reached that point by way of a third estimate of £12 billion, a fourth estimate of £28 billion, a fifth estimate in the autumn statement of £37 billion, and the latest estimate of £35 billion. We have moved from a surplus of £3 billion to a PSBR of £35 billion under a Government who claim to be economically competent.

To cut back on the deficits which have accumulated, apparently by accident and against the Government's intentions, we are faced with massive tax increases and massive cuts in public services, not to invest in the future, not to put right the structural faults in the British economy and not to re-skill our people; the cuts will repay the debts piled up by a Government who, to use the Prime Minister's words, were not honest enough to raise the money by taxation earlier. That is what has happened under this incompetent Government.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): It is abundantly clear that the Opposition do not like the Budget, but it is less clear what measures they recommend to enhance the recovery which is already under way. The debate has already lasted for more than two days, but we have not heard a single positive suggestion from the Opposition about what they would do. Are we to hear one from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) this afternoon, or are we to continue to wait in vain?

Hon. Members: Who was that?

Mr. Dobson: If anybody had asked me at the door whether the hon. Gentleman was a Member, I should not have recognised him. He clearly adorns our debates extremely infrequently. He will have to learn that, like Conservative Members, we make speeches that we want to make and do not take orders from those across the Floor.

Conservative Members should listen to this. The worst charge of incompetence against the Government is that they have squandered the benefits of North sea oil. Over the past 14 years, the Government have been blessed with the one-off bonus of North sea oil which could have helped the balance of trade, which it did, and could have helped to fund investment but it has not been used for that. It gave a massive lift to Government revenues. One hundred and thirteen billion pounds has been raised from the North sea and every penny has been frittered away. The rest of Europe cannot believe what the Government have done with that one-off bonus. Every penny of revenue from North sea oil has gone either to pay for the costs of unemployment and in tax cuts for the rich in the 1988 Budget or to ease the pain of the poll tax.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: No, I shall not.

There is not a penny left for investment in plant and machinery or research and development, and there is not a penny left for investment in education and training.

Mr. Arnold rose——

Mr. Dobson: No, I shall not give way.

What I have outlined is incompetence on a grand scale. If the Tories are accused of lying, we can see why they would find it easy to counter the charge with a plea of incompetence, but we cannot allow them to get away with it. At the previous election, the Tories cruelly misled the British people and never stopped trying to do so. However, it is getting more difficult for them, and their excuses are getting more threadbare.

It is now almost exactly three years to the day since the present Prime Minister presented his Budget as Chancellor of the Exchequer. Since that Budget, unemployment has risen in every single month save this one, rather like the trade deficit most months and the PSBR, as far as I can see, every month. It is no good the Prime Minister telling The Independent that he blames his predecessor for what he inherited. During his Budget speech, when he was Chancellor, he said of his predecessor, Nigel Lawson:

"He has left the public finances stronger than at any time in living memory".—[Official Report, 20 March 1990; Vol. 169, c. 1010.]

That is what he said and he meant it. He went on to describe that as an enduring record. With this lot in office, it is likely to endure as a record for a very long time.

Since the Prime Minister became Chancellor, manufacturing jobs have been lost at a rate of 255,000 a year. Since he became Prime Minister, manufacturing jobs have gone at a rate of 312,000 a year. Since he became Prime Minister, the number of people in work has fallen by one million three hundred and sixty odd thousand. Since the Prime Minister's one and only Budget, unemployment has risen by 87 per cent., more than 1,200,000 people have been thrown out of work and 9,500,000 of his fellow citizens have experienced the pain and shock of being out of work.

What has the Prime Minister done to help? Scarcely anything at all. Let us consider the Government's spending on training. When the Prime Minister took over, it was £2·4 billion. It fell to £2·1 billion, it stayed at £2·1 billion, it is planned to stay at £2·1 billion next year and is set to fall after that. In other words, as unemployment has gone up by 87 per cent., measures to help the unemployed have fallen away. This year, spending is down £300 million on 1990-91.

When the Prime Minister became Chancellor, there were 430,000 trainees on employment training. This year, there are 210,000. Spending on ET is down from £1·2 billion to £883 million—and that includes employment action. Even the Secretary of State must realise that employment action and employment training are not working, because she is wrapping them up and amalgamating them into one outfit called training for work. One can reasonably say that only the names have been changed to protect the guilty. The coming year's budget for the new combined training for work arrangement will be less than the budget for this year. There will be 210,000 trainees and a budget of £874 million.

When employment training was originally announced by the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir. N. Fowler), who is now the chairman of the Tory party, he promised with a great fanfare of trumpets—it was a Tory promise, so we could tell what would happen to it—600,000 places on employment training and a budget of £1·5 billion. What we got was one third of the number of trainees that he had promised, and half the budget. In other words, there is a massive difference between what was promised and what was delivered. The unemployed were betrayed by the breaking of that promise.

Another Tory promise was the youth training guarantee. Apparently every young person of 16 or 17 who was not in work or education would get a YT place. The numbers have fallen from 347,000 for 1990-91 to 233,000 for the months of this year for which the places have been counted. But the Unemployment Unit, which generally speaking is more reliable than the Department of Employment, estimates that there are 111,000 16 and 17-year-olds who are not in education, not in work and not in training. Another promise has not been kept, and our young people have been betrayed by the Government and by the Department of Employment.

We need to look at that history of broken promises when we examine what the Chancellor promised on Tuesday, and what the Secretary of State said at her press conference, at which she admitted that the additional money resulting from the Budget would be only £125 million at most—less than £1 per week for every person who is out of work. I should describe that as not a lot, but the Secretary of State refused to accept that it was "a piddling sum". It all depends on how one judges a piddling sum—certainly it would not make much of a splash. Set against the needs of the 3 million unemployed it is a piddling sum. Set against the £27 billion cost to the taxpayer of keeping all those people out of work, the 780 million working days lost because of mass unemployment, and the £50 billion worth of lost production of goods and services, it is a piddling sum. That seems to me a perfect description.

The Government claim—let us accept their claim for a moment—that 100,000 people will benefit from what was announced in the Budget. In view of the long history of Government announcements followed by failure to deliver, it is reasonable to assume that what will happen will be less favourable than what was announced. But even if we accept their estimate that 100,000 people will be helped, that means that out of every 30 people out of work, 29 will get not one shred of help from the budget announced by the Secretary of State.

I should like the right hon. Lady to clear up one point now. Is the £125 million really an increase? Is it additional money from the Treasury or money shifted from within her existing budget?

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There is £230 million in extra money that my Department would not otherwise have had.

Mr. Dobson: The Secretary of State said in her press release on Tuesday that, after the estimated benefit savings, the net cost would be £125 million. She cannot claim that the benefits that people will receive are part of her spending—that is absurd. The figure is £125 million. She acknowledged that on Tuesday, and she cannot change her mind today.

There are other questions for the Secretary of State to answer. What about all those leaks about the brilliant new schemes that she would introduce? There were all sorts of stories being circulated. The 21-hour rule for education and the availability for work rule were both to be relaxed. Massive new programmes were to be introduced to match the scale of the unemployment problem. What went wrong? Why has the right hon. Lady not delivered?

The next question is, as one of the Secretary of State's hon. Friends asked her, why did the unemployed have to wait all that time for what she has now announced? Could not the schemes have been implemented as soon as they were worked out? Why have people had to wait until the Budget? The right hon. Lady has been telling people for months—since July and August last year—that the Department is working on those schemes. Why have people had to wait for the Budget? Was it because that was the only bit of good news that we would get in the Budget? We do not think that provisions for the worst off of the unemployed should be used simply as a propaganda exercise for a Tory Chancellor in trouble.

There are 1 million long-term unemployed people, and many of them would like to do further education courses, but many are prevented by the availability for work rule and the 21-hour rule. The Secretary of State has not changed those rules. All that she has said is that 30,000 of the 1 million long-term unemployed will be able to have places on her new scheme—one place for every 33 people suffering from long-term unemployment.

The Secretary of State has also held forth at great length about how wonderful the business start-up scheme is. Sometimes it is; it does some good work. The right hon. Lady intends to provide 10,000 extra places, but she did not mention that when she has done so there will still be 30,000 fewer places than there were on business start-up schemes in 1989, when fewer than 2 million people were out of work.

The Secretary of State talks about the TEC challenge. That is brilliant—£25 million. Even by the Secretary of State's definition that must be a piddling sum. All the TECs are supposed to compete for the £25 million, and we can safely bet that most of it will be eaten up by TEC and Department of Employment bureaucracies, as bids are submitted, assessed and argued about, and awards are finally made. Furthermore, we know that in the end awards will be made not on the basis of the merit of the application but according to where the Department thinks that it would be best for the Secretary of State to turn up for a photo opportunity—for the county council elections, say.

Then there is workstart. That may be a good idea. Perhaps some of the ideas suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) would be a good thing. But the best that we can say about workstart at the moment is that it has not started and that nobody is sure whether it will work. Of the four pilot schemes, two will be run by the TECs, which were originally to be trusted with everything, and two will be run by the Department of Employment, which apparently no longer trusts the TECs with everything.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead has always realised, but as Ministers do not seem to realise, the great danger of workstart is job substitution. That is what happens when somebody moving into a job with a big subsidy is cheaper for a firm than keeping on somebody who already works there, so that person gets pushed out to make way for a new cheaper, subsidised worker. That problem must be tackled and the Secretary of State has not yet done so.

The proposal for community action—voluntary work, part time—is certainly not up to scratch compared with the old community programme. It is to be carried out part time and on the cheap.

[Mr. Dobson]

We recognise that the situation is so desperate that anything seems better than nothing, even when what the Government propose is next to nothing. Nothing is being done to help to create real jobs; the schemes are geared more to knocking people off the unemployment figures than to getting them back to work. That is a betrayal of the people who are out of work.

The jobless have been betrayed, their families have been betrayed, the country has been betrayed and Tory promises have been betrayed. In 1979, the Tories promised to get Britain back to work. Since then, they have failed to get the unemployment total down to the level that they inherited. At the general election, they promised that there would be no tax increases and no cuts in services—now they are to increase taxes and cut services, and they have virtually ignored all those who are out of work.

Labour Members recognise how painful, harmful and hurtful it is to be out of work and that is why we welcome even today's small decrease in the unemployment total. A person who is out of work loses a sense of purpose because, for many people, what they do is what they are. If one asks a child "What are you going to be when you grow up?", the answer is some sort of job. When people lose their jobs, they feel that they are nothing and have lost their place in society. [Laughter.] If the witless loons on the Tory Benches do not understand my point, I shall make it again. It may be that such a question is not asked in the middle-class homes of Conservative Members, but Labour Members are all familiar with the aunt, uncle or neighbour who asks a child, "What are you going to be when you grow up?" The answer given is some sort of job. Children want to be teachers, miners, engine drivers or nurses, because that is how people perceive themselves in our society—by how and where and when they work, and by the status that goes with that work. People who lose their jobs lose their status and that sense of belonging and contribution. They also lose money because when they lose their jobs, they lose their pay, and benefits do not make up for that.

The Government have also been harmful for many of our people. Before the present unemployment crisis began, those policies saddled tens of millions of people with personal debt with which they now find it difficult to cope. When this collection of people who claim to be economically competent took power in 1979, the total personal debt was £74 billion, or 52 per cent. of individuals' disposable income. The latest figures show that people in this country now owe £487 billion, or 109 per cent. of disposable income. It is against that level of debt that people are losing their jobs, so to lose a job now is more hurtful and harmful than it was in the past.

Unemployment is bad for health and even increases the rate of cancer. It increases the rate of suicide, and the likelihood of violent death. A middle-aged man who loses his job has double the chance of dying within the next 10 years. I apologise to anyone who may ask why I do not know the figure for women. Such a figure is not available. However, there is no doubt that unemployment increases illness and premature death, and the country has a Chancellor of the Exchequer who states that unemployment is a "price well worth paying".

Unemployment breaks up family relationships and leads to homelessness, to vandalism, to theft and to violence. It impoverishes whole neighbourhoods and it is the greatest enemy to our democracy. It impoverishes the country as a whole. The Secretary of State has admitted that it costs £9,000 to keep somebody out of work for a year—£27 billion for the country as a whole. In terms of lost production, 780 million working days a year are lost with the present level of unemployment. Unemployment is ruining the lives of 3 million people and their families. It is shackling the economy. Of all the Tory betrayals, the worst is throwing 3 million or 4 million people out of work and then doing nothing to help them.

The whole country is paying the price of mass unemployment, but that is not how the Government see it. To them, it remains a price well worth paying, as the Chancellor said. It is not; it is far too high a price. People want the chance of a job and when they get that job, they want to be paid enough to be able to bring up their families without depending on benefits or handouts from anybody. People do not want a Britain on benefits; they hope for a Britain at work. The Budget betrayed their hopes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, I remind hon. Members that, although the odd sedentary intervention may be acceptable, repeated sedentary interventions are not. I shall count them as if they were a speech.

5.4 pm

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): All hon. Members know that unemployment is disastrous for the individual and for society. What surprised me about the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was that he did not propose one policy about how to solve the problem. We do not disagree with the last five or six pages of the hon. Gentleman's speech; we all know that. I grew up in Lancashire in the 1930s, in a town where unemployment was higher than it was in Jarrow. Unemployment destroys people. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras made no suggestions, apart from the growth rate, for doing anything.

There is also no doubt that the deficit, which concerns us all, is linked to unemployment. It costs £9,000 for each person who is unemployed. Getting people back into work is the main concern of everyone in the House. We want the policy that will achieve that in the long term by providing continuing arrangements. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras said nothing about that.

I welcome the fall today in the level of unemployment. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras was gracious enough to say that as well. We trust that this is a sign of better times to come in the employment ratio. We shall have to wait for two or three months, but at least the sign of better times to come is there. One swallow may not make a summer, but it is better than having a swan. [Laughter.] I made that up as I went along, and it was not very good. As is usual in my case, I did not know at the beginning where I would finish up, but at least I got to the end of the sentence.

I especially welcome the commitment to the channel tunnel train link coming into London. That will provide employment and will give better services in London and elsewhere. Similarly, I welcome the Heathrow fast link and the fact that, within 15 minutes, it will bring people into London. That will encourage tourism and travel, and will increase employment. I wonder why we are not taking more such decisions. It is almost like the 1930s, although this work needs doing in any case. Perhaps we should make it a proviso that the people taken on should come off the unemployment registers. If we bring people in from outside, we shall do nothing to reduce unemployment.

I wish that there had been a bigger commitment for the crossrail line and for the extension of the Jubilee line, because we need far better public services in London. If we are to have such services the time to work on them is at a time of unemployment, when we are back to public works. We are all turning into semi-Keynesians who remember the 1930s and the Tennessee Valley Authority. There is nothing wrong with that. Most Conservative Members are very intelligent; if we see that a policy is not working, we change it. I offer such a policy to the Opposition.

In our debates on the Budget, several hon. Members have mentioned people who have been unemployed for two years. The critical time is six months. If people are on the register for more than six months, the day on which they do not get up at their usual time but instead stay in bed is the day from which it will then be difficult to get them properly back to work. We should concentrate on that six-months figure, although I know that there are difficulties.

My next point is not over-cheerful. To enable us to pull out of the recessions of 1929-31, of 1974-75 and of 1980-81, the real interest rate had to be negative or very low indeed. Interest rates in Britain are still too high. That causes us great difficulty in pulling out of the recession. I realise why they are kept at their present level, and the difficulty of reducing them. Let us examine the three previous recessions. Between 1929 and 1931, there were also times when public sector pay increases were negative. We must watch the interest rate if we are to pull out of the recession.

I want now to refer to London. I am a Lancastrian who has lived in London for 30-odd years—an adoptive Londoner. Many people in Britain are not aware how serious the position is in London compared with that in other areas, and I wish to draw the attention of the House to it. Certain parts of London may soon need assisted area status if they are to get through the present recession.

It is my reckoning—the figures are agreed by the London Boroughs Association—that the council tax takes about £200 million out of London and £175 million out of the rest of the south-east. London is treated as a milch cow which makes money for the rest of the country and which can remain for ever a milch cow.

Let us examine the unemployment figures. In my constituency in December 1991, unemployment was 9·7 per cent. In December 1992, it was 12·9 per cent. Unemployment among males aged 20 to 24 is 26·2 per cent., or more than one in four. Brent as a whole had a rate of unemployment of 16·8 per cent. at the end of last year.

If we compare those figures with the figures for the rest of the country, we realise the position that London is in. The comparable figures for unemployment are: Scotland 9·9 per cent., Wales 10·3 per cent., Northern Ireland 14·6 per cent., and the north 12·2 per cent. Yet we are switching money from London to the rest of the country.

Let us take one example. East Kilbride development corporation is advertising in London to persuade employers to move from London to East Kilbride. Unemployment in East Kilbride is 8·7 per cent., while in London it is 11·6 per cent. There is something ridiculous about using Government money to persuade people to transfer their businesses from London, where there is high unemployment, to East Kilbride, which has lower unemployment. I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to examine that policy.

Sometimes policies become historic policies which continue until someone puts up a red signal and says, "Hang on, do we know what we are doing and where we are at the present time?" I fear that the pick-up in London may not be as fast as in the rest of the country, because London's industries, especially the financial services industry, will never employ the number of people that they employed in the past. The prosperity of London and certainly of my constituency, which lies within 20 to 25 minutes travelling distance of the City, was built on such industries. For that reason, I should like the extension of the Jubilee line and the crossrail link to be built to bring help to London.

I should like to make a suggestion. I do not know whether it is possible, but one of the privileges of being a Back-Bencher is to suggest things and then blame other people if they do not do them. We must have some privileges from time to time. I wonder whether we could make docklands into a freeport area. To my mind, docklands is the best construction in London since the second world war. If it took off and we got it right, it could almost pull the rest of the country with it.

One must have a sense of confidence when things are built. That confidence can permeate society. We could make docklands the Hong Kong of Europe. I do not refer to the present events in Hong Kong, and I do not suggest that Mr. Patten should be its governor, but we could make docklands a special area. I am worried about the future of docklands. It will be a depressing area of London if we do not get it going faster than at present.

Mr. Tony Banks: I come from the east end, and I am not altogether sure that I would want docklands turned into Hong Kong. I certainly would not want Chris Patten coming back to run it. Could the right hon. Gentleman put some pressure on his colleagues? He and I agree on this point. There is a good case to be made for assisted area status in London. He makes that case, too. He should put pressure on his Front-Bench colleagues. I understand that there are some differences between the Secretary of State for Employment and the President of the Board of Trade. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to join all the rest of us in London in making our case to the Government so that we can achieve the assisted area status which he and I support?

Sir Rhodes Boyson: There is no doubt in my mind that the Secretary of State and the Paymaster General are listening carefully. What is the point of asking for a delegation if one is putting one's case on the Floor of the House, where these things should be said? I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) agrees with me on this point. I always pray for his salvation. We are both Londoners. I spent my first headship in the east end and lived there for a time.

Mr. David Nicholson: On assisted area status, does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the achievements of the recent economic difficulties has been effectively to abolish the north-south divide, and that therefore the massive regional subsidies, which sadly were necessary when the recession hit the north so badly, are no longer necessary?

[Mr. David Nicholson]

Will he also reflect on the knock-on effect on neighbouring areas of designating certain areas for assisted area status? Such areas may lose investment and jobs as a result.

Sir Rhodes Boyson: My hon. Friend makes shrewd remarks. The risk of all Government intervention is that it will improve one area and make the rest worse. However, at present other areas have assisted area status and London does not, and, to reply in an east end fashion, we want some of the gravy. Otherwise, we shall lose employment. I do not want my businesses to go to East Kilbride. I am sure that it is one of the nicest places in the world—the fact that I have a Scottish wife shows my belief in Scottish blood—but my businesses should not be tempted away to the north.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I can illustrate the point about assisted area status graphically to my right hon. Friend. A firm in my constituency has recently made 350 people redundant, because it has been tempted by assisted area status money amounting to £1 million to move to Wigan. What is the point of putting that number of people out of work in one area merely to put people to work in another?

Sir Rhodes Boyson: My hon. Friend makes a similar case to mine. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and others are listening carefully, and that, later tonight or tomorrow, they will have meetings about the matter. So we are having a good debate, as we always do in the Chamber.

I do not like big government—that is why I am a member of the Conservative party. When people use their own money, they are much more likely to get it right than a Government committee which goes home and sleeps content because there is no penalty clause if its decisions are wrong.

The percentage of gross national product which goes to the Government has increased from about 39 per cent. to 45 per cent., depending which calculations one uses. I wonder whether we should set a target of reducing Government spending by 1 per cent. every two years to bring it back to its previous level. I am a great believer in targets which can be achieved. It is no good saying that we could do it in a year. But before Government spending runs away with itself, we should set a target of bringing it back in future years to 40 per cent. or 39 per cent.

My next point is a personal one. I do not like the exchange rate mechanism. It was a glorious day when we left the ERM on 16 September. I know that it is the desire of the Government to keep me happy. Obviously, I vote with them more when I am happy. One of the happiest days of my life will be when I hear a commitment that we shall never re-enter the ERM. I am quite prepared to buy a drink for every member of the Cabinet to achieve that. As that might be considered bribery, perhaps I had better take it back. As a Lancastrian from near the Yorkshire border, I would not want to be tempted too far. If that pledge is given in the reply, a great cheer will go up in the English land and unemployment will undoubtedly go down by 1·5 per cent. tomorrow.

Many people have expressed opinions on the application of value added tax to fuel. The Government have to raise money, as they are in a difficult position. I accept that there is VAT on fuel in other countries, and those people who receive social relief of one sort or another will be covered when that is upgraded. Those of us who can pay our bills easily will not be bitter about the increase, but I am concerned about the people in between. I shall describe them in Webbian terms, so that even the Labour party cannot object: they were known as the frugal poor in the 19th century. I am concerned about the people who want to pay their bills—the 1 million people who do not claim, and who were mentioned at Prime Minister's Question Time today.

One cannot meet everyone's needs, but the retirement pension should be upgraded to deal with the increase, as pensioners are at home for most of the time and need the warmth. Many pensioners will pay the full council tax and all their bills, but they have to do so out of a narrow income. I am concerned about the peope who have about £4,000 or £5,000 in the bank, and who hold the old working class belief that one should be able to afford to pay for one's own funeral and to have a decent funeral.

The pension should be upgraded next April and in the statements sent out in October. Many pensioners are in the Conservative heartlands and therefore on political grounds—because I like the Conservative party, including myself, to win elections—and for equity, an increase in the pension should be considered. Upon that matter, I shall retire for today.

5.21 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): First, I must pull up the Secretary of State for Employment on several matters. In answer to an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who asked about additional moneys for her Department, she mentioned £200 million. She did not completely answer the question, however, because no one from the Government Front Bench has told us where that £200 million will come from. It sounds to me rather like borrowing from Peter to pay Paul; if that is the Government's intention, they will find themselves in trouble with the Budget straight away when they start to deal with some of the underlying problems in this country. The Secretary of State should clarify that when she replies.

Any dip in unemployment must be welcome but—I hope that the Secretary of State will take note of this "but" —whether the figures increase or decrease depends to a large extent on the success of the Budget and on the decision about the closure of 31 pits. As some of my hon. Friends have said, 30,000 miners' jobs are at stake as well as about 70,000 jobs in industries servicing coal mining, which means that 100,000 jobs are at risk and we must therefore offer a word of caution.

I would never be reluctant to welcome any assistance to the business community, whether to large or small businesses, if it helped to create jobs. Opposition Members have a cautious welcome for measures to help businesses because we want something to happen to unemployment.

Questions should be asked about some of the slogans coming from the Government Benches. Conservative Members keep firing back the question, "What would you do?" This is not a general election; it is the policies and programme that the Government fought the election on that are at issue. Part of their programme was that there would be no increases in taxes or extension of value added tax—so two of those promises have already been broken.

The question of talking Britain down must be dealt with. We are not talking Britain down, but questioning the Government and calling them to account. That is the right of Parliament. We are questioning the Government's handling of their stewardship of the British economy. That is the issue that must be nailed in this debate.

The Budget must be judged against a background of 14 years of ups and downs and "stop-go" policies which were supposed to be coming to an end in 1979 when Lady Thatcher became Prime Minister. In 1979, the Tory party started this country down the road and it has never recovered. Where have those 14 years got Britain? We have just under 3 million unemployed, and as the basis for the figures has changed we do not know the real figure.

Since 1979, the Government have found every excuse under the sun when they have run into trouble. During the 1979 election campaign there was no world recession, but after the Conservatives had won the election they suddenly discovered one. World recession is once again their reason for breaking their promises to the electorate. We know that there is a recession. No one would deny that, but we disagree with the way in which the Government are handling it and about the measures necessary to get us out of it. That is how the Budget will be judged.

The money lenders, who finance the Government, are asking whether it is about time that the Government started to pay some money back before they are given any new borrowings. That is why the Budget will produce about £17·5 billion in taxes during the next two years to start to pay the debt off.

I have listed some of the issues that must be dealt with and for which the Government must be held to account. Despite the late conversion of the Prime Minister to the cause of manufacturing industry, between 1979 and the present we switched investment from manufacturing to the service industries, which were good for a quick return on investment; if one invests in a company such as Rolls-Royce it sometimes takes many years to get a return on the investment. As a result, we lost considerable numbers of jobs in manufacturing industry as we moved into service industries.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): Last Friday, Labour Members tabled a motion suggesting a cut of £7·5 billion in defence spending. How would that affect Rolls-Royce workers and workers in my constituency who rely on the defence industry? Is that investment in British industry?

Mr. Cunningham: Opposition Members were suggesting that some of the money for defence could be used for diversification into new technological industries. I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman talks to his colleagues and to the President of the Board of Trade and the Minister for Industry he will find that trade unions have made many representations to the Government on the subject of diversification now that the Russian threat seems to be in abeyance, so I shall not fall for that one.

To return to some of the major issues for manufacturing industry, the west midlands, which was the powerhouse of the British economy, has between 11 and 12 per cent. unemployment and some of the old industries have vanished during the past 14 years, especially the "metal-bashing" industries—as we would describe them on the shop floor—such as those which produce motor cars or steel. The Government have been reluctant to do anything to assist Rolls-Royce and Leyland DAF.

Although the Budget contains some measures to assist development and help with development costs, it contains nothing major to assist our manufacturers to develop either new projects or projects that they already are working on. Anybody who knows anything about manufacturing industry knows that a good percentage of costs, outside of wages, are incurred by development projects.

Coventry, the west midlands and the rest of the country are suffering from the "accumulative factor"—the problems that come with high unemployment. I have already said that the unemployment rate in the west midlands is about 11 per cent. Coventry has been saddled with high unemployment—in a city to which, 30 years ago, people came from all parts of the country and the world for employment and it was able to absorb them. Today the population has dropped from 350,000 to 300,000, which reveals the flow of people from the city because of lost job opportunities.

Coventry has lost 50 per cent. of its manufacturing industry. Household names in the motor industry, such as Standard Triumph, Rolls-Royce and GTP, are running down their operations and have made systematic redundancies. The Government have done nothing to help them.

Our assisted area status is under threat. We shall not know its fate until the outcome of the President of the Board of Trade's review of the mining industry is known. Again, the Government are taking money from Peter to pay Paul. That is an issue of great concern to the local people.

The Budget does nothing to address the plight of the homeless and old age pensioners, who need approximately £200 a week to live on. The right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) mentioned the 1 million frugal poor, to use the Webbian expression. Those people and old age pensioners in their twilight years deserve a certain level of income to survive and should not be subjected to means tests by the Department of Social Security. There are problems with disablement benefit for those pensioners who are disabled. These people need assistance with their fuel bills.

One-parent families and those in employment whose income does not entitle them to receive extra assistance are the people who will be affected by the extension of VAT, and they will struggle.

It is interesting to note that the Budget signals the extension of the imposition of VAT. There is no doubt about that. In the next few years, pay-as-you-earn will be phased out and VAT phased in by the Government. We have had another signal—although the Prime Minister denied it today—that assistance with mortgages is to be phased out. People should have no illusions about that.

As a result of the Budget, the urban aid programme will be cut, which will lead to the loss of 30,000 jobs throughout the country and 200 jobs in Coventry. That programme trains people and it helps community relations by helping the ethnic minorities either to start their own businesses or to apply for jobs. Such help will be hit badly in inner cities as a result of the Budget. The safer cities initiative will also be abandoned. That suggests to me that areas such as my constituency—with high unemployment among young and middle-aged people and many one-parent families—will be abandoned. They will have fewer employment prospects and the opportunity to improve their quality of life will diminish. One-parent families in inner city areas will suffer most because they will be deprived more.

I have considered the economy and how it will affect our manufacturing base. We know that the Government will be remembered for the Budget. It has nailed the lie that they are the party of low taxation and low unemployment. In reality, they represent the extension of taxation, high taxation, new taxation and high unemployment. They are the party who claim to support industry but, when it comes to demonstrating it in the Budget, they give it very little support, as witnessed recently by the great industries of Coventry and the west midlands which are being run down because they have been denied Government assistance.

5.35 pm

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): The speech by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham)—bearing in mind his constituency—understandably, and rightly, centred to some extent on manufacturing industry. There would be no difference between hon. Members on both sides of the House that that is a vital part of our economy. The criticism and implications, however, about a massive retraction in manufacturing industry almost suggest that people are living in an isolated state, locked up in a box and cut off from the rest of the world.

If one is honest about our own country, we have seen our manufacturing base get narrower over the past 100 years. That started to happen almost immediately after the industrial revolution, and it was quite natural, because other nations wanted to build things for themselves. We could not for ever be the workshop of the world.

That process of retraction has occurred in other countries. In the United States, service industries account for nearly 70 per cent. of the economy, in Germany and France they account for more than 50 per cent. and 40 per cent. respectively. In Britain, those industries account for 60 per cent. of our economy. That trend has affected the older workshops of industrialised countries, because other countries want to make their own things.

Such changes present us with massive challenges. This debate rightly has focused to a large extent on jobs. The big worry shared across the House—it should not be a party issue, but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Sir R. Boyson) said in his excellent speech, it should be bipartisan—is, how do we create the jobs? How do we help the private sector to create jobs? The challenge is that there are very few things we make in this country—or, for that matter, in any of the G7 countries—that cannot be just as well made in India, China and Vietnam, where the average wage is about $50 a month.

The challenge is how we compete with such economies, unless we are prepared to live in a box and see ourselves living in a lovely country while doing no trade. That would not be practical. How do we maintain employment? The transformation in manufacturing industry—this applies to the other G7 leading industrial countries—has meant that each country has focused on what it does best.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East will agree that our car industry has expanded recently. It was run down in the 1970s, and it is now having a renaissance. We are now building 300,000 more vehicles a year than we were five years ago, but the companies are employing 100,000 fewer people. In the United States, Motorola has doubled its business but halved its work force. There is nothing essentially British about this problem. It is worrying, but the challenge—which is better than worrying about it—is how we deal with it. We can only deal with the challenge by being the best in a smaller number of industries than we had 130 years ago. We are the best in pharmaceuticals; we are a leading country in chemicals and in aerospace. We now have massive motor car production that we did not have a few years ago. The balance of trade in television sets is now in our favour—we are exporting a great many of them. We are good at all sorts of other high-technology industries.

I can remember when, in the mid-1970s, British Steel, then a nationalised company, came before a Committee of the House to announce that it was losing £500 million a year. It was a disaster. Then it was privatised and turned around. Until the economy started turning down two years ago, British Steel was making nearly £500 million a year profit and paying about £200 million a year into the Exchequer in corporation tax—to pay for important things such as social services.

We have a great many success stories but—we must face the truth and deal with it—on a much narrower front than ever before. Now we must build on that.

This is not actually a debate about manufacturing industry; it is a debate about the Budget, so I shall return to that. I have been struck by the fact that some people rejoice in picking out negative elements. They are the sort of people who refer to traffic lights as stop lights. I refer to them as go lights. Perhaps hon. Members think that I have flipped my lid by using that expression, but it is certainly more positive. Let us concentrate, therefore, on what has been positive in this Budget.

First, the Chancellor has rightly and determinedly set about dealing with the deficit. That cannot be done without considerable pain. Certainly, some people will not like the additional payments that they will have to make over the next few years to help to get the Budget into balance again—but there is no gain without pain. Let us face that fact and try to be positive about it.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been more unfairly criticised than any Chancellor I can remember. I would only remind him that we never put up statues to critics. Walking around London, we observe that the statues are put up to the doers and the achievers. I believe that our Chancellor has achieved a great deal. He has set in train tough policies to resolve the temporary problem of the deficit.

It is childish to debate whether someone said that we had no plans to increase indirect taxation or VAT. That is so idiotic as to bring politics into disrepute. Governments are in place to deal with challenges, not to worry about trivial debating points which have no bearing on anything.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: There is nothing childish about it. The British people are being taxed to the tune of £17 billion to claw back the money that must be borrowed. Why were the British people not told that before the election? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government obviously knew it then?

Sir Michael Grylls: The hon. Gentleman is clearly more perspicacious than any Government, and can see around every corner. After Governments are elected, events happen. What are they to do then—sit on their hands and claim that they did not say in the election that they might have to put up VAT? Should they disclaim responsibility for the problem?

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): During the election campaign, the Chancellor said on "Channel 4 News':

"We will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that was a very firm statement?

Sir Michael Grylls: I do not want to be discourteous to the hon. Lady, who has made a fair point according to her lights, but she is being a little nit-picking. No one—certainly no one in the Labour party, and no economic pundit—knew how long the recession would last. What was the alternative? Would she have liked the Chancellor to tell the House that, because he had said two years ago that he had no plans to increase VAT, he would not do anything now—that he would let the deficit rise, the currency fall and inflation start again? I believe that the Chancellor did the honourable and right thing for the country: that is what he is there for——

Mr. Illsley: He should resign.

Sir Michael Grylls: That is ridiculous. He is there to serve the country and to do what is best for it. He is there to solve problems, not to throw up his hands and ignore them.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my hon. Friend recognise that even the Clinton Administration, so revered by Opposition Members, have had to revise their taxation and spending plans in the light of the current and worsening economic situation in which they find themselves?

Sir Michael Grylls: That is certainly true, but I fear that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, would quickly admonish me if I started discussing the Clinton Administration.

The strategic point that our party has always made is that we believe in indirect taxation, not direct personal taxation. That is what the Chancellor has done. Although he has had to put up some indirect taxes, for reasons that I have tried to outline, he has also managed to reduce direct personal taxation for 1 million people who really need help, and I honour him for so doing.

Mr. Heald: Does my hon. Friend agree that one circumstance that has changed since the election is the Government's commitment at the Rio conference to spend considerable amounts on improving the environment? That was not known at the time of the election, but it has to be paid for. Is it correct that, today, the hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and for Peckham (Ms Harman) both refused to say that they would remove the extended VAT? Those remarks were made in the course of media interviews.

Sir Michael Grylls: I hear what my hon. Friend says, and it is a good point—but I am being tempted now in all directions. Forced to choose between the United States and Rio, I would prefer to go to Rio, on balance.

An outstanding feature of the Budget that has not had nearly enough attention was what it did for small independent businesses. This really was a five-star Budget for owner-managed businesses, which are the lifeblood of our country, as 90 per cent. of our firms come under that heading. The Chancellor's substantial changes will be extremely helpful.

There have also been changes in the Government-backed loan guarantee scheme. When it was introduced in the 1980s, it was not a perfect scheme, but the Chancellor's changes will make it much more effective. He has raised the limit to £250,000 to bring in more medium-sized firms, and he has reduced the premium to 0·5 per cent. The old scheme offered only expensive money, and in addition there was a 2·5 per cent. premium, which will be reduced to 0·5 per cent. Obviously it will be much less expensive for firms to borrow.

It is important that we give support through such schemes to smaller or medium-sized firms. It should be understood that, as the economy begins to grow, those firms will need extra money to buy stock, to expand, to innovate and to service their customers. If the banks cannot provide the necessary moneys, smaller or medium-sized firms will not be able to respond to growth within the economy.

It is encouraging that there are positive comments about the Budget. The chief executive of Midland bank, Mr. Pearce, has said that the extra support available through the loan guarantee scheme will further help banks to support economic recovery and create jobs in industry. Midland bank has provided about £150 million to about 7,000 firms since the scheme started. There has been a similarly positive response from Mr. Wanless, the chief executive of NatWest bank. It is encouraging that the banks are reacting positively to the extension and improvement of the scheme. It is one of the most important features of the Budget.

Similarly important is the removal of capital gains tax for entrepreneurs who want to leave one business and go into another. They are locked into their businesses with 40 per cent. CGT. That meant that, if they sold up, they had only 60 per cent. of the proceeds to put into a new business.

Many people in Britain, as in America and other developed countries, enjoy building a business but do not enjoy so much the running of it. They like to create a business and build it up, and then let someone else take on the running of it. They then move on and start another business. We must not have a tax system that deters such people from taking that course. After all, they are the creators of wealth and jobs. It is extremely important that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has removed CGT for those people.

When more money is available to enable us further to reduce taxes, I hope that, within the lifetime of this Parliament, we shall see the abolition of CGT. Like most capital taxes, it distorts business decisions. In a proper free market enterprise economy there should be no place for such a tax. Let us say thank you for the progress that has been made.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment will appreciate from her experience as a Minister and as a Back Bencher that, all too often, value added tax enforcement officers adopt an overbearing attitude. That has been a real cause for complaint for millions of self-employed people and for those running small businesses. They have been chased around for trivial sums. They have made small, genuine mistakes; they have not tried to cheat the Exchequer. Those who cheat must be chased, but I am talking about those who make genuine and perhaps simple mistakes while trying to run their businesses. In other words, they have to do everything.

There is no doubt that the VAT enforcement procedures in the United Kingdom are much tougher than elsewhere. I hope that the review that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has undertaken will bring us in line with other countries. We do not necessarily want to be as loose as some, but in France, for example, business people are not chased around for trivial sums. I hope that the changes that will be made after the review has been completed will be helpful.

Another deregulatory measure is the proposal to abolish the statutory audit for small firms. There never was a real argument for it. I know, of course, that some bureaucrats approved of it. Some officials in the Inland Revenue and the Treasury liked it. It has been convenient for them, but that is not the way in which the Government should run things. We must consider what is best for the customer, which in this context means the small firm.

My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, who is on the Government Front Bench, was a distinguished Minister with responsibilities for small businesses. He did a wonderful job in that office. I think that he will recognise that the abolition of the statutory audit can do nothing but good. An accountant will often charge about £1,000 for the audit, and that money will be much better spent in obtaining consultancy advice on how a firm can be run more efficiently so that more wealth can be created.

Important also is the freezing of the uniform business rate. There is no doubt that the UBR has borne heavily on smaller firms during the downturn in the economy. We know that the reform was important, and I believe that it was right. It had to happen. However, when demand dropped, the going became extremely tough, because everything happened at the same time. The freeze will generally be welcomed. I believe that it will help about 800,000 small firms. That is a big feather in the Chancellor's cap.

This is a five-star Budget for smaller firms. It will give great relief and encouragement. The loan guarantee scheme will prepare the way for firms to prosper and grow as the economy grows, and I view it with great optimism. I hope that others will throw away their negative approach and take account of the positive features of the Budget, which will help the country enormously.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: I remind the House that between 6 pm and 8 pm there will be a limit of 10 minutes on speeches.

5.56 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Less than 24 hours after the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement I had a phone call from Cornwall. I was told that the old, the poor and the sick were calling at a drop-in centre in floods of tears as a result of what they had heard about the rise in fuel bills following the imposition of value added tax. I was told that they did not know how they would meet the extra charges. Those people are among the most vulnerable in our society. They are the people who have been most betrayed by the Budget, which breaks promise after promise that the Conservative party made when it fought the general election only a year ago.

The hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) spoke about a five-star Budget for business. I shall present another response to the Government's economic record from someone who ran a small business that had been in the family for many years. It employed many people in my constituency. I received the letter in the second post today and I opened the envelope shortly before I entered the Chamber to participate in the debate. I shall not reveal the name of the person who wrote the letter. However, she said that she wanted her concerns highlighted. Part of the letter reads:

"It has taken the receiver appointed . . . just four weeks to finish us. I have to accept the fact that the Company has gone, a lifetime's work and what have they gained? The stock half sold off, the rest going to auction . . . We had never laid off a single employee, one was retiring due to age, but I prided myself on the fact that I worked hard to keep everyone going . . . We are looking for a small shop to rent or lease."

That is for the son, who had 25 years of employment in the company. I understand from the letter that he is at risk of losing his home. That is in addition to the fact that he has lost his profession and the family firm. The letter continues:

"But of course to stock it"—

that is, the shop—

"would cost an awful lot of money and I have literally lost all mine. I realise now that I was silly to put so much into the business but I had so much confidence in the coming year being better and the future being brighter for all . . . I shall take a back seat now, it's all been too much for me. I am puting my house up for sale".

That is the reality of the background to the Budget. That is the reality for businesses as well as for individuals who have been hit by tax increases. The letter makes it clear that part of the problem is that only 11 months ago, during the general election campaign, the Conservative party talked of recovery that was in place, not one that was to come. It fooled many people, especially those in business, and, as a result, they took decisions that have led to situations of the sort that are described in the letter that I have quoted.

That is the background against which we debate the Budget—not the City's reaction, not what the pundits say, but the hard reality for ordinary men, women and families who are being asked to pay for the Government's mistakes. This is a Government who do not blush to say one thing, when they want to win an election, and do quite another when they are back in government.

It is extraordinary that, today, as in the past couple of days, Conservative Members have repeatedly justified the Chancellor's position by claiming that he did not say what we all know he said during the general election campaign. Had they apologised, the British people might have understood, but they cannot understand a Government who pretend that they did not say what the British well remember being told at the time of the general election.

There are two great tests of the Budget—how well it faces up to the needs of the British economy and the British people, and how it matches up to the easy promises of the Conservative manifesto. Despite the pledges that Conservative Members have made year after year about reducing taxation, the reality of the Budget is increased taxation—not just the extension of VAT to fuel and power, hitting worst the old, cold and poor, but the increase in national insurance, which is nothing less than an increase in the effective rate of income tax, and hits those on low incomes most and those on high incomes least.

How does the Budget stand up to the first test? The proposals have done nothing to encourage consumer confidence. They are likely to make many people worse off and to discourage precisely the spending that is needed to get us out of the recession. Many of the plans are not to be implemented for a year, but that will make precious little difference to families who are struggling now. They will simply realise that they are likely to be struggling even more next year.

Mr. Nigel Evans: As the hon. Gentleman started his speech before 6 o'clock he will have a few more minutes in which to speak than most of us in the Chamber. Will he do something for the House today that the Labour party has signally failed to do, and that is to tell the House something about the policies that his party would have introduced had it been in power?

Mr. Taylor: I shall be saying something about our policies and it will be the same as we said at the general election. We can say with some pride that we told the truth at the general election, whereas the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues did not. I shall be contrasting those positions.

Great swathes of the Conservative party manifesto in 1992 were about the priority of low taxation. It proclaimed:

"A lightly taxed economy generates more economic growth".

It also said:

"High taxes kill the goose that lays the golden eggs."

That goose was pretty well laid out before the high taxes were introduced. Goodness knows what the Conservatives who fought on that manifesto think is the position now that taxes have been increased in the Budget.

That was in 1992. In 1993, the view seems to have changed. Apparently, economic recovery is achieved through higher taxes. The Chancellor claims that a Budget that increases tax is a Budget for recovery.

In some parts of the country the position is even worse. Already, in Cornwall, consumers pay electricity bills 8 per cent. above the national average and rising at a faster rate than the national average. That situation will be worsened by plans for regional discrimination in electricity charges, with consumers living further from generating stations paying more. As if that were not enough, there will now be the added blow of VAT, making the price differential even greater.

Every time that I write to Ministers about regional pricing policy for electricity and gas, they refuse to meet me and local business representatives, saying that it is not their responsibility because the electricity and gas industries have been privatised. But who privatised the industries? It was none other than the Conservative Government and Conservative Members. Who approved the regulations that led to the price increases? It was none other than the Conservative Government and Conservative Members. The Conservatives were happy to promise that privatisation would be in the consumers' interest, but they wash their hands of the matter when it turns out to mean higher bills.

The Government cannot wash their hands of the VAT plans. They will not be allowed to, certainly not by people in my area, the poorest county in the country, who are backing the Liberal Democrats' Fair Deal campaign which is campaigning for fair water and electricity prices for Cornwall, let alone cuts in the national average.

It is not as if VAT on fuel and power would do much to help the environment—the great justification that we heard from the Chancellor. He is putting VAT not on pollution, but on all energy. It does not matter whether it is from a coal-fired power station or from one of the wind farms in Cornwall. Nor is the tax imposed on the fuel that an individual consumes; otherwise there would not be the VAT imposition on the standing charge. There is no way that that can be sending a message to cut back on the use of polluting energy sources.

The west country has also seen huge increases in water charges, way above the national average, so that 3 per cent. of the national population has to pay for one third of the country's coastal clean-up programme. That is nothing other than a tax. It happens to be a selective tax, imposed on some of the poorest people in the country, to clear up a national asset. Without privatisation, that would more clearly have been a tax. It is another way in which the Government's policies are imposing a greater burden on those whom I represent.

Throughout the general election campaign, I and fellow Liberal Democrats were attacked by Conservatives for our plans to increase petrol prices. Conservative leaflets and Conservative canvassers frightened voters by saying that Liberal Democrats planned huge rises in petrol prices. They did not mention that we planned to phase the increases or that we proposed compensation for people in rural areas and extra investment in public transport. Those were our policies on which we were proud to fight. We told the truth about what they would cost and we explained our reasons and how we would help people with the burdens.

Meanwhile, Conservatives campaigned against the increases that they are now introducing in their Budget only 11 months later, and they offer no help to rural areas and no investment in public transport in rural areas. It is all take and no give with this Conservative Budget. Most significantly, at no point in the last election did any Conservatives mention that they would increase petrol prices by more than we proposed in our manifesto.

We also campaigned honestly on mortgage interest tax relief. We said that it needed reform in order to give more help to first-time buyers and people who are renting in the private sector, and less to those who already have a lot and are simply looking to move up the market, buying ever-larger houses with help from the taxpayer in the process.

Again, Liberal Democrat plans for reform were attacked by the Conservatives at the election. But now, rather than reform the system, they just cut mortgage interest tax relief from 25 to 20 per cent. So much for encouraging growth in the housing market. So much for the Conservative party arguing that Liberal Democrats would hit mortgage payers, when the truth was that only 11 months later it was the Conservative party which would introduce a cut in mortgage interest tax relief.

One year after the Conservative election victory, we are confronted with the betrayal of their promises on taxes on income, on increases in VAT, on petrol prices and on mortgage interest tax relief. What hypocrisy. What deceit of voters who must be left wondering who they can trust. I am sure that in the county elections in May and in the

[Mr. Taylor]

Newbury by-election it will be clear that the last party that voters are prepared to trust ever again is the Conservative party.

6.10 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to make a short contribution, particularly on a day when we have learnt that unemployment in my constituency of Aylesbury has fallen by nearly 3·5 per cent. That is very welcome news because, although in my constituency the rate of unemployment is below the regional and the national average, it is higher than the rate to which local people have been accustomed in recent years. If I agree with nothing else in the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), I agree with his analysis of what to be unemployed means for the individuals and families directly affected.

I welcome the measures in the Budget because I believe that they provide the right framework for the creation of permanent jobs and sustained economic growth. I particulary welcome the employment package that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State dwelt on in her speech today. Representing a constituency which relies on small and medium-sized employers, I give as warm a welcome as did my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) to the measures on the value added tax threshold, capital transfer tax relief, the way in which Customs and Excise deal with VAT defaults and the other measures aimed at supporting and assisting small business to get on with generating wealth and creating new jobs.

I believe, though, that to bring unemployment down to what any hon. Member would regard as anything like an acceptable level will not be an easy task which can be quickly accomplished. That is partly for reasons which my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West spelt out. We are seeing a shift in the international patterns of industry and trade. Within this country and the rest of the industrialised world, technological advance will mean a demand for different sorts of skills. Large companies, in particular, are approaching their business in a different way, contracting out many of the functions that they once carried out in-house.

None of these long-term and, I believe, irresistible changes in the international economy can be ignored. I was therefore very glad to see that my right hon. Friend's employment package gave considerable weight to the idea of training and retraining people who have become unemployed. Only if we have a skilled, flexible and adaptable work force shall we be able to help people into more permanent employment.

I found the vision of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras so out of date when he talked in that rather moving, grandfatherly fashion about the ambition of a young boy to become an engine driver, or a doctor. In my case it was a zoo keeper initially, and some people might say that I was on the verge of achieving my ambition.

The truth is surely that in an economy, both global and national, which will be subject to rapid and frequent change we have to say honestly to people that they must expect to have to change not just jobs but career paths at different times in their lives, and that for some people the pattern of the future may be not to have one job from 9 am to 5 pm five days a week, but to have perhaps a portfolio of two or three part-time jobs. We must therefore adjust our social policies and our policies regarding tax and benefits accordingly.

I support the words of some of my right hon. and hon. Friends earlier in the debate, in particular the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) earlier this week, when he said that we would have to keep the unemployment figures announced this week under review to see whether they should be extended to greater numbers of the unemployed in the future. As I have said, I do not believe that this problem of unemployment is capable of quick or easy solution, and I believe that that is the realistic view of most of the British public, too.

Referring briefly to a constituency interest, I warmly endorse the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) about the crossrail project. I, too, feel that I can give two cheers at the Government's announcement, but I wish that a firmer commitment had been given. I believe that Aylesbury's recovery from the recession is under way, although it is fragile, but every analysis carried out by local authorities in the area or by the local business community points to the urgent need for improved transport communications as a condition for getting that recovery fully under way and enabling my constituency to compete with other industrial towns in the south-east, such as Wycombe, Banbury and Reading.

Crossrail will not benefit my constituents alone; it is an important connection between the channel tunnel link running into Stratford and the rest of the railway network. Now that the Government have decided that private sector money should be involved, I hope that they are prepared to be more ambitious even than under present plans. Let us look at extending the new electrified high speed line beyond Aylesbury to Milton Keynes, and perhaps to Birmingham and further north. That would be a project of which the country and the Government could be proud and which would not only provide many jobs for people who now lack them but contribute in the medium term to the greater prosperity of the country.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor had a difficult balancing act to carry out this year. The initial reaction to the Budget that I have been picking up from businesses in my community is that he has struck the right balance and taken the necessary action to correct Government over-borrowing while at the same time, through micro-economic measures, ensuring that the incipient economic recovery is not just allowed to continue but is sustained and encouraged.

For those reasons, I shall be glad to give the Budget my support in the Lobby.

6.17 pm

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): The two sounds that were heard most clearly on Tuesday when the Chancellor was making his statement were the sound of hon. Members dozing off in all parts of the House and the sound of chickens the size of jumbo jets coming home to roost.

When I heard the Chancellor, or somebody sounding very much like him, on the "Today" programme yesterday morning saying again—and I am assuming that he was reading—that the Conservative party is the party of sound finance and balanced books, I could barely credit my ears. Towards the end of the interview, when asked whether he was doing the best he could for the British people by being Chancellor of the Exchequer, he said that that was his duty: to serve his country. Then we came here yesterday and heard the Chief Secretary speak at one stage about the duty of responsible government. Obviously, the Government disinformation machine theme for the day was duty. When I reflected upon that, I thought of something that Bernard Shaw once said: when a stupid man is doing something of which he is ashamed, he proclaims it to be his duty.

We have had for the past 15 years an unabashed, unalloyed spate of irresponsible government. We have had an economic miracle, we are told. I will not go over the ground covered by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) concerning North sea oil, because it would pain Conservative Members too much, and the truth has a limited effect upon them; they cannot quite see it.

The waste of over £100 billion in North sea oil revenues pales into insignificance beside their real failure. They really are economic idiots of quite supreme proportions. That is evident from what they have done with the proceeds of privatisation. I am not arguing about the rights and wrongs of privatisation, but I must stress to the imbeciles on the Government Benches that every organisation, large or small, public or private, will inspect its capital portfolio to ensure that it is working to the benefit of the organisation.

Mr. Lidington: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is the word the hon. Gentleman used in his last sentence parliamentary?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): It is not out of order, but I would advise the hon. Gentleman that it would be wise not to use such words in the Chamber.

Mr. Dowd: I certainly accept your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I reassure you that it is a word much used in south London, particularly when talking about the Government, but none the less I apologise.

The Government's most elementary mistake was to use the proceeds of capital sales to fund revenue. Everyone knows that that is the path to bankruptcy. The figures now emerging on Government borrowing show what is happening. Today's papers show that the Chancellor has not even covered his current spending commitments with the tax raising that he announced yesterday. It is the first time in British history that our affairs have been so chronically mismanaged.

A local authority would be prevented from attempting such a strategy, and a commercial organisation would be prosecuted for attempting to trade while insolvent. That is the strength of the Government's addiction, like junkies, to selling off public assets and using the money to fund revenue.

Last month's PSBR was the second worst monthly figure in history. It was managed only by the proceeds of privatisation. Again the Government were selling off capital to fund revenue—the economics of idiocy. Now that they have to face the consequences, they are looking for any possible opportunity to sell off their remaining BT shareholding, and even the national picture collection is under threat.

What happened to the marvellous vision of the Lawson years when we had PSDR—public sector debt repayment? We had got into a virtuous cycle in which the Government could do no wrong because, as they understand it, they had transformed economic law. However, the way in which they understood was not how the rest of the world understood it. They were deciding how much of the public debt they were going to repay each year, and they thought that they had structured the finances and affairs of the nation so well that it would go on indefinitely.

I remember some of the financial journalists, who are the alleged experts on these matters, writing articles saying that the Government's choice for the 1990s was how they would dispense all that largesse and what they would do with the phenomenal surplus that had been achieved. But it was all an illusion. The Conservative party did not know the difference between a vision and a mirage, but pursued it nonetheless.

Let us look at the Government's recent experience. We are now told repeatedly about lower interest rates and the competitive exchange rate. Although the pound goes up and down week by week, the exchange rate is declining. If lower interest rates and a competitive exchange rate are such marvellous attributes of the British economy, why did the Chancellor and Prime Minister spend billions of pounds of public money and a great deal of time and effort attempting to prevent them from happening? They did not have a clue what economic policy they were following then, and the same is true now.

What is the Prime Minister's response? He says that we are talking Britain down. That ludicrous notion is an example of the Government blaming the messenger because they do not like the message. The Prime Minister must understand that an inane grin and a puerile cliché cut no ice with people who have been hurt by the impact of the recession. Although he and his toadying colleagues on the Back Benches may readily parrot such claptrap, it cuts no ice and although they may have a capacity for self-defence that knows no bounds, it is not shared by the British public, who know exactly who to blame.

The central theme missing from the Budget is unemployment. I speak on a day when, for the first time, unemployment in my constituency has risen to more than 7,000—and ours is by no means the most deprived part of south London, or of London in general. Some 17·5 per cent. of all the economically active adults in my constituency are unemployed.

I received a letter from a woman in Catford saying:

> "This letter is about a problem shared by thousands of parents. Our eldest daughter is coming to the end of her three-year degree course in geography. Despite numerous applications, she has no hope yet of any kind of employment."

My constituent wrote that her daughter applies for jobs but she has no experience, and because she has no experience she cannot get a job, so she cannot break the vicious circle. The only thing that has been recommended to her is a postgraduate course entirely at her parents' expense, but that is totally beyond them, as they have three younger daughters to provide for. The situation is depressing and upsetting the family.

I wrote back to my constituent, and I wrote to the Secretary of State for Employment, enclosing a copy of the letter and saying:

[Mr. Dowd]

"I would be most interested in your response, and any suggestions you may have to assist Mrs. Scutt's daughter to make the best use of the expensive education which she has acquired."

I received an answer from Viscount Ullswater. I do not know who the superannuated peers are who do correspondence for Secretaries of State, but I suppose that it keeps them off the streets. However, if I had wanted to write to Viscount Ullswater, I would have written to him and not to the Secretary of State. The reply stated:

"Viscount Ullswater has asked me to thank you for the letter to Mrs. Shephard enclosing correspondence. As the matters raised fall within the responsibility of the Employment Service, which is an agency, I have passed on your letter to the Chief Executive."

The Secretary of State had no idea how to respond, and could not care less. The response to my letter represented a total abdication of political responsibility, for which the Government have shown such scant regard recently.

Unemployment is not simply cutting people off, as my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras said. It not only undermines people's ideas of their self-worth; it is also the most important part of the engine of wealth distribution in Britain.

I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion. Although I am sure that Conservative Members would like me to go on all evening, I shall resist the temptation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Peter Ainsworth.

6.27 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): This is an encouraging day for jobs. It is a good Budget for jobs and it is good for the economy as a whole. I fear that it is a bad day for the Opposition, who have yet to produce one positive idea about what they would have done if confronted with the problem that faced my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer as he was preparing his Budget.

The key problem was clear and substantial—how to recognise the twin imperatives which in economic terms confront Britain's economy at the end of this most difficult recession. Those imperatives are the need to foster recovery and economic growth and the need to address the budget deficit, which in the medium to longer term represents a major threat to economic stability and to confidence in Britain at home and in the international markets.

I am convinced that my right hon. Friend has reached the right solution. He has, in effect, given precedence to growth. The onus of the tax increases announced by my right hon. Friend will fall substantially in 1994-95 and beyond, at a time when all leading economists, including those in the European Commission, are expecting a more vigorous growth trend to be established. The impact of the tax increases will then be more easily absorbed.

Some, including my predecessor in Surrey, East, my noble Friend Lord Howe, have argued that more immediate action to reduce the deficit was required, both in terms of increasing taxation and reducing public expenditure. I shared that view, which was put forward earlier in the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor). Having had time to study my right hon. Friend's Budget, however, I have reconsidered the point.

The prime objective for this Government, as for any Government, must be economic growth. Economic growth underpins the ability to pay for our public services, such as schools and hospitals; it enables businesses to invest and prosper; it stimulates new jobs and underpins the ability of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to introduce the package of measures which form part of the Budget.

It is not taxation which does those things. Taxation merely redistributes money which other people earn. It may be argued, however, that the ability to tax is dependent on economic growth, so my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is right to adopt a neutral fiscal stance for the coming year and to build on the series of measures in his autumn statement aimed at fostering the economic recovery which is taking place even now, as recent evidence from industry and the retail sector illustrates.

Although there is mounting evidence of a more prosperous economic climate, to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment referred in her speech, imposing a significantly heavier tax burden in the coming year could have stifled recovery and been profoundly counter-productive. My hon. Friend the Chancellor has performed a finely poised balancing act and has built in additional flexibility and room for manoeuvre if circumstances turn out, as they have a habit of doing, to be different from those expected.

On that point, provided that a firm grip is kept on public sector spending, my right hon. Friend and his advisers in the Treasury may be under-estimating the extent of the recovery in the medium term, and may be erring on the side of caution in respect of the public sector borrowing requirement deficit in future years. Let us hope so, for at 5·5 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1995-96 the forecast PSBR burden is still daunting. Indeed, looking over the next four years, the total PSBR is forecast to be £86 billion higher than the total projected last year for the same period. Therefore, let no one underestimate the difficulties that we face.

As I have said, however, I believe that that forecast may be unduly pessimistic. First, it is conceivable that growth will exceed expectations. For example, the growth forecast for 1992, made by my right hon. Friend as late as his autumn statement, has already proved to be 0·5 per cent. too gloomy. Secondly, we have every reason to be confident that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, in his review of public spending, will not baulk at taking the difficult decisions which circumstances demand. That will be vital to underpin the restoration of a sound and balanced economy.

On a specific point, I give an especial welcome to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's proposals to reform advance corporation tax. I detected the fluttering of eyelids as my right hon. Friend moved into that part of his speech on Tuesday; none the less, his proposals represent a significant and welcome reform. The present system, which has caused British-based firms with substantial overseas earnings frequently to end up with an ACT bill on their dividends greater than their entire United Kingdom corporation tax liability, has caused justified resentment for some years. More importantly, it has had the effect of exporting important areas of activity, such as research and development, and with them jobs.

I know of a number of international companies with head offices in Britain which were seriously, albeit reluctantly, considering relocating elsewhere, especially within the European Community, because of problems with ACT. The measures announced by my right hon. Friend will enable them to stay. That will be as much a relief to them as it will be to all who care about retaining employment in this country and in particular about bolstering London as one of the world's great financial centres.

The eventual 5 per cent. reduction in the rate of ACT payable on dividends is also welcome. It represents a redistribution of moneys from gross investment funds into corporate management, which will provide a significant cash flow advantage to business of around £1 billion next year. I hope that business managers whose companies will benefit will resist all temptations, as well as pressures, simply to use the extra moneys to top up their dividend payments. United Kingdom dividend yields are already substantially in excess of those in other developed countries, notably Germany and Japan.

The provisions on ACT, and the extra boost to help export markets, which are welcome and important, will benefit principally large firms. I am glad that my right hon. Friend continues to recognise the vital importance of small firms in generating economic activity and jobs. Small firms have been among the hardest hit during the recession, although there are many more in business than there were only a few years ago, but it will be small firms which will be in the front line of economic recovery. As my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) has said, this is a five-star Budget for small businesses.

My right hon. Friend's finely judged and thoughtful Budget will help foster recovery in the year ahead and beyond. In the medium term, his tax proposals will blend with economic recovery to deliver a sure underpinning to prosperity. I welcome the Budget.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): I want to spend a few minutes on budgetary reform, an important but arcane subject which does not interest many hon. Members. Anyone who goes on about it tends to be thought a crank, so I shall be brief on the subject.

I am pleased that this is the last of the March, traditional, taxation-only Budgets and that in future taxation and public spending measures will be presented together in December. The integrated Budget is a reform which I and others have advocated for many years—not that it will be all that it is cracked up to be. The estimates for Government spending will still be presented in March, so we shall not be able to link the spending of individual Departments with the taxation proposals required to fund that spending.

In addition, while taxation is presented through a Finance Bill, which will be examined for weeks in Committee, changes in social security and other benefits will be introduced through statutory instruments, which are hardly discussed at all and are unalterable. Minor taxation is discussed at length, but the huge sums involved in social security expenditure and the massive changes in entitlement to benefit are often debated for only an hour and a half or less, and nothing can be done about them.

We also have the problem of a flood of financial and statistical data—one cannot call it information—from Departments and agencies. All that is presented on bases that cannot be compared. There is no indication of the supposed result of spending. So, as I have said before in the House, we are continually told what we are spending, but we are not told what we are buying. In other words, the Government tell us what the inputs are, in terms of funding and programmes, but not what the outputs are, so we can never establish the effectiveness of Government spending. That is a great weakness of our system.

Spending programmes are not related in any way to targeting improvements in health, environmental protection, crime and all the rest. That is not surprising, because the Government do not expect improvements. All the same, we are entitled to better information. Spending is not considered adequately, even on the Floor of the House. Very few Select Committees examine it; to do so they would need much larger staffs. Much reform is needed in the examination of Government accounts and the results of spending programmes. Although the subject interests very few people, it is of great importance.

We have heard that this was a Budget for jobs. In the Norwich travel-to-work area, there are 14,700 unemployed. In the area covered by Norwich city council, there are 8,500 unemployed. In my constituency, the unemployment total is up from 3,300 in 1990 to 5,600. That is a record for what was a prosperous area a few years ago. As my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said, this "Budget for jobs" provides only £125 million in new money that can be used to put people back to work. It amounts to less than £1 a week for each person who is out of work. Only one in 10 of the long-term unemployed and only one in 30 of all unemployed will be helped by the Budget proposals on business start-ups, learning for work and the community action programme.

That has to be set against the huge cut in vocational training places since the Chancellor of the Exchequer took office. The fact is that there are 80,000 fewer vocational training places than when the Chancellor came to office. There has been a 14 per cent. cut in Government spending on training from 1990-91 to the present financial year, while unemployment has risen by 87 per cent.

In 1989-90, employment training had 430,000 trainee starts. Last year that number was down to 210,000. It has been more than halved. Spending on employment training and employment action—a scheme which is apparently designed to augment employment training—has fallen from £1·2 billion in 1990-91 to £883 million. The new training for work scheme, which is supposed to roll these two programmes together, involves an even lower level of spending. It has gone down by £87 million on last year's £883 million.

A recession, as we have all learnt since the 1930s and before, is the time to invest in training. We suffer from a massive lack of skills compared with our competitors, a point which is easily verifiable. This is a huge missed opportunity. Look at the difficulty that a mature entrant to, say, a college has in obtaining funding—which is almost invariably discretionary and which, in my case, is from the shire county—for vocational skills training. It is almost impossible to obtain funding for both maintenance and tuition.

We have heard about recovery from the recession. We know that there is a time lag between recovery from a recession—which I assume is shown by an increase in output for three quarters in succession—and a fall in unemployment. I am a member of the Treasury Select Committee. For the last two years at least, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has come before that Committee and said in public that there were green shoots of recovery, that recovery was round the corner and that the conditions for recovery were in place. But there is little evidence of it. Next year, according to the Red Book, growth in gross domestic product is forecast to be 1·25 per cent., which is so low that a further increase in unemployment is inevitable. Unemployment is forecast to increase by 200,000.

Investment in either the private or the public sector will barely increase. The forecast for the public sector borrowing requirement, two years on, is £30 billion, even after a £10 billion increase in taxation. In 1992, the trade deficit was £12 billion, and the forecast is that it will be £18·5 billion in 1994. That adds up to a description of an economy that is in a desperate situation. We know from the leaked but now stifled Department of Trade and Industry report on Britain's trading position that we have a long-standing crisis in investment in skills and in research. Even when recovery comes, unemployment will still be over 3 million, even on the cooked figures that we have been given.

The infrastructure is collapsing. We only have to look around London, eastern England and the south-east to see that. Housing is in a desperate state. I represent a city which was the best housed city in the country. The Chancellor did nothing to ease the housing problem. Norwich has over £30 million locked up in receipts from the sale of council houses which it could put to use tomorrow to build more council houses.

House building is a classic way in which to begin to get out of a recession. It puts people back to work. The skills are available. There is a very low import content. It works quickly; it gets people earning quickly instead of drawing the dole.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer appears to be a late convert to the views of Keynes, for he announced some large public works projects, but two out of three of those projects depend on unnamed private participants. Furthermore, all those projects are in the south-east of England, so the impact on the rest of the country will be very slight.

As for the social impact, the Budget hits the poorest hardest, particularly those just above benefit level. Even if the Government compensate those on benefit, those just above that level will have no prospect of an increase in their income to cover the announced tax and VAT increases. The £6·5 billion tax increase in 1994-95 and the £10·5 billion tax increase in 1995-96 represent the biggest tax increase ever dropped on this country by a party whose constant pledge and whose one claim has been to reduce taxation. The Budget does not meet the needs of the time. It is the product of a fundamentally dishonest Government.

6.45 pm

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): This is my first speech on economic policy since I was elected in 1987, so the House will understand if I refer occasionally to some of the tendencies that have led to the present situation. The Budget and our debates upon it show the very great problems and costs—I emphasise costs—which flow from economic stagnation and recession.

I welcome the signs that this country may at long last be moving out of recession—before and ahead of European countries which are deep in recession, as I reminded the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) yesterday.

I welcome the fall in unemployment announced today. I welcome the measures announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister today relating to value added tax. I also welcome the measures announced today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and her explanation to me earlier in the debate of their piloting and explorative scope. They are in addition to the very large measures which have already been taken to increase training.

I note that no Liberal Democrat Member is in the Chamber at present, but the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), who is normally a vigorous critic, is reported in The Western Morning News, which is always accurate, as describing those employment measures as being "quite clever."

Much use has been made of the Chancellor's remark some time ago about unemployment being a price worth paying. I believe that, on reflection, my right hon. Friend probably regrets having made that remark. I do not believe that it has helped him in coping with the recent slings and arrows of political fortune. However, I believe that the view of the vast number of Conservative supporters and activists in the constituencies and of the vast majority of my hon. Friends—indeed, the common-sense view—is that high unemployment is morally offensive, socially damaging—although it can never excuse crime—and, most relevant for our Budget debates, financially very expensive indeed.

Having said that, I welcome the skill that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has shown in his various Budgets since he became Chancellor and also his autumn statement last year. I welcome the measures which, albeit cautiously, will assist British industry and commerce to move towards recovery—in particular the measures relating to export credits and the uniform business rate. I welcome also the measures—these are particularly relevant to my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General—relating to VAT penalties, and the small firms package which my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) described as a five-star package. I welcome, too, the expansion—again cautious—of the 20 per cent. income tax band.

There are two lessons to be learnt from the recent management of the economy, both of which need to be considered not just by Ministers but by Treasury mandarins, economic advisers and forecasters and the whole financial establishment.

First, there was the rapid credit boom of 1987 to 1989, which I criticised in the House and in my constituency and which I believe is now seen as having been a source of grave economic weakness. In view of the consequences of that boom and, indeed, of what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is doing in relation to mortgage interest relief, I do not think that there is a danger of a return to the sort of property market which distorts investment. The distorting of economic development by diverting investment resources into property has been a feature and a weakness of this country since the early 1970s.

The second weakness was the continuation—in my view, long beyond the need to cure the previous credit boom—of the policy of high interest and exchange rates. As I pointed out to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) during a very interesting speech that he was delivering last Friday, that was not simply a reflection of the exchange rate mechanism—we can argue about the principle of the ERM—but resulted from the level at which we went in to the system and the level that we sustained. British industry has been damaged by high exchange rate policies on at least four occasions this century. It is relevant to point out that those policies were pursued in the past not just as a method of political and economic management but also almost as a religious and moral crusade. That happened under Governments of both parties. It happened in the period 1979-82, under a Conservative Chancellor, as it had happened under Lord Callaghan, a Labour Chancellor in the 1960s. The classic period, of course, was that of the man who was to become our greatest Prime Minister but who, as Chancellor, was very variable indeed. I refer, of course, to Winston Churchill, who was supported by Philip Snowden between 1925 and 1931.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) pointed out in a powerful speech yesterday, the prospects with regard to Government borrowing are worrying. That ought to underline, above all, the need in present circumstances to maximise growth and to avoid, remove or change policies damaging to industry, enterprise and jobs. This is so whether the policies concern exchange rates or interest rates, to which I have already referred, and which, happily, have now been removed, or whether they concern regulation, be it from Brussels, Whitehall or local government. Such policies have undoubtedly weakened small businesses and cost jobs. These are matters to which we must apply ourselves.

The Department of Trade and Industry must also take a more active role in enabling industry and enterprise to take advantage of the export and import substitution opportunities created by last September's devaluation of sterling. Situations have been pointed out to me, in my own constituency and elsewhere, in which business depends on imports of semi-manufactured goods because this country does not have the production facilities or the quality to provide certain important materials. That is a weakness in our economy, and it is vitally important that it be tackled. We are running a massive and worrying trade deficit in the middle of a recession, and it is vital that our industry and commerce be enabled to address those weaknesses.

It is the view of some of my hon. Friends and of The Sun newspaper that the borrowing to which I referred earlier could be reduced by repeated cuts in the budgets of Ministers, as though expenditure on ministerial cars, red boxes and paper clips accounted for the main part of the problem. As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I can confirm that there are opportunities to remove waste and inefficiency and that there is fraud in the social security field. However, the notion that we could resolve our borrowing and spending problems by being beastly to new age travellers—although that is very desirable—is extremely naive. There is a limit to the amount of fat that can be removed from public spending. One soon gets to the red meat and bone of valuable spending programmes, which are not only used by readers of The Sun but are also used and valued by their children and their grannies.

With regard to those expectations, we have to be cautious. I will give an example. In recent months, combating crime has become a very serious issue, not only in the inner cities but also in parts of rural and semi-rural England, such as my constituency and the rest of Somerset. That problem will not be solved on the cheap. We need more police in the inner cities and in rural areas.

My final point concerns the most controversial issue in the Budget—the proposal to extend VAT. This can be justified as a special environmental measure, although we may debate the details. I welcome what the Prime Minister said at Question Time today. We must also bear down on the charges of the electricity and gas industries, whose current profit levels indicate that that ought to be possible. However, I warn my right hon. Friends not to regard the hoped-for acceptance by the House of this special VAT extension to fuel and power as a bridgehead for extension into other zero-rated areas. I do not perceive acceptance of the idea of multi-rate VAT in Government circles. I might consider the idea of a 5 per cent. VAT rate, but I warn that a further extension would be resisted by me and by other hon. Members.

6.55 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) The last time inflation was at its current level was in 1967. We had a Labour Government, the economy was growing at a rate of 2·2 per cent., we had a manufacturing trade surplus, and the number of people unemployed was less than 350,000.

Mr. Dobson: Those were the days.

Mrs. Campbell: Indeed, those were the days.

This is a Budget of missed opportunities—a missed opportunity to put Britain back on the road to prosperity and growth; a missed opportunity to put British people back to work; and a missed opportunity to correct some of the unfairness of the last 14 years and give back to those on lower incomes what previous Chancellors took away. In fact, the Chancellor has made life worse for those on low incomes and pensions, and the unfairness will continue and worsen.

I welcome the dip in the unemployment figures. I sincerely hope that it is a long-term trend and not a short-term spurt of hope. However, my constituency has record unemployment. More than 4,000 people are unemployed for the first time, and male unemployment stands at over 15 per cent. But the Chancellor has not done anything that will help. What he has done for some small businesses amounts to no more than tinkering. These measures will not help capital investment; they will not help to improve skills and technical expertise; and they will certainly not help the transfer of technology from academia to industry which is absolutely vital to the future prosperity of our country.

In yesterday's Financial Times the director-general of the Engineering Employers' Federation complained of the "apparent lack of understanding of the role of capital allowances in stimulating investment."

Last week, I had the great privilege of going to Germany with the Select Committee on Science and Technology to look at the way in which the German Government help industry there. We saw a whole raft of measures. For instance, the Max Plank institutes are engaged in first-class, high-powered technical innovation and world-class research. We saw the work of Fraumhofer institutes which take the ideas that come from the Max Plank institutes and the universities and turn them into research in technological innovation and engineering skills. We saw also the work of the Steinbeiss foundation, which takes ideas and problems from industry and helps to solve the problems. These institutions do not exist without Government help. In fact, they receive a great deal of Government help—assistance which is totally lacking in the British economy. The Chancellor has tried to cure toothache when the patient is suffering from cancer. I say that in all seriousness because I believe that the problems facing our economy could be terminal.

In East Anglia, 87,000 people are unemployed. When the Prime Minister loses his job and moves back to Huntingdon, he will have to compete with 28 other people for every job vacancy. If he moves to King's Lynn, he will compete with 322; in Cromer he will compete with 246, and in Great Yarmouth with 149.

In the face of overwhelming evidence of manufacturing decline, what action does the Chancellor take? Well, he allows people to assess their own tax; he makes minor modifications to the small firms loan guarantee scheme

Mr. Heald: I am sorry to interrupt because I know that time is short. As unemployment in Huntingdon has fallen in the past few months, and as the Prime Minister will be in his job for many years to come, does the hon. Lady agree that her calculation might not be correct?

Mrs. Campbell: I am sure that the Prime Minister would not anticipate a second period of unemployment but, judging by what he said last May, he did not anticipate that the Government would have to increase VAT, so it would be difficult——

Mr. Garrett: We cannot rely on his judgment.

Mrs. Campbell: As my hon. Friend says from a sedentary position, we cannot rely on his judgment.

Are these the measures which will transform the British economy? I think not, because they are a gross underestimation of what our real problems are and what the solutions should be.

I deal now with broken promises, the increase in the cost of heating fuel, the imposition of value added tax and the way it will affect pensioners in my constituency. I have good reason to believe that the Budget will mean a choice between heating and eating for many pensioners in my constituency. Last March, I was privileged to visit many pensioners in their own homes. I clearly remember one pensioner in particular. He was in his early seventies and lived alone. I stayed in his house for about half an hour and he told me of the difficulties he was experiencing. He said that he was no longer able to run a small car to get around. He had stopped buying meat every day and bought it only twice a week. When I stood up to leave, I realised that I was very cold because his heating had been so low that it was not comfortable to sit there for any length of time. Many pensioners are in that position, and the Budget will make things even worse. Many will die of cold or starvation—what a terrible choice to have to make.

We have heard some facile comments from Conservative Members who tried to justify the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel by saying it is a green measure which will reduce carbon dioxide emissions into the atmosphere. I do not believe that because people whose heating is determined by cost already have their heating so low that it is not practicable or feasible to turn it down further.

If we really want to take effective green measures, we need to insulate homes. Why did the Chancellor not move in that direction? Why did he not encourage investment to stimulate the building and construction industries and get people to insulate their homes? Such measures would pay for themselves through genuine reductions in heating costs. My constituents will be extremely dismayed by the lack of such measures. We face the prospect of heating bills increasing steadily in the next two years and people being unable to pay them.

The rise in petrol duty has also been heralded as a green tax. In my part of the world it will be seen not as a green tax but merely as a revenue-raising tax. I and my family have been fortunate enough to be able to manage without a car for the past five years. We have done so by using bicycles, our feet and public transport, but many people in my part of the world do not have a choice because transport is not available. People need transport to get to work every day and, for many, the only option is to use a car. Therefore, the measure will not be effective in reducing CO_2 emissions but it will be effective in raising revenues because people have no choice.

The Budget is a disaster. It does nothing to deal with the underlying problems of the economy; it will make people on lower incomes even poorer; and it will do nothing to put the unemployed back to work or to improve the economy.

7.5 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan-Smith (Chingford): I am pleased to have the opportunity to follow, at some point, the excellent speech by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. She outlined all the relevant facts, and I shall not repeat them. It is a measure of the importance that the Government place on matters within their brief, such as employment, that the skills and talents of my right hon. Friend and her team have been deployed in this instance.

The Chancellor spoke of jobs coming from the private sector, which is an aspect on which I shall concentrate. I listened with great care and interest to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and other hon. Members, and I was amazed by their lack of understanding of how employment is created. Before I came to the House, I used to run a company and was involved in manufacturing industry. It is perhaps relevant to describe to some hon. Members how jobs are created.

Jobs are created as a result of successful enterprise. I know of no business that has been set up solely to create jobs. Businesses are established as the result of an idea or the perception of a gap in the market. People provide goods and services, and jobs flow as a consequence. To listen to Labour Members, one would think that it was the other way round, that the jobs existed and someone looked for something to fill people's time. It is the ideas, drive, perseverance and determination of individuals which create jobs and get the economy going.

I remind the House that, during the 1980s, about 1 million new jobs were created on the basic principle of enterprise and filling a gap in the market. The Opposition still labour under the old idea, which I thought had died in the 1960s and 1970s, that the Government create jobs, that they can then pick winners from industry and decide who is to succeed at home and abroad. That idea failed, and it is time the Opposition realised it.

Throughout the 1980s, the Department of Employment focused consistently on training, retraining and re-skilling. It is important that the Budget placed great emphasis on such issues. The Budget was announced against a backdrop of about £2·5 billion spent on training, which is about two and a half times as much as was spent in 1979.

I was especially pleased by three aspects of the Budget, which I shall highlight. First, I was pleased by the emphasis on training, vocational education and enterprise which will supplement other measures that we have introduced and which should result in about 100,000 more unemployed people being helped.

Secondly, I was pleased to learn that a community action programme is to be established, which will provide for 60,000 long-term unemployed people to take on voluntary projects. A new project will be set up for 30,000 people, who have been unemployed for six months or more, to be taught new skills. Those two measures are important and should be applauded.

Thirdly, I welcome the fact that the business start-up scheme is to be expanded.

VAT is a subject of particular concern, and in Chingford many people with small businesses have come to see me about it. I was interested to note that my right hon. Friend attacked that subject with gusto, and has introduced some crucial reforms. I was especially interested to find that the VAT threshold is to be raised to £37,600, which I applaud, and that the turnover ceiling for VAT cash accounting schemes is to be raised to £350,000 —that subject has been raised with me and, I am sure, with other hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I am pleased, too, that there will be some relief on bad debts. Now they can be reclaimed only when they have been outstanding for a year, but my right hon. Friend has reduced the period to six months, for which he should be applauded. In addition, the misdirection penalty is to be replaced, interest chargeable is to be capped, and VAT penalties for misdirection will no longer be automatic. I wish to highlight all those excellent reforms, which were long overdue.

Underlying the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras was a little row that seems to be going on between him and the shadow Chancellor, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). On 14 February the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras spoke on "The World This Weekend" about several expensive programmes that he would launch into if he were in power. He talked about saving 100,000 jobs here and 20,000 there, and about stopping various job losses in the public sector. He then refused to cost any of the programmes, saying that that was irrelevant.

However, his hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor says that the PSBR is already too high, and that Labour would not raise taxes—so clearly, they would not be able to introduce the measures mentioned by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. There seems to be a schism between the two hon. Gentlemen. First, they talk about spending, spending, spending, and then they say, "We cannot raise taxes, and we have some responsibilities." It is high time that they got their act together and approached the subject in a logical and reasonable fashion that the public can understand.

The simple fact is that Labour has no policies. We have listened to the speeches, and not once have we heard one policy from Labour Front-Bench spokesmen. They have not said what they would do were they in power. That clearly shows that they see their role at this point as solely to attack Government policy, and put nothing in its place —[Interruption.] Opposition Members will have a chance to speak later, so I shall press on.

Another important factor in the background has been missed—the minimum wage. Opposition Members all signed up to it, and some time ago the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said:

"I knew the consequences were that there would be some shake-out—any silly fool knew that."

For those hon. Members—especially Opposition Members—who do not know what a shake-out means, I shall tell them: it means job losses. On top of that, the Opposition would pile more job losses, because it is clear that they would not now be able to raise the money to spend on all their programmes. It is the same old deal—they would tax, tax, tax and then spend, spend, spend, and ignore the sort of budget that was needed.

The Opposition have no policies. They offer nothing and could produce nothing for us when and if—God help us—they were ever in power. I therefore support the Budget that my right hon. Friend presented in such an excellent speech; it is an excellent Budget for jobs.

7.13 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): For the benefit of the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith), I tell the House that we understand perfectly well how jobs are created. The hon. Gentleman does not understand that a Government can assist by providing contracts and projects for enterprise to take on, so as to produce employment. A Government can also produce available markets, as with the coal industry.

We have been told that the Budget was supposed to nurture the recovery. We have heard about that recovery for the past two years, yet I still see no sign of recovery, and nor do the people at Leyland DAF or Rolls-Royce. Will we see any next week, when we hope that the White Paper on the future of the energy industry, especially the coal mining industry, will be published?

This was a poor Budget for the unemployed. The Chancellor missed the opportunity to put something back into the economy to encourage recovery and reduce unemployment. As we have already heard, it was not a Budget for jobs. We are told that tax increases now would hinder any sign of recovery, yet in a three-year programme the Chancellor has taxed everything, through 1994-95 and even 1996, to ensure that the Government reduce the public sector borrowing requirement.

So confident is the Chancellor of that recovery of 1 per cent. or so that he has already put the taxation measures in place, just in case it does not appear, as it has not done over the past two and a half years. Clearly, people will be worried about their job prospects and the extra costs that they will face next year. That will not stimulate demand and, therefore, the recovery for which the Chancellor hopes. We must also bear in mind that there may be more such measures in November. I dare say that we shall see more tax increases and more promises broken when the next Budget arrives later this year.

The March Budget has been totally regressive. Everything in it affects the poorest tenth of our society, while the richest tenth have fared quite well. Why do the poorer sections of our society have to provide the recovery from a recession started in the late 1980s by Chancellors giving tax cuts to the very well off? We have heard that the Conservatives are the party of indirect taxation—and thereby they are the party of inequality. One of the basic rules of taxation is fairness, yet the Government have turned their back on that.

One of the most unfair measures was that involving VAT. That regressive measure will impose VAT on heating and power, which will hit the poorest sections of society—people on low pay, pensioners and other people caught in the poverty trap. The Government have again sought to attack pensioners and the poorest groups. We have been told that people who receive income support will get extra help, but so far we have not heard whether they will be fully compensated for the extra VAT that they will have to pay.

I remember a similar argument being advanced on poll tax. We were told that income support would be increased to help people pay the extra money, but in the end they received an average sum—nowhere near the full amount that they had to pay.

The hardest hit will not be people on income support but people in the poverty trap—those who earn slightly too much to be able to claim income support or other benefits, yet who cannot be classed as anything like well off. Those people will suffer greatly because of the decision to impose VAT on fuel.

We heard earlier that fuel bills had decreased. Where is the evidence for that? Coal prices have fallen every year since 1985, and the price to the generators will fall by 20 per cent. this month. But we have never seen a corresponding fall in the prices that the generators charge the consumer. Instead, the generators' profits have increased. Power workers have been offered a 12 per cent. pay rise this week, when everybody else gets either a pay freeze or 1·5 per cent. The generators are awash with money and are offering pay rises of four times the norm. Why do we not tax the generators on their profits with a windfall profits tax, as the Opposition have suggested? The generators must have the money, or they would not be waving 12 per cent. pay rises about.

The Chancellor is clearly desperate to bring in revenue, and he has decided to raise it in the easiest way—to extend VAT and hit the people who cannot avoid paying it. The "green" argument is that the extension of VAT is a way of reducing CO_2 emissions, so the decision arises from the Rio summit. Why has there been no consultation with the energy industry or the energy efficiency organisations? Why has there been no consultation paper on how to reduce carbon dioxide emissions? All of a sudden, we simply have an increase in VAT. It is not a green measure—far from it. There has been no assessment of the impact. The Rio summit did not decide to reduce carbon dioxide levels through increasing hypothermia—nothing of the kind.

Next week, next month or the month after, we are supposed to receive an energy White Paper. Why did the Chancellor not wait until the White Paper was produced before starting to talk about green taxes on heating and power? Surely the Department of Trade and Industry has some input on this in the White Paper. Let us discuss how we can juggle our generating capacity to try to reduce carbon dioxide. Forget it: it is not a green measure, but simply a revenue-raising measure.

The idea is that the poorest sectors of our society will have to contribute to the greening of the environment. I quote from yesterday's newspapers:

> "Taxes dressed up as green need also to be justified on distributional grounds or the poor will pay disproportionately for the greenness of the rest of us. For green taxes to be fair they must be accompanied by measures that redistribute resources to those on low incomes."

That was said by the director of the microsimulation unit of the department of applied economics at the university of Cambridge. That will do for me; it is a fair enough quote. The measure is unfair and it is not green. It is a measure aimed simply at hitting the poor to raise revenue.

In March 1992, we heard that there were no plans to extend the scope of VAT. The Chief Secretary now says, "We said that when we were not facing a £50 billion public sector borrowing requirement. We are now." Is that not the real reason? Surely the Chief Secretary is saying that it is not a green measure. He is saying that we have a £50 billion PSBR, which is more than we had in 1992, so the Government must impose VAT on fuel and power to meet that revenue requirement. The Chief Secretary said nothing about it being a green measure. He said that it was simply a measure to increase revenue. Either way, the country knows that it is being lied to, and it knows that it can never trust the Government again on any matter relating to taxation.

We have heard that we should not jeopardise the recovery with tax increases, but the Budget taxes almost everything. Tax increases will be in place until 1996. Tax allowances have been frozen, so more people have been brought into the tax brackets. More people will pay proportionately more tax. National insurance contributions have been increased again. That is a regressive tax which also hits the lower paid. Excise duties have been increased on everything except whisky. Petrol duties have been increased. Surely the increase in petrol duty is a cost to business and a cost to employers. Surely that will come through when they look at their costs at the end of the year. They will see that their transportation costs have increased, and that increase will be passed on to consumers, resulting in job losses. Mortgage interest relief is to be restricted to 20 per cent. All those measures mean that people will pay a lot more tax even before the VAT increases are taken into account.

What is there for employment? What is there to get us out of the recession? The channel tunnel rail link will come into St. Pancras now and not into King's Cross. The northern part of the country is left out yet again. There is nothing in the Budget for employment. There is nothing for recovery. The Chancellor should think again in November and should come back with a Budget for jobs.

7.23 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in this debate, especially as my last speech, in a debate last Friday, lasted 30 seconds. I do not promise to be as good as that this time, although I hope that hon. Members will be heartened by that news.

I welcome the news today of a fall in unemployment, in my constituency and in the country generally. That is good news for a constituency that has been hit hard over the past two years, and I hope that the trend will continue.

Much of today's debate has centred on the extension of the VAT base, which is not the subject on which I had intended to speak. However, I make the point that it is easy to look at statements made more than a year ago and to ignore what has happened in between. We cannot ignore what happened at the Rio summit, when the Government pledged themselves to a range of environmental measures which have a cost.

It is wrong for Opposition Members to say that such measures do not have to be paid for. Of course they have to be paid for. We need to hear their proposals before we hear their criticism of extending VAT. At the Rio summit, we were pressed to go further, yet we are now told that, in paying for the measure, we are not following a proper path. That is a false approach to the debate.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) talked about the housing market. It was ridiculous for him to compare the position a year ago with the position now, without mentioning that mortgage interest rates have fallen by 4 per cent. Over the pasts two years, the cost for mortgage payers has halved. It was ridiculous for him to ignore that.

I shall deal with jobs and with the measures in the Budget.

Mr. Ilsley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heald: I will not, because I have only 10 minutes. If the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) wants to intervene, however, I shall return the compliment she paid me.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) wrote an article in The Guardian on Monday which contained one or two statements with which I entirely agreed. It is right that politicians on both sides of the House should have full employment as their goal. I do not necessarily agree with the hon. Gentleman about the way in which to set about that, but I agreed with some of his comments.

He is right to say that getting interest rates down is important, and I hope that he recognises what has been achieved in that direction over the past few months. He is right to say that mortgage interest tax relief should be reduced, as the Chancellor has announced. The hon. Gentleman would go further, but he has made a useful contribution to the debate. He is right to say that it is necessary to widen the VAT base or to increase VAT. Again, I have no argument with that. He is right to say that we should encourage realism in wage bargaining and that the future of this country depends on growth. He is also right to say that that is the province of the private sector and of individual firms.

When I went through the article, I thought, "Gosh, there will be something here soon with which I shall not agree." I sometimes wish that such sensible and thoughtful contributions to the debate came from Labour Front-Bench spokesmen rather than from Back-Bench Members.

Mr. Frank Field: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heald: No. The hon. Member for Cambridge can be the hon. Member's proxy. I owe her one—[Laughter.]

Mrs. Anne Campbell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Perhaps he will tell us whether he will vote with us at the end of our debate.

Mr. Heald: I was rather hoping that the hon. Member for Birkenhead would vote with us. One of the problems with the Opposition is that Front-Bench spokesmen come forward with one policy and Back-Bench Members with another. I am reminded of last Friday.

Mr. Duncan-Smith: What policy?

Mr. Heald: I am not saying that there is one policy; there are at least three or four. Last Friday, the Labour party proposed to cut defence spending by £7 billion. My constituents rely on defence expenditure for their export industries, so they do not welcome that proposal at all.

There are three ways in which full employment can be achieved. The first is a range of employment measures, and I welcome the announcements in the Budget. My constituents have written to me and I have a letter here. The letter makes a number of points, including the point that people who are unemployed should be given the opportunity to start up in business. I welcome the extra 10,000 business start-up scheme places which have been made available.

The second measure suggested by my constituent, who wrote his letter before the Budget, is a scheme under which the unemployed are given vouchers, which they could take to their future employers. I support such a measure for the long-term unemployed. I welcome the workstart pilot scheme, which will achieve just that.

My constituent went on to say that many socially useful jobs could be done by the unemployed. The community action programme and TEC challenge give people the opportunity to do such tasks. Although I believe that, over a period of years, growth will be the main answer to unemployment, it would be wrong for the Government not to take measures such as they have taken to help people now. Taken together with the meaasures announced in the autumn statement, 600,000 people now have more hope than they had some months ago.

I agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) said about the role of entrepreneurs in creating growth. It is vital that business men should lead the way in establishing businesses which succeed for Britain. In looking at what has happened in the past 10 or 15 years, we should recognise that businesses have specialised more, and that we have businesses in Britain which can take on the best in the world and succeed. We should not always run Britain down and pretend that that is not the case.

Such businesses are capable of challenging the three major trends in the world economy which need to be addressed, and, because they have become efficient and productive, they can meet the challenge of the newly industrialised countries. The efficiency of our businesses, the clustering of businesses in western Europe, their good connections in the far east, the type of help that was announced in the Budget under the export credits guarantee scheme and the help of our Foreign Office, which has so many trade missions across the world, will allow our companies to take on the challenge of the newly industrialised countries.

It is wrong to say that the impact of new technology will be death for jobs and that that is the end of the story. The impact of new technology has made the companies which have introduced it more efficient and productive than before. Some of the businesses which have lost a great deal of labour in the past 10 or 15 years are those which are now capable of exporting products for Britain and taking on the best in the world.

[Mr. Heald]

I believe that growth will come from that change in technology. The newly industrialised countries may be competitors, but they also provide markets for Britain. If we have the new technologies in place, we will be productive and efficient, and we shall be able to go into the new markets which are opening up around the world. That will create growth and new jobs.

In Britain, we must face the fact that there is a battle in Europe for inward investment and for the investment of our own companies in our country. The evidence given to the Employment Select Committee in the past few months, when it was investigating the issue, has shown that we must treat competition for investment as European competition. Companies with investment to make look to see whether Britain is at the centre of Europe. I believe that it should be and I hope that the Maastricht treaty will soon be in place so that we can move forward.

Companies want a willing and capable work force. We have that and good industrial relations and improved training. I wish to make two more points, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Geoffrey Hoon.

7.33 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald). He has clearly come a long way since our days studying law together. Certainly he was a lot less weighty in those days, had much more hair and was a good deal more radical.

The Budget must be measured against one crucial test —whether it will encourage or increase confidence. Confidence is crucial in any recovery. People must have confidence in their employment prospects and their ability to maintain their present employment and standard of living. A typical family or household must have confidence in its ability to pay its bills, rent or mortgage.

People will obviously have welcomed recent cuts in exchange rates after such a long period of sustained high repayment rates. However, as yet there is only patchy evidence that interest rate cuts are leading the country out of recession. Instead of spending on new goods and homes, families and individuals are seeking to restore stability in their finances by repaying debt such as hire purchase commitments, credit card debts, mortgage commitments, and debts built up when the Government encouraged spending before the general elections of 1987 and 1992.

Moreover, in considering the confidence of a typical family or household, it is necessary to consider the impact of the tax increases announced in the Budget. Disposable income for almost every family in the country will be significantly reduced.

From April 1994, a married couple with one earner will have to pay more than £7·50 a week more if that earning amounts to more than £14,000 per year. If it amounts to £19,000 per year, they will have to pay £8·50 a week more. If it amounts to £28,000 a year, they will have to pay £13 a week more. That is a significant reduction in people's ability to spend their way out of recession, if that is what the Government are aiming at.

Above all, the fear of unemployment will remain the key factor which will limit confidence. In December 1992, the Trades Union Congress commissioned an independent poll of working adults. It established that 45 per cent. of people in work thought that it was very or fairly likely that there would be job losses at their workplace in 1993. That is hardly surprising, given the present state of the economy.

The British economy is in the deepest and longest recession since the war. It has been in recession since the second quarter of 1990. It has had three years of decline. Unemployment has increased in that period from 1·8 million to 3 million. There has been an increase in unemployment in each and every month since the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) became Prime Minister.

More than 1,000 jobs have been lost every day over and above the unemployment which existed at the time of the general election. We have a lack of confidence throughout the economy. Investment is down 13·3 per cent. since 1989. It is just 17 per cent. of the gross domestic product. That is 3·5 per cent. below the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development average, and 13 points below the rate in Japan. The 1992 rate was 17 per cent. below the rate for 1989 and 6 per cent. lower than in 1979. The result has been unemployment across the range of economic activity.

In the year to September 1992, 260,000 jobs were lost in manufacturing industry; 320,000 jobs were lost in services; 90,000 jobs were lost in construction. The pit closure programme may add another 80,000 jobs to those totals. An unknown but perhaps comparable number of jobs may be lost in the public sector.

Recent large-scale redundancies have all too often been in the very areas and industries which we shall need if any recovery is to be permantent and sustained into the next century. There have been high-tech redundancies at Rolls-Royce, GEC and IBM. Like the Government-inspired recession of the early 1980s, this Government-inspired recession is precisely in the areas we desperately need if Britain is to remain competitive into the next century.

What strategy do the Government reveal in the Budget to deal with the recession? What solution do they propose in the longer term? What overall economic strategy is revealed by analysing the Chancellor's Budget? It seems to me that the Government's policy is still based on a single club. Admittedly, it is a different club: instead of the interest rate policy pursued until black Wednesday in September, our economic policy is apparently based on chronic and persistent devaluation.

In September, the pound was worth DM2·95. The Chancellor was apparently happy with that level. It is now 20 per cent. below that level, and the Government have not said how far they are willing to allow the pound to fall.

What has changed since September? Was the Chancellor right before September or is he right now? In effect, the pound is in free fall. Compared to its value in 1980, the purchasing power of the pound is just 45p, according to the calculations made by Barclays bank. Howard Davies, the director general of the Confederation of British Industry, who is not someone I quote regularly, said recently:

"Half the world thinks we are now hooked on a policy of competitive devaluation, which is dangerous and could be self-fulfilling."

What are the consequences of that policy? In the short term, British goods are certainly more competitive—no one can argue against that—but how long will they remain so? Inflationary pressures will be increased by continued devaluation and will raise the price of imported goods and services, which account for about 30 per cent. of our national consumption.

How quickly the increases will feed through into the economy remains a matter for debate. For the moment, the market is so fragile that there is a significant element of discounting, but experience suggests that, as prices become firmer, the full inflationary effects of devaluation will begin. Increases in inflation are likely to offset devaluation in three to five years.

It seems that the 20 per cent. devaluation since September may take as long as five years to increase inflation by 20 percentage points above what it would otherwise have been. How will the Government fit that in with their medium-term inflation target of between 1 and 4 per cent.? They have no mechanism or strategy for achieving that target, other than a continuation of the present recession, or perhaps a return to their previous policy of raising interest rates.

Essentially, the Government are staggering from one economic policy to the next, as they stagger from one economic crisis to the next. This country needs stability and confidence, which are crucial to recovery. We need interest rate and currency stability, as they are an important starting point for any economic policy. That would allow families to plan carefully and thoughtfully for their futures, knowing how much they have to spend and what their expenditure is worth.

Precisely the same considerations apply to businesses, which want stability to plan economic strategy. If they are exporting, they want to know what contracts are worth at the time that they sign them, and that those prices will remain consistent in the longer term.

The Government must assist in the creation of that stability by encouraging investment in industrial capacity and the skills of our people. They must finance research and development, and help marketing and design.

Conservative Members have been asking Opposition Members to set out what should be the objective of economic policy. The primary objective was set out by the Government in 1944 in a White Paper entitled "Economic Policy": the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment. That is something that we should be seeking to establish.

A fundamental change in the Government's attitude is the most important factor in creating a high and stable level of employment. The Government must recognise that they have a crucial role to play in establishing the right conditions to allow that stability. It is a case not of picking winners, as the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) suggested, but of creating the right conditions.

The Government are fond of citing illustrations—there have been a number in this debate—of Japanese companies investing in the United Kingdom. Instead, why do they not cite the fact that the Japanese Government are prepared to spend £40 billion on a reflationary programme to ensure that Japan remains competitive? That is the sort of stability, strategy and imagination we need, and there is little evidence of it in the Chancellor's Budget.

7.43 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) who, unfortunately—unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald)—was hardly radical enough.

I am conscious of the extremely difficult task facing the Chancellor of the Exchequer and our industrialised partners because of the problems caused by a deep world recession. The Chancellor has the task of introducing a Budget to assist a sustainable recovery without strangling it at birth and he achieved that with admirable skill on Tuesday.

As well as having a small business I am vice-chairman of the Small Business Bureau. Many small businesses have weathered the current recession with great difficulty, but with resilience. I am conscious of the fresh start-ups, which have been referred to today. Since 1979, there has been a net increase of more than 30,000 new small businesses starting up in the north-west. In 1991, there were 1,500 start-ups.

There are almost 3 million small businesses in this country and on Tuesday, when the Chancellor referred to them as "leading the growth", he was absolutely right. They employ one third of all private sector employees. Small businesses took on 1 million extra employees during the 1980s, forcing the pace and driving the expansion and profitability of UK plc. In the 1990s, we must look to them to create the jobs necessary to help to expand our gross domestic product and profitability and to reduce social security liability and bring dignity to those seeking work. We must remember that half of the people who become unemployed find work within three months. We must look to them to create jobs to raise the total tax intake to pay for our record amounts of essential spending on education, schools, welfare, health care, law and order and spending in other important areas.

Since the Budget, Opposition Members with their negative rhetoric have given this country no hope. The most that can be said of the Leader of the Opposition's offering was that his speech was mercifully short. But it was short in all the wrong areas—short in ideas, in vision and in solutions to the economic problems facing the industrial west. His speech was full of pomp and platitudes and empty of content.

This afternoon I waited three and a half hours to hear policies from Opposition Members, but we have not heard one policy from them. We have as much hope of hearing policies from Opposition Members as we have of hearing a genuine welcome for the reduction of 22,000 in the unemployment figures today. It is not so much a case of holding our breath to listen for that welcome, but of holding our noses because there is a funny lingering smell in the Chamber today. The Opposition, who seem to speak about creating jobs, by their actions and promises would do the opposite. The Opposition would impose a minimum wage, inflict on us the social chapter and saddle us with an employment training tax, all of which would increase unemployment.

Last Friday in the Chamber I listened to some Opposition Members talking about cutting defence expenditure. British Aerospace is in my constituency and I can tell Opposition Members that I shall fight hard to ensure that we maintain those jobs in my constituency and neighbouring constituencies.

[Mr. Nigel Evans]

The business aspects of the Budget have been welcomed by many leading industrialists, but I do not have time to name them this evening. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), who is not in the Chamber, described the £1 billion kick-start as mere tinkering. I have a list of 10 suggestions from the Chancellor. If I had the time I would talk about all of them, but I will pick some of the juicier suggestions made last Tuesday. First, there is the onslaught on red tape, which strangles many of our small businesses. I am delighted that action has been taken to ensure that that is cut away. It does not matter where the red tape comes from—whether from Brussels, Westminster or local authorities—it needs to be cut.

On the review of statutory audits, which act as a tax on many small businesses, I am delighted that action is to be taken to consider ways to remove that from many of them. The increase in the value added tax threshold will release many small businesses from registration and allow Customs and Excise officers discretion in the way they deal with many small businesses who have problems filling in some of the extensive forms required for their VAT returns. That measure will also cut to six months the time that many small businesses have to wait before claiming VAT back on some of their bad debts. That is extremely helpful. I hope that the Chancellor will be able to ensure in future Budgets that some larger businesses will pay smaller businesses well within time.

The freezing of the unified business rate is welcome—800,000 small businesses will be welcomed, to the tune of £320 million. That will ensure that some left-wing councils are not allowed to heap misery on small businesses, because their UBR will be frozen to manageable levels and to levels that they will know.

The fact that 100 per cent. of the capital gains tax that would be charged on selling a business can now be reinvested in new businesses will create the new jobs that we all want. The increase in the small firms loan guarantee scheme to £250,000 will give small businesses the opportunity to get the money that they need from banks to expand and create extra jobs. I also welcome the other tax changes that will assist small businesses.

It is excellent that today the unemployment rate has fallen by 4,100 in the north-west.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): It has not fallen in the south-east.

Mr. Evans: Even so, we must welcome that fall in unemployment. I accept that the unemployment rate may be volatile in the months to come, but today's fall in unemployment shows that we are moving in the right direction.

One of the new schemes announced in the Budget will allow those who have been unemployed for longer than two years to be employed. The money that would have gone to them in income support will be used by their employers to subsidise their wage. I hope that we shall be able to attract one such pilot scheme to the north-west, because many constituencies—not my own, which has one of the lowest unemployment rates in England—would find such schemes attractive.

I was delighted to hear from the Government today that they will ensure that those on low incomes will be protected against the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel bills. I hope that we shall also be able to assist those who just fail to be entitled to income support—for example, some of our pensioners on fixed incomes who have been extremely careful throughout their working lives to save money. I hope that they will be given some assistance.

The extension of the 20p income tax rate from £2,500 to £3,000 is excellent news. An extra 1 million people will now be paying only 20p in the pound on their income. That still represents just one fifth of the working population, however, and I hope that as a result of future Budgets we shall be able to extend that rate to many others. Many people still remember the basic rate of 33p set by a Labour Government, and they will not forget it.

The conditions are now in place for recovery—a recovery made all the easier by the changes announced in the Budget. Lower interest rates, lower inflation, lower wage inflation and competitive exchange rates will lead industry in the right direction. Confidence is returning and I trust that all hon. Members will do their utmost to avoid jeopardising that recovery.

7.52 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I welcome the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) back to the Chamber because he gently, but firmly, chided the Opposition for not praising success when we see it. I agree that there is something about the British character that likes to wallow in failure and not prize success. Sassoon, writing during the first world war, said that if the English were promoted from the inferno to paradise they would still gather round and talk about the good old days. Because one despises that side of our national character, however, that does not mean that we should go overboard and declare success when there is little to declare. The sense of unreality surrounding the debate comes from the feeling that I get when I listen to Conservative Members.

We have a huge tide of unemployment, which is devastating the lives of those who must bear it. Equally, it is catastrophic for our country. The Budget must be judged on how it will help to achieve four objectives.

First, how will it help those who have suffered worst from unemployment—those who are literally destitute and sleeping on the streets of many major cities? Secondly, how will it help share the burden of unemployment by getting those in the queue for the longest to the front of it? Thirdly, as the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) said, how will it affect confidence and therefore help to return the economy to one of fuller employment, at least to the level that existed before the current recession or slump? Finally, the most important challenge is how the Budget will help to return the economy back to one of full employment.

Beatrice Webb, at the end of her long life, said that the most significant change that she had seen in Britain was the absence of beggars from the streets. Under the Government, however, begging is back in force and, sadly and appallingly, it is one of our growth centres. Those beggars have been made destitute by the rising tide of unemployment. To what extent will the Budget return us to a state where, whatever else is happening, people are not reduced to sheer destitution? The Budget is silent on that.

What will the Budget do to ensure that those who have borne unemployment longest have a chance to get to the front of the queue? The Secretary of State for Employment and others are right to say that some jobs are available. It is crucial that those who have been out of work the longest stand the best chance of getting those jobs. Some pilot schemes have been announced by the Government, but one that I have proposed to them is the simplest of all. I hope that it will not only run in one centre, but will be adopted generally. Those who have been out of work for five years, or even 10 years—many of our constituents have been out of work that long—should be able to keep their benefit for a year if they are able to get a job and earn a minimum of between £50 and £60 a week.

My proposal is simple, it requires little policing and it would make those who have been in the dole queue the longest that much more attractive to employers. It has the edge over the scheme that the Department of Employment is currently favouring, presumably because of pressure from the Treasury.

One of the advantages of my proposal is that it would save the Exchequer some money, because I believe that the benefit and the wages should be taxable. The cost of unemployment would, therefore, be reduced by a small amount. My proposal would bring people to the front of the queue. It would make them attractive to employers and give them the chance of entry into work. It would give them the chance to hear about jobs and at the end of that trial year they might remain in the labour market.

Even if my scheme did not achieve that, it would allow the rest of the family to work without the loss of any income. It would give them the chance to reduce some of their debts and it would restore some hope to those people who have been crushed by the year upon year upon year burden that they have borne for us as we fight inflation by making people unemployed. On that front, the Government have some credit from the Budget.

Will the Government sustain that credit and will the Budget get the recovery under way? We all hope that the strategy will be successful, but I fear that it will not be. We have a Chancellor who has an extraordinary gift of announcing measures in a way that does least for confidence rather than boost it.

We have had dribbling cuts in interest rates, instead of bold, imaginative moves to try to convince people that we have turned the corner. We are now faced with a VAT increase which will come into force next year, whatever happens. I propose that we should have a VAT increase when unemployment has fallen below a certain level, which would mean that people had an incentive to spend now. That would reverse the increase in the savings ratio, which has bedevilled an immediate recovery.

The fourth test by which we need to judge the Budget is how effective it will be in returning the economy to full employment. I congratulate the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) who mentioned full employment as an objective. My hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) pointed out that the Department of Employment did not set such an objective in its annual report this year. She also warned that the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North will probably be taken outside and done over by his colleagues for even mentioning such a heresy as full employment.

In a previous Budget debate, I mentioned that it was crucial for the Government to maintain their stance on the GATT round. Given how dependent our economy is on world trade, the worst that could happen to our constituents who are in work, let alone those who are desperate to work, would be for trade barriers to go up. There might be short-term gains, but the long-term costs would be enormous. It is, therefore, important to support the Government on this point.

Secondly, there are huge markets in eastern Europe and Russia that do not have much purchasing power. The Marshall plan played an important part in ensuring that western European economies moved toward and maintained full employment after the second world war, and we need to be as economically bold as the Americans were then. That means giving people in these areas the chance to buy our goods and services and cementing friendly relations with them. If we cannot do that for good economic or sound moral reasons, we should do it for strategic reasons.

There has been an outbreak of tribalism in much of Europe. Some of those tribes are hungry; others possess nuclear weapons. It is now a much more dangerous world than it was before the Berlin wall fell. For reasons of survival, if nothing else, we should take that course.

I want to offer one last idea about full employment. If we are to move back to it, we must begin thinking the unthinkable. There is an employment cartel to which most of us belong. We take measures that make it difficult for those outside it to join. I know that the world is not quite as simple as this, but I suggest that if those of us in work were prepared to accept wage cuts of 12·5 per cent. and those wage cuts were translated into new jobs—assuming all went smoothly—everyone who wanted a job would have one. We desperately need a Government who will pressurise those of us fortunate enough to be in full-time jobs throughout all recent recessions to hand those outside the employment cartel a chance. Unless we are prepared to do that, all that the Budget will do—if it is successful—is push unemployment down, possibly to 2·75 million. That is a worthwhile objective, but many people whose lives have been devastated by unemployment, and who have borne that unemployment for up to 15 or more years, will have no prospect of a job in their lifetimes unless we begin to entertain thoughts the like of which we have not had before or uttered in this Chamber.

8.2 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), whose thoughtful style and good grace in recognising good news when he sees it are a great joy. I pay tribute to the good work he has done for many of my constituents who are Maxwell pensioners—it is much appreciated by large numbers of people.

It gives me great pleasure to welcome the Budget, which I regard as excellent, timely and perhaps a little overdue. It gives rise to two questions whether a recovery is under way, and what our long-term strategy for the economy and employment should be. When the Chancellor made his famous remark about the green shoots, I think that he was probably correct. The economic indicators suggested that growth was imminent at that point, but there was one complicating factor—our membership of the exchange rate mechanism. Furthermore, no one could have foreseen the effects of the reunification of Germany and its economic domino repercussions.

I hope for the sake of future generations that we have learnt some powerful lessons from this experience. Currency stability is desirable, but not at any price. Strong currencies do not make strong economies, but strong economies can lead to strong currencies if low inflation and the value of money are maintained. When our party came to power in 1979 we used phrases like "honest money", "real value", "honest savings", and so on, far more than we do now, so I was delighted to hear the Chancellor return to using many of those phrases in recent weeks.

We have also learnt that Governments cannot fix exchange rates in the modern world. We do not have the cash to enable us to take on the currency markets and win. There is no inherent value in either a strong or a weak currency. It is merely one economic variable; sometimes a currency at a different level is relevant to a country's economic circumstances. Our currency at present is more realistically valued, I believe. It is false to talk of revaluation and devaluation when it is clear that the markets regard the currency now as slightly undervalued, and as a result of the Budget it is appreciating. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) seemed to fail to understand that, just as he failed to understand the fact that unemployment has fallen.

The ERM was supposed to be a semi-fixed mechanism with variable exchange rates. That was what the present Prime Minister and Lady Thatcher believed it to be when they took Britain in, but during the time of our membership the system was hijacked and became what was supposed to be the precursor of a single currency. As a result of Labour policies and of our experiences of nationalisation, we above all people should recognise that economic decisions made for political reasons will always end in tears. If we go along with proposals to move to a single currency which does not evolve naturally but is forced on us by means of an artificial political timetable, we shall live to regret it.

I believe that a recovery is under way, as witness the surge in mortgage demand, the cuts in interest rates and the fall in underlying unemployment. I welcome the fall of 2,900 in the west country—the first fall in unemployment for three years in an area hard hit by changes in the defence industry. Its plight, however, has been nothing to what it would have been if Opposition Members had been allowed to make the cuts of £7 billion about which they told us last Friday. Having supported that proposal for huge defence cuts, they are hardly in a position to tell us about job losses in defence industries in the west country.

The Chancellor was left with a difficult balancing act. If the recovery was indeed under way, when should we increase revenue and balance our public finances? There are Conservative Members who say that raising taxes will not harm the recovery if monetary conditions are right. I have some sympathy with that view, but it takes no account of the fact that confidence has been knocked hard by the length of the recession. The Chancellor was thus absolutely right not to raise taxes this year and to go for a neutral Budget but to increase taxation as economic growth gets fully under way. That is a responsible attitude.

The final confirmation that this was the correct course was given to me by my London cab driver this morning, who said that, although he might not have done well out of the Budget, it was not going to do the recovery any harm—and was not that what counted at the end of the day? Looking around for advice, one can always do worse than take a ride in a London taxi. Perhaps some of the drivers would like to stand for safe Labour seats and inject some sense into the Opposition for future Parliaments.

Our primary duty is to provide sound money. That was why the Conservative Government were elected in 1979. Tax cuts, low Government spending and low borrowing are at the heart of our philosophy, and every Conservative Member would like to cut taxes and Government spending and borrowing—if all these things were possible in a perfect world. Unlike the Labour party, however, we do not occupy office for short periods at a time. We are a great national party and we have to look to the long term because we tend to be in Government for rather long periods. At the moment we are at the beginning of one of our longer periods. Therefore, it cannot be enough for us to ask ourselves, "What would be a quick fix for the coming year and what will make us popular this year?"

We must look to the longer term with a view to establishing sound Government finances so that the generation coming after us do not have to take on the burden of debt that the Labour Administration left to the incoming Conservative Government. Of course, we repaid that debt to a great extent during the economic growth that took place in the 1980s. The Opposition tell us so often that we have been in office for 14 years and that we are responsible, but during the 1980s the Government repaid a greater amount of national debt than anyone believed was possible. It was the greatest amount ever to be paid back in our history. That is what economic growth and success can enable us to achieve.

The holy grail of a longer-term strategy has always been sustainable non-inflationary growth, but that is not so easy to achieve. Lord Lawson, who was one of the most important reforming Chancellors since the second world war, was wrong to believe that any Chancellor or any Government could perform an economic miracle. The battle against inflation is never won. Inflation, like sin, is always waiting round the corner to tempt anyone who might be susceptible. The battle against inflation must never be stopped. In other words, we must always be on our guard.

If we are to have sustainable growth, the economy must be based more on exports, both of goods and of services, and less on domestic consumer demand. I applaud my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for taking the far-sighted view and taxing consumption rather than income, encouraging exports and providing further supply side reforms. At last we have been presented with a Budget with a vigour and vision reflecting the early Budgets of Lord Howe when he occupied 11 Downing street.

In the late 1980s, we abandoned our monetary targets, we had too much domestic consumption and there was too little export growth, though it must be said that there was a remarkable export performance during the late 1980s. If there is too much domestic demand and too little export growth, we shall be on the road to a balance of payments deficit and inflation. That is why the measures outlined by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor are to be welcomed.

There has been a continuing fall in interest rates—not a small trickle, as the hon. Member for Birkenhead suggested, but a huge fall in interest rates over a relatively short period, which has provided massive stimulation for business. A realistically valued currency is helping our exporters. In addition, there is the announced increase in export credit. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, there must be a two-pronged attack. Export credit can be extremely expensive, so we must try to reduce the subsidies given by our competitors while we expand our own export credit. Recognition must be given both to the Treasury and to the Department of Trade and Industry for the efforts that they have made in that area. Until our subsidies are reduced by our competitors, we must help our domestic industries. That, in effect, is what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced when presenting the Budget. We welcome reduced premiums as we welcome the fact that by 1995-96 the allocation of Export Credits Guarantee Department cover for certain markets will have increased by 75 per cent. Those will be important markets such as China, Indonesia, Malaysia and Mexico.

We are surely right to continue to press for increasing liberalisation of world trade, and the commitment of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to achieve a successful resolution of the current GATT dispute cannot be overestimated. It is extremely important for the entire world—for all developed and developing countries—that we achieve a resolution of the dispute.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has recognised that to allow the public sector borrowing requirement to continue on its present path would threaten our long-term non-inflationary objectives. He is undoubtedly correct. However unpopular the moves may be in the short term to correct the course of the PSBR and to ensure that it shrinks as a proportion of gross domestic product in coming years, they must be made. My right hon. Friend is correct to stress that we must export to survive. He is also correct to say that we cannot spend what we do not have and that we need sustainable, non-inflationary, long-term growth. We have a Chancellor with the right philosophy and the right Budget. I urge him to keep faith and to keep us free.

8.14 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): The hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan-Smith) took the Opposition to task for not understanding the nature of successful enterprises. Presumably we must have a system in which there is entrepreneurial zip. No doubt profitability must be greatly increased. I suppose that stroppy labour must be pushed down so that businesses can develop vigorous virtues that lead to people standing on their own two feet, or on the feet of others, to make their way in the world.

The arguments that are advanced about the European Community seem, strangely, not to coincide with the philosophy of market economics. In the context of the EC, we are told that there will not be fair competition. Instead, there is to be fixed competition so that 11 nations will operate under the social chapter while we, the United Kingdom, shall be allowed not to be part of it. It seems that the normal rule that everyone starts from the same position is not to apply and that we, the United Kingdom, are to have some special privileges.

If the development of successful enterprise and entrepreneurial zip that the Government have been following for the past 14 years has been doing so well, why are we in such a mess? I am not allowed to explain what the mess is because that would be talking Britain down. I know that the markets will be much concerned with what I say in the House at 8.15 pm, so I must not say anything that is critical of the Government's actions. If I were to engage in such criticism, there would no doubt be a further collapse in share values and the strength of the pound. I would be talking Britain down.

Accordingly, I shall not explain what all the problems are and I shall not go into the details of unemployment, deprivation and homelessness that others have mentioned. Instead, I shall concentrate on the position in which we find ourselves.

We are told that the public sector borrowing requirement is to increase from £35 billion to £50 billion. At the same time, little has been done to advance the position of the economy. That has been put off until the time when money will begin to be recouped to pay off the debt that will be incurred by increasing the PSBR.

Before I develop my argument, perhaps I should say something about growth and development, while cautioning that entrepreneurial zip, private enterprise and the market might not be the be-all and end-all. The Government have siad that they are not to blame for the mess in which we find ourselves because it is the result of the international situation. That, of course, has been influenced considerably by the extension and development of Thatcherite ideals. The entire world was beginning to take up the British revolution in terms of the market, private enterprise and privatisation. Perhaps it was somewhat successful. Indeed, it has been so successful that it has been fed back to us. That has helped to put us in the mess in which we now find ourselves.

The alternative to possessive individualism is collectivism and collective provision. There is the approach that markets should be limited to the places where they operate well. There are, for example, the markets that operate in all or most towns. The system works effectively as the public move from stall to stall. Something approaching perfect competition can operate in those circumstances. That is because the public can check prices between stalls. That system does not operate in the context of monopoly capital and large firms, but it is one which should be nurtured for small businesses. That means that there should be more controls over larger firms and other large influences. We know that there is considerable exploitation if they are allowed to let rip. I am not talking about a command economy or about massive bureaucratic domination within an economy. The corrective is democratic involvement and participation with collective decisions being made about the areas in which improvements and advances should be made.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Which of the 47 industries that have been privatised since 1979 would the hon. Gentleman bring directly back into public control?

Mr. Barnes: It is difficult suddenly to produce such a list. For one thing, we are in a mighty economic mess with a public sector borrowing requirement of £50 billion. If industries were taken back into public ownership, the resultant compensation would impose an extra burden. However, some public utilities could begin to be returned to public control. They are natural monopolies which capitalist economists such as Marshall at the back end of the 19th century used to describe as requiring a great deal of public regulation in their operation. That principle should be put back on the agenda as an advance of collective provision.

It is interesting that the public sector borrowing requirement is to be allowed to let rip during the next year and is to be tackled only in the subsequent two years. During the first year, some extra moneys are to be collected for distribution in different areas. Those extra moneys are to come from the freezing of allowances, not just this year but in the subsequent two years. According to the Red Book, the freezing of allowances at the level determined by the Budget is to become permanent.

Excise duty provisions also have a knock-on effect. The increase in petrol prices has an impact on almost everything that depends on transport, such as food prices. Income from that and from the change in mortgage interest tax relief will go towards meeting the cost of widening the 20p band, which will take place this year and in the two subsequent years. That will result in more money being collected through income tax than would otherwise be the case, because allowances for each of the following two years have been frozen while a £500 band has been added to the 20p provision.

Many people who were paying tax at 25p in the pound and would have been taken out of tax if no change had taken place other than the development of the thresholds will find themselves having to pay 20p which will be pushed down further year by year.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not want to mislead the House. I can confirm that, in all the revenue projections in the Red Book in respect of 1994-95 and beyond, the assumption underlying those figures is full indexation in accordance with the statute.

Mr. Barnes: The figures on allowances and basic rate limits which are frozen show an income this year of £660 million, in the following year £920 million and in the year after that £960 million. It is now said that in the last two years such sums will be indexed. However, even allowing for that and the omission of indexing this year, the extension of the principle about which I am talking remains, even if the details need to be adjusted.

This year, another £300 million will be collected as a result of the freezing of the allowances and the 20p band provision. Next year, it will be £210 million and the year after that it will be £110 million. Therefore, more money will be collected through the income tax provisions than previously and there is a knock-on effect from year to year, despite the Minister's clarification of the figures in the Red Book.

Other measures include VAT relief on bad debts and cuts in business tax and rates, but the biggest changes are to be left until the following years—most significantly, the massive VAT increase on domestic fuel, and the national insurance contribution increases.

We may need some more statistics to check out the point that I am about to make, but if we take into account the amounts of money that will have to be paid in the next two years by consumers, who are also, in different ways, earners, in the form of income tax contributions, VAT payments, excise duties—which continue during the subsequent two years—and national insurance contributions, the amount of money raised is equivalent to an increase of 4p on the basic rate of income tax in 1993-94 and almost 6p—5·66p recurring—in 1995-96.

Not only is that a massive amount to be taxing people, but it is being done in a most regressive way. It is not done by extending income tax by way of a progressive increase in the number of bands, but in a way that continues the principle of the poll tax—the most regressive form of taxation that could be imagined—and extends regressive provisions. All that is done without any investment or improvement in the economy.

Only the Heathrow Express, crossrail and the channel tunnel provisions were mentioned earlier. They may be important projects, especially for London and the south-east of England, but where are the equivalent measures that will spread through the rest of the economy? Such projects were supposed to trigger developments throughout the nation. There was supposed to be some sort of ripple effect. Some stones need to be thrown into the pool elsewhere so that the ripple effect reaches other areas of the economy.

Mr. Tony Banks: If those transport infrastructure decisions go ahead rapidly, as I hope that they will, there will be a big spin-off for manufacturing industry in parts of the country other than in London—for example, those manufacturing rolling stock.

Mr. Barnes: I was not arguing against the plans and provisions. I was saying that this is all that we get in terms of investment, despite the fact that we move from deficit of £35 billion to a deficit of £50 billion. Surely what we wanted was the expansion of such arrangements to ensure growth in the economy and so that the knock-on consequences could be taken into account.

Some of us should start a campaign for fair taxation. The anti-poll tax campaign had a "Can't pay, won't pay" slogan. We should have a "Can pay, want to pay" slogan for the fair taxation campaign. The equalising impact of income tax should be taken into account when determining areas of expenditure. No fairer tax has been devised. All other forms of taxation are regressive. The whole package should be considered to see whether it is progressive or regressive.

In recent years, we have moved rapidly under this Government away from fair forms of taxation towards unfair forms of taxation. That development should be changed. Fair taxation to make the resources available for growth of the economy needs be be put in the forefront.

Mr. Lidington: Would the hon. Gentleman care to tell the House, since he has obviously given a great deal of thought to the tax structure, how many bands he would introduce, at what levels they would start and at what levels they would end? Would we eventually get back to the good old days of socialism, when we had a top rate of 98p in the pound on unearned income and 83p on earned income?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be tempted down that route. A number of hon. Members wish to speak this evening.

Mr. Barnes: I was preparing to finish when the hon. Gentleman intervened. When I am Chancellor of the Exchequer and allowed a two-hour introduction, I will certainly spell these things out in great detail. One of the worst things that occurred in terms of the high band of taxation was when we had a Budget that changed the level from 60 per cent. to 40 per cent. That was an absolute give-away and a disgrace, while other areas of our economy were being hit very hard. Provisions to take into account such a top rate need to be reintroduced.

8.32 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I rise in a totally confused and bemused state.

Mr. Tony Banks: He should be the Chancellor.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I have listened to the whole debate today, and have tried to secure some clarity and light from the Opposition Benches. It was not until I saw the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) climbing up in the rafters, trying to find the metaphorical light switch, that I suddenly realised that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) was telling us it all. He was telling us really good, old-fashioned socialism—clause 4, renationalisation, a centrally planned economy, the lot. It was no longer a socialist dream of reform coming to fruition; it was back to the old nightmare.

I watched with interest the recent television programme in which the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was busily telling us how he would save 20,000 jobs in the defence industry. I am very interested in employment in the defence industry because in my constituency it is of key importance. I studied his last election manifesto with great interest, and I seem to recall that it told us that he would reduce expenditure on defence to the lowest level among our European allies. I believe that that would involve a cut of some £7 billion in our defence budget, which would mean the elimination of the Air Force, the Army or the Navy.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on an excellent Budget. It meets his twin objectives of a continuing recovery this year and a return to sound public finances within the economic cycle. It is a very ingenious Budget; it is a big Budget that contains a great deal. It sets the trend for fiscal and monetary measures over the next two to three years, and for the next autumn statement, when I hope that my right hon. Friend will take the opportunity, as the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is doing at the moment, to make a thorough review of public finances and see where we can hold them to their present level.

We have three ways of reducing our public sector borrowing: we can—as is undoubtedly happening with the increase in employment prospects and the reduced interest rates from the Bundesbank—encourage the recovery which has already started and which will bring in large extra tax receipts; we can reduce public expenditure; and we can raise more money. I hope that my right hon. Friend will do all three, as he has done by producing a fiscally neutral Budget this time, looking forward to raising £6·5 billion next year and £10·5 billion the year after.

It was interesting that, on Tuesday, my right hon. Friend projected a growth rate of 1.25 per cent. this year and over 3 per cent. next year. If that happens—I have no reason to doubt it—we will have one of the highest growth rates in the industrialised world. We have heard a lot from Labour Members about creating employment, but the only true way to create employment is to encourage growth in the economy. If it was a question of spending more money, we would have the highest rate of employment in the western world, because our public sector borrowing requirement as a percentage of gross domestic product is rising far faster than it should. That is why my right hon. Friend has taken the measures that he has.

I want to comment on one or two of the fiscal measures in the Budget that even Labour Members might have been magnanimous enough to admit have some merit. There cannot be an entire Budget that takes two hours to introduce without a single measure that they might consider had some merit.

In my bemused and confused state, there was just one chink of light, and that was cast by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). I first met the hon. Gentleman when I was lying next to him in a Blue Circle cement bag, when we were sleeping out on the tiles. It was a cross-party venture. I was rather sorry when the hon. Gentleman said that we were not doing anything for the homeless, because, as he knows only too well, we have introduced a huge range of measures on their behalf—rough sleepers initiatives, initiatives to help the non-governmental organisations, rents above shops initiatives, rents to mortgages initiatives, and many others.

The hon. Gentleman had some very good ideas, and I am sure that one thing of which he would approve in our Budget is the arrangement to take people out of the tax net altogether. Of course, the former Chancellor, Lord Lawson, started this process by taking 3·5 million people out of the tax net, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor continued this process last year by introducing the new 20 per cent. tax band.

The extension of that tax band this year will benefit some 4·9 million taxpayers, and I calculate that next year, with the further extension, it will benefit 1 million taxpayers. These are very large numbers of people at the lowest income level who will benefit by not having to bear such a high burden of taxation as hitherto.

The principle of widening that 20 per cent. band is fundamentally right. My hon. Friends believe that distorting tax reliefs should be gradually reduced. Therefore, I thoroughly welcome my right hon. Friend's measures to limit mortgage interest relief at source to the 20 per cent. tax band. It will raise a very useful sum of money to be deployed elsewhere. I also thoroughly welcome the reduction of the married person's allowance to the 20 per cent. tax band.

One of the most far-reaching reforms that my right hon. Friend announced concerned the self-regulation and current year basis of assessment for the self-employed. He has introduced a truly visionary measure which follows his consultation paper which, as I told him at the time, I greatly welcome. I urge him to examine the American system carefully. It could be a complicated system to introduce, but it could benefit 8 million self-employed people, so it is extremely important. The American model is simple to operate. Let us face it. We want the self-employed people out there earning a living and benefiting the country and the system will be of no benefit if it is too complicated for them to operate.

I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to consider the following bold initiative to encourage self-employed people to take up the new system. As the new system will save civil servants in the Inland Revenue a great deal of time, my right hon. Friend might offer people an incentive to use the system. How about offering a £300 reduction to anyone who is prepared to change to the new system? That would be worthwhile in terms of the administrative costs that the Inland Revenue will save in sorting through the tax returns of 8 million people.

Other measures might have been welcomed by Opposition Members, such as those relating to gifts to charities. The reduction in the gift aid to charities from £400 to £250 a year seems thoroughly worthwhile and we now have the equivalent of the old covenanting system. There are other measures to help charities, such as the increase in the payroll giving scheme from £600 to £900 a year. As we gradually reduce our tax take as the economy recovers, and as prosperity returns to Britain, we need to encourage individual responsibility, which certainly includes giving to charities.

There was one measure to encourage self-reliance that I regret my right hon. Friend did not introduce. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Birkenhead is not in the Chamber, as I agree with him about pensions. We need to reduce reliance solely on the state pension and encourage occupational and private pension schemes. I am sorry that my right hon. Friend did not choose to increase the cap on earnings-related tax relief on private and occupational pensions. I hope that he will consider that in the near future.

I now move on to measures for businesses. We have had a thoroughly worthwhile Budget for businesses which will encourage small, medium-sized and large businesses to succeed. My constituents will welcome in particular the increase in stamp duty and another year of freezing the uniform business rate. They will particularly welcome the increase in the turnover limit for the cash accounting system for VAT purposes from £500,000 to £350,000.

I am a business man, and I understand these matters only too well. After the Keith report—here I am a little critical of my right hon. and hon. Friends—Customs and Excise were given quite unnecessarily draconian powers as regards penalties. I very much welcome the changes that have been introduced.

During my right hon. Friend's speech I was looking carefully around the Chamber and I noticed right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House nodding off during the complex provisions on advance corporation tax. I welcome those provisions, not least the reduction from 25 per cent. to 20 per cent. on dividends paid which will increase the cash flow of British industry by £2 billion. That is a significant amount of money.

I had hoped that, as well as limiting the amount of income tax that can be reclaimed from the 20 per cent. band, my right hon. Friend would have left it at the 25 per cent. band as that would have been simpler to administrate. As the measure raised only £200 million, my right hon. Friend could have raised the money more easily elsewhere.

In conclusion, much has been made in the past few days of the imposition of VAT on fuel and energy costs. I know only too well that after the Rio summit containing the convention on climate change we have to stabilise our emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases at the 1990 level by the year 2000. That is an extremely tough target.

If we are to meet our international treaty obligations —Opposition Members always play green until it comes to hitting their pockets and then they are not quite so keen —we have to introduce severe measures. Energy is one of our industries with the highest emissions of those gases. If we can encourage people to insulate their homes better and use less energy sensibly we shall go a long way towards meeting our Rio targets.

Opposition Members moan and groan, but if my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had really wanted to be unkind he would have imposed the 17·5 per cent. VAT from midnight on Tuesday and given people no time to adjust. He has been extremely generous in giving everybody plenty of time to plan. There are generous insulation grants available and people can move to more energy-efficient ways of heating their homes. By imposing an 8 per cent. tax next year and a 17·5 per cent. tax the year after, my right hon. Friend has given everyone plenty if time to adjust. I am sure that Opposition Members would have squealed and moaned just as much had he imposed VAT on newspapers, sewage, books, children's clothes or food.

We have to be prudent about the economy and raise a substantial amount of money to reduce the PSBR. I believe that we have had an excellent Budget. It was a Budget for growth, for exports and for allowing us to take the maximum advantage of the single market. Above all, it was a Budget for jobs. I want to create jobs just as much as any Opposition Member and I believe that the Budget will put us on course for recovery and creating as many jobs as we can in the western world.

8.47 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It really is a bit much for the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) to try to dress up a tax on the poor—which is precisely what a 17·5 per cent. VAT charge on fuel, albeit delayed, actually means—as though it was an environmental measure to be applauded. One can only assume that, if he wanted to go a bit further, logically, too many people are breathing too much air and no doubt the hon. Gentleman could come up with a very good scheme to stop them doing so.

The hon. Gentleman went out of his way to praise former Chancellors who took 3·5 million people out of tax. He could have congratulated the present Government on taking another 4 million people out of tax by rendering them unemployed.

I have many criticisms of the Budget, but who does not? All honest people will have criticisms to make. That is not to say that there was nothing good in it, and I pay tribute to all those good things now and move hastily on to the main part of my speech.

I am grateful that this is the last time that we will have a great Budget setpiece, now that the Government are moving towards a unified statement. At least that will mean that future Chancellors will have to eat their words only once a year rather than twice a year.

I found it offensive from the Chancellor's statement onwards to hear the accusation that, when we criticise the Government's economic policies, we are somehow running Britain down. Such accusations are wholly unprincipled: they represent the last refuge of a scoundrel.

The Government have dragged Britain down. When we say so, we are merely attacking the incompetence of the Conservative Government, and we are certainly not criticising or running down the country in which we live and suffer the incompetence of the Government's economic policy, along with so many millions of our fellow citizens. The country deserves something better than an ideologically fixated Government, made up of economic illiterates, but I am afraid that the country will have to wait for the change that only a general election can bring.

I have to confess that I have a grudging liking for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I try to dislike him, but I find it difficult. I like him; it is rather like having Arthur Daley in charge of the Treasury. He is a likeable rogue. I would regret it, but I fully expect one day to wake up and read that he had been nicked around midnight, halfway up a drainpipe, probably at the back of Kensington palace, clutching a bottle of champers, 20 fags and a box of Cadbury's Milk Tray. He will no doubt give us a good laugh when he goes. In the meantime, he is giving us a lot to think about, and much misery to be shared round.

I will not begrudge the Chancellor today's glimmer of good news that unemployment has fallen by a few thousand. That is true for the country as a whole, but not for the capital city. Unemployment in London has gone up. We are still inexorably heading towards 500,000 unemployed in the capital. The right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) was right to argue the case for London having assisted area status.

I understand that the Secretary of State for Employment, who is in her place, has supported that case. I am going only by newspaper reports, but it seems that there has been an argument about it in Cabinet between her and the President of the Board of Trade. It will not be much use to the right hon. Lady to have my support, but she should know that among Conservative and Labour Members, and among Conservative and Labour councils in London, there is unanimity about assisted area status.

We have an unanswerable case. We have the largest concentration of unemployment in the country. If we use the labour force survey, which the Secretary of State seems to prefer, London has the largest number of unemployed and the highest percentage rate of unemployment in Britain. In areas such as Hackney, Haringey, Lambeth, Newham, Tower Hamlets and Southwark, unemployment rates are well in excess of 20 per cent. and have been for a considerable time. If one becomes more particular in the examination and starts looking, for example, at unemployment among black males between the ages of 20 and 24, the unemployment rates are up to 70 per cent.

Unemployment is a big problem in London, and anything that the Secretary of State for Employment can do to bring relief will be much appreciated. In two and a half years, London has lost over 250,000 jobs. There are 56 people, twice the national average, chasing every job vacancy in London. Our case for assisted area status is overwhelming and it has all-party support.

Other hon. Members want to speak, so I will not delay the House, but I want to concentrate on one aspect of the Budget speech which had particular reference to London —the transport element. The Heathrow-Paddington link is to go ahead. That is good news. It is noticeable that that is a straightforward partnership scheme between the British Airports Authority and British Rail. They were able to get their act together, probably because the Government were not much involved. That is the way it should be.

When we come to transport infrastructure decisions in which the Government are integrally involved, we run into difficulty. We were promised that public money had been earmarked for crossrail. We understood that the project was secure, but now it is to be pushed on to the back burner as the financial package is re-examined. One way to finance crossrail would be to dump the M25 widening scheme in Surrey and transfer the money to the crossrail project. I believe that the sums involved are almost exactly equal. That would be good for the environment and much better for the south-east than widening the M25.

As to the channel tunnel fast link—some fast link. We are not sure where the link will end, and we do not know how it will be paid for. As to the route, I have been given by my hon. Friend the assiduous Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) a copy of tomorrow's Thurrock Gazette, which announces the line of the route. I understand that the Kent Messenger has also leaked the route.

My hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), is at the moment doing his head-butting thing outside, in an angry mood, because newspapers and television companies apparently have got information about the route before the House has had an opportunity to discuss it. That is shameful. The Secretary of State for Transport is to make a statement some time next week, but as the information has leaked into the public domain, it would be only decent if a Minister came to the Dispatch Box to make a statement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) asked why we should concentrate on transport decisions affecting London and the south-east. I pointed out to him that they are not of importance just to the south-east. There will be an enormous spin-off for manufacturing industry throughout the country if the decisions are made speedily. It would mean more rolling stock and investment in manufacturing output other than in London. London's industrial base has fallen dramatically. London used to have one of the great concentrations of industrial employments; now it has one of the smallest concentrations in the European Community.

We are still waiting for the Jubilee line extension to the east, again mentioned by the Chancellor, by the Minister for Transport in London and by the Secretary of State for Transport. How many times will it be announced as something the Government favour? When will we see a sign of the scheme going ahead? It is a strange way to run a railroad. When the line is started eventually, we should call it the green shoots railway because it is always being promised but it never turns up.

If investment decisions are good, they are good investment decisions, period. They are as good for public investment as for private investment. Recession is the time to make those decisions, because investment decisions on transport infrastructure will help advance the upturn in the economy; they will prepare the way. They would form the basis for the prosperity that we hope will return one day to manufacturing industry and the economy generally.

We need speedy decisions on such projects. We do not want to have the Government launching and relaunching them all the time while there is no apparent move to get the railroads built and the rolling stock ordered. We must prepare the way for economic recovery through these decisions. They would provide valuable public assets for the 21st century. We want no new excuses or delays from the Government: we want action.

8.57 pm

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I have been in the House on and off throughout the debate. I listened with a twinge of sympathy to the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). It was obvious that he had prepared a speech with his characteristic polish. It was to be a long, self-indulgent gloat over the inexorable rise in unemployment, so we can imagine his feelings when he heard of the welcome drop in unemployment, down nationally and down in Gravesham, to the pleasure of my constituents. In his characteristic style he must have expressed his feelings with a cry of "We woz robbed". Instead, at such short notice, he has had to rely on the immature scribbles of a research assistant to prepare his speech.

Our debates have been a feast of words, but there has been a ghost missing from the feast. There has been almost a conspiracy of silence among the party leaderships on that ghost, the exchange rate mechanism. The ERM was doubtful at the best of times. It became even worse when it was used to fix exchange rates. It might have been good at the time the exchange rate was fixed, but within days it all came out of line with the relative performances of different economies and, therefore, their currencies, thus putting pressure on the exchange rate. It was like a pressure cooker whose vents had been stopped up: it was bound to explode.

That pressure was added to by the thoroughly irresponsible way in which the German Government carried out reunification and absorbed and converted the ostmark into the deutschmark. The consequence was that German economic policy required higher interest rates which, in turn, were inflicted upon Germany's ERM partners. Since golden Wednesday we have been out of the ERM. We have been free. We have set our own economic policy. The others remain trapped. The high interest rates imposed because of German policy have led to their economies being crucified. If we want to see real difficulties, let us look at the economies of France, Spain, Italy, and so on—the countries which remain within the exchange rate mechanism.

This debate has a whiff of hypocrisy about it. If the Government favoured an exchange rate mechanism which had that impact, so did the Opposition. I remember hearing in this House the Leader of the Opposition taunting the Government, saying that the Government believed that we should be in the ERM wide band but that the Labour party believed that we should be in the narrow band and that, with its socialist comrades on the continent, it would adopt the single currency. The leader of the Liberal party was not far behind. I could quote what he said, which was exactly the same thing.

A fashion was created for high interest rates. That fashion created the recession. We now have the freedom to set our own exchange rates and to lead our own destiny. The fact that we are leading our own destiny is leading to lower interest rates, growth and the good news today on unemployment.

The results of our ERM policy, supported by the Opposition, inevitably created a large deficit. On Tuesday we heard my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer courageously plan to eliminate the deficit. It is hypocritical of the Opposition not to address the problem of how to cope with that deficit. We have heard not a word about that from those who sit on the Opposition Front Bench.

There is one aspect of closing the deficit gap by increasing taxes to which I intend to refer—the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel bills. In June last year this country signed the United Nations framework convention on climate change. It commits all developed countries which are party to the convention to take measures aimed at returning their emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by the year 2000. What are we doing about that? The objective is to reduce the emissions of carbon dioxide by 10 million tonnes.

Steps are already being taken by industry, commerce and the motor industry, not least through fiscal encouragement. They have already resulted in the elimination of 7 million tonnes of emissions. The task must now pass to domestic households to make up the missing 3 million tonnes. The announcement of the imposition of VAT on domestic fuel from April 1994 provides a lead time within which individuals can prepare to save energy by the more efficient heating and insulation of their homes. The minor works assistance scheme, available through local councils, will help people to do that. The Government also have time to prepare for the protection of the less well off and the elderly who will face higher bills. That is why I welcome today's clear commitment by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

There is much good news in the Budget. In particular, I welcome the measures to improve the Export Credits Guarantee Department. The cut in ECGD insurance premiums is very welcome. Also welcome is the £1·3 billion increase in ECGD capacity. I noted in particular the statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer about limiting that increase to what he termed the fastest growing and most important markets around the world. It will not surprise my colleagues on the Treasury Bench if I draw attention to the fast-growing markets in Latin America. The economies of the Latin American countries rose, on average, by 3 per cent. in both 1991 and 1992. That growth rate is accelerating. An Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report on the economic outlook published in December 1992 showed that last year both Argentina and Chile were likely to exceed 7 per cent. growth, Mexico and Colombia 2 per cent. growth, and Brazil was expected to have a trade surplus of 15 billion US dollars. There are big opportunities for British exporters. Let us back them up with the proper application of this increased ECGD capacity.

After the Chancellor's major trailer for the high-speed rail link through Kent one assumed that the announcement of the route would follow very quickly. It was therefore with some disappointment that we found that the statement was to be made not on Wednesday but next week, which is the last week before the deadline. It is becoming apparent why the statement was not made on Wednesday. In a very busy Budget week, the Government had apparently pencilled the statement in for Wednesday; in accordance with the usual channels practice of the House, they advised the main Opposition party so as to enable it to field its spokesman. That is a normal courtesy, but what happened? Thinking about the fancy speech of its Treasury spokesman and about the importance that the Labour party attaches to Kent, the Opposition said, "No, we will not have it on Wednesday."

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said recently on Radio Kent, "Quite clearly, if the Government hadn't aborted the statement on Wednesday, the Labour party would have withdrawn normal co-operation and gone in for trench warfare." What is the consequence of that? The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has referred to his hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, Labour's transport spokesman, as being outside, head-butting with the media. What is the hon. Gentleman head-butting about? He is head-butting about so-called leaks of the route—leaks which may or may not be true —but he is head-butting the people of Kent, the people who are worried about the rail link.

What we want is a definitive announcement from the Secretary of State. We could have had a statement on Wednesday but for the action of the Labour party. As a result not least of a question that I put to the Leader of the House earlier today, we are to have it early next week, as originally planned. The Labour party should not be playing party political games with my constituents. Next week the Secretary of State will be here to answer questions put by Kent Members. What happened today was quite shameless.

The Budget contains much that is painful and some good news. Above all, however, it indicates plenty of courage. It tackles the problems of Britain today—something that the Opposition have patently failed to do —and deserves our support.

9.7 pm

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): Listening to the Chancellor's ponderous and technical speech on the Budget, I was reminded of two Tory election posters. The first appeared on the streets in 1979. It depicted a long dole queue and carried the words "Labour isn't working". Let me remind the House that that was a time when unemployment stood at just over 1 million—a level to which it has never returned in the 14 years of the Tory party's stewardship of the economy, though the figure has often been 3 million. Then there was the Labour tax bombshell poster of the 1992 election campaign. When I was reminded of those two posters, I realised that I was listening to a Chancellor from a political party which is prepared to devalue the political currency as much as he has devalued the pound.

On Tuesday, the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) said:

"I . . . stand here, shamelessly, as a taxing Tory."—

[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 202.]

I was driven to wondering whether the right hon. Gentleman had done the same in April. Certainly the Tory party did not. The voters will remember for a very long time the Government's cynical and shameless Budget and their behaviour surrounding it. It is the equivalent of George Bush's, "Read my lips: no new taxes", and it will come back to haunt them.

Lord Gilmour, in his book Dancing With Dogma, summed up the Government's stewardship of the economy in the past 14 years in a way that I cannot better. He said:

"The Thatcher era saw a grim failure of economic management. The two worst slumps and the most irresponsible boom since the war is a record nobody should be proud of."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said so well, billions of pounds of North sea oil revenue have also been squandered to finance mass unemployment as our industrial base has been sacrificed on the altar of monetarism and Thatcherite orthodoxy by a Conservative party in thrall to the City. Also thanks to their free market dogma, we have seen the deregulation of credit, which unleashed a massive credit boom and caused household debt to rise from about £10 million in 1979 to a staggering £52,894 million last year. That represents £2,300 for every household in Britain. There will be no recovery of confidence or anything else as long as there is such a massive debt overhang and the constant threat of unemployment, which stifles our prospects for recovery.

The Tory Government's monumental irresponsibility and economic incompetence seem to be matched only by their capacity for self delusion or deliberate deception, one of which they have practised on a grand scale. Even Lord Lawson, now safely retired and out of the way, refutes his own ludicrous claims of an economic miracle, which he attributes to rather too good a dinner one night before he returned to the Chamber. I note that he now has the dubious pleasure of being the latest in a long line of scapegoats paraded to explain the Government's colossal economic failure.

The truth is—and the Budget proves it in no uncertain terms—that the failure is a Tory failure, caused by dogma and incompetence. As yet, there is no sign of an end to it. The scale of the failure can be summed up by the three structural deficits revealed in the Red Book. The first is the public sector borrowing requirement, estimated at £35 billion this year and set to rise to a massive £50 billion next year.

The second is the balance of trade, £17·5 billion this year rising to £18·5 billion next year. In the depth of a continuing recession, that is quite unprecedented. The third is unemployment which hovers between 3 million and 4 million, depending on whether one believes the real figures or the Government's altered statistics. In any event, the figure represents 10 per cent. of the work force. That is a triple whammy if ever there was one.

Unemployment is not only a symptom of recession and economic failure but is a contributory factor to that failure. It is a scourge which must be eliminated, but, unfortunately, as today's debate has proved, we have a Government who, during their long and disastrous management of our economic affairs, have scarcely even bothered to pay lip service to the view that unemployment should come down, let alone targeted it as a problem to be solved.

I believe that the Government decided early on that they could get away with mass unemployment and not be punished by the electorate. They have shown no concern. Despite billing the Budget as a Budget for jobs, they have done nothing. The costs of unemployment to the economy are considerable. Three million unemployed, or 10 per cent. of the work force, cost about £27 million—or £9,000 per person on the dole—in lost tax revenues and increased social security payments. As for the gross domestic product, unemployment costs up to £66 billion in lost production. If we had that production, the deficit—massive as it is—would disappear.

In the north-west, 334,700 people are out of work. The cost to the Exchequer of unemploymnent in that region alone is £3 billion. The social costs are incalculable, and the personal tragedy involved has been referred to many times, at least by my colleagues. Unemployment is economically inefficient and morally unjustified. Unlike the Government, we believe that it is a legitimate concern of Government to minimise it, so was the creation of employment at the core of the Budget's strategy? I looked and looked, but, it must be said, it was not.

We had to wait until the Chancellor was well over an hour and a half into his speech to hear employment referred to for the first time. The Government's so-called employment package consists of two measures. At the micro-economic level, there is supply-side tinkering, involving five new initiatives, but not one job has been created. At the micro-economic level there is nothing but forecasts of a continuing rise in the number of jobless. The Red Book's unemployment forecast says:

"The rate of increase should start to slow down again as the economy recovers; though since the level of unemployment typically lags behind the cycle in activity it will be some time before it starts to fall again."

The detail in the Red Book reveals that despite the supply-side measures, which must be welcomed, although they are minuscule compared to the size of the problem, the forecast is that an extra 200,000 people will be unemployed by the end of the year, and that the level of about 3 million will persist for the next two or three years.

The projection for growth this year—1·25 per cent.—is not enough to prevent a continuing rise in unemployment. The only other policies designed to create employment are essentially indirect, such as the deregulation and general freeing up of business taxes that have often been mentioned by Conservative Members. However, there is no guarantee that deregulation will create more jobs. Those policies could lead to an increase in profitability or dividends—we have seen that British business likes to pay increased dividends rather than create more employment. There is no guarantee that there will be any more employment as a result of that side of the Budget.

The overall expenditure on supply-side measures is a paltry £125 million. We lost £5 billion in an afternoon to try to save the Chancellor's face, yet all that we can spare for the tragedy of the 3 million unemployed, many of whom have been on the dole for a long time, is £125 million. One speculator made £1 billion in one day last September. The level of waste in which the Government indulged during that folly puts the employment measures, trumpeted though they are, and welcome though some of them are, in the perspective that they deserve.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), I was amazed when I examined the strategic aims of the Department of Employment and found that no mention was made of full employment, merely of creating a flexible and efficient work force. It is not good enough for the social fabric of the country if that is all that the Department of Employment exists to do. The references to the unemployed said simply that the Department would provide training to give people a better chance of getting jobs.

That deals only with the supply side. There is almost nothing to stimulate demand. In Wallasey we have almost 6,000 people unemployed, and only 75 notified vacancies. People can be trained until they are blue in the face, but the vast majority of them still will not succeed in getting jobs, because the jobs are not available. There must be measures on the demand side to create employment.

I welcome the Budget promises, such as they were, about the great capital programmes for south London. If they actually happen, if the famed private finance actually shows up, jobs will be created—but we must do much more. There is much wrong with our infrastructure after 14 years of total neglect. There is much wrong with our roads, our schools and our hospitals, and many skilled construction workers are on the dole, waiting to work. It is not beyond the wit of the Government, or any Government, to introduce employment-creating measures that will improve the infrastructure, and to spend public money on them. It has been done in the past.

At least the Government have done us a favour, in that they have proved that we can never trust a Tory promise at a general election. That has been demonstrated so starkly that I believe that the electorate will never forget it. The Government are incapable of an imaginative response because of the dogma that has tied them up for the past 14 years, so they condemn 3 million people to more years of idleness. Instead of tackling the cause, they plan to cut welfare even more to pay for the hole that they have created in the Budget.

The Budget is shameless and cynical, full of broken election promises and huge tax increases, and it will do nothing for the unemployed.

9.19 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I very much welcomed the Budget and today I especially welcome the news announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment that there has been a 22,000 drop in the number of unemployed. The suggestion made by the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) of Conservative neglect was wholly wide of the mark. If we had been so neglectful, how could we have been elected for four terms on the run? I found it rather unworthy of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that he almost choked on the news of the drop in unemployment and that he tried to dismiss it as a freak. We should study the matter in its real context.

Mr. Dobson: Were you here?

Lady Olga Maitland: I am very much here.

This is a Budget for jobs and I congratulate the Government on the many employment initiatives. All told, Government spending on employment initiatives now amounts to £2·5 billion, which is not inconsiderable. It takes considerable vision to keep up the momentum with five new initiatives which could provide at least another 100,000 opportunities for individuals.

The initiatives are timely. I agreed with the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) when he said that it was painful for people to lose their jobs. Losing a job is devastating—I could not agree with him more. His comments were sensitive, correct and appropriate. I have seen what a shattering experience losing a job can be for those of my constituents who have never been out of work before. It is hard on their dignity because the vast majority of people want to work. We are not basically a nation of whingers and whiners.

The good and interesting news is that growth is already beginning. It is beginning quietly and it is beginning in a way that makes me feel comfortable because it will be sustained. There are examples of that growth in my constituency. The evidence shows that people are getting back to work far more quickly than ever before. As has been said in many ways today, one quarter of those who are unemployed find work within a month, one half find work within three months and two thirds find work within six months. It is also worth bearing in mind the fact that last year, in any six-month period, 4 million people moved in and out of work. The unemployment figures are not static; there is constant movement.

I give the example of the experience of the Sutton enterprise agency. It has found that the range of middle and senior management seeking work has stabilised since January. It has noticed that last year seven PhD postgraduates and any number of graduates came to it for help. So far this year, there has been none. The Sutton enterprise agency finds that the most positive programme is the business start-up scheme. The success rate is high. About 75 to 80 per cent. of the companies that are started under the scheme are still trading after two years, which is slightly better than average for small businesses.

As time is short, I shall deal with one area that has not been especially mentioned. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on her initiative in introducing the workstart pilot schemes. I believe that it is appropriate that we should pay a lot of attention to helping unemployed people who have been out of work for two years. Such people lose heart and they lose the habit of work. They find that they lose morale and that it affects their family life. It is appropriate that we should seek every possible way to place them back into the system.

I understand that workstart has taken its inspiration from workfare in America. It is an enterprising way to move forward. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), who opened up the debate initially. The programme is still in its infancy and I wish my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State well with the talks with the TECs next week.

There is a great deal of work to be done. Businesses need an incentive in taking on people. The scheme will take a great deal of structuring. We shall want to know precisely who will be taken on, by what kind of companies and for how long. It will require careful monitoring. None the less, workstart will be of tremendous benefit to the long-term unemployed. It will help to break the vicious cycle of lack of confidence and help people to get back into the workplace. There are high hopes that, by getting the habit of working, people will in turn be taken on for work.

9.25 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): The tragedy of the Budget and the failure of the Government is that at a time when Britain needed a Budget for jobs, the Tories gave us a Budget for tax increases costing the average family £8·50 a week. Where we needed a Budget to reverse economic decline, the Chancellor delivered one which will deepen it. Where the Budget should have been fair, it hit viciously those on average and below average incomes.

In the Budget the Prime Minister was tested against his general election promises and was seen by everyone throughout Britain to have broken them. On 27 March last year he said:

"We have no plans and no need to extend the scope of VAT".

On 31 March last year the Chancellor said:

"We will not have to increase taxes. I cannot see any circumstances in which that will be necessary."

The Prime Minister said:

"I have no plans to raise the top rate of tax or the level of national insurance contributions."—[Official Report, 28 January 1992; Vol. 202, c. 808.]

None of the Conservative Members who have spoken today has apologised for the breaking of those promises. Indeed, the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls) said that they were a trivial and nitpicking matter. Of course, all Conservative Members said in last year's general election campaign, "Vote Conservative on Thursday and the recovery will continue on Friday."

We must ask what happened to that recovery. Since 9 April last year, more than 40,000 families in Britain have lost their homes. More than 60,000 people have lost their businesses. Broken promises. Some 300,000 people have lost their jobs. More broken promises. Today, even on the Government's figures, and even with the small welcome improvement in the unemployment total, there are 3,042,614 people unemployed. That is not the mark of a successful Government or effective policies.

Last Thursday, recoiling from the onslaught of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the Prime Minister, in one of those unwise, unscripted rejoinders which he occasionally gives, said:

"If France is so successful, why are there 3 million unemployed there?"—[Official Report, 11 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 1102.]

It is interesting that the Prime Minister is finding time to reflect on the problems of France. But is there not a more important question that he ought to think about? If his Government here in Britain are so successful, why are there 3 million unemployed people here? Of course, the answer is that the Government have failed to invest in industry, in our economic and social fabric and in skills. As a result, Britain's production of goods and services lags woefully behind that of our competitors. The consequence of that is the mounting unemployment, the suffering of individuals and families and the grotesque waste which diminishes the lives and living standards of us all.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): While I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman's analysis of the current recession, does he agree that it has been caused by the high interest rates which occurred as a result of our membership of the exchange rate mechanism? Will he say that the Labour party would not join the ERM?

Mr. Smith: The extent of unemployment has been caused by the Government's failed policies. They have failed to invest in the British economy as our competitors have invested.

Some of my hon. Friends suggested measures that the Government could take to arrest the rise in unemployment and to reverse it. My hon. Friends the Members for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) and for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) said that the Government could act, could keep the pits open and could save 100,000 people from joining the dole queues. The Government could act to meet the needs of manufacturing industry.

Yesterday, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury issued a challenge to Opposition Members on industrial production. Let me give him the figures during the years of Conservative government. Since 1979, manufacturing output has grown by 25 per cent. in Germany, 36 per cent. in the United States, 50 per cent. in Japan and 4·7 per cent. in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: Just for the sake of completeness, will the hon. Gentleman also tell us what happened to manufacturing output during the years of the last Labour Government?

Mr. Smith: Let me tell the Financial Secretary that we advance our economy and create the prosperity that we all need through investment in manufacturing. Let us compare that investment now with when the last Labour Government left office. The answer is that manufacturing investment has fallen in the United Kingdom by 6·3 per cent., and during the same period it increased by 53 per cent. in Germany and by 128 per cent. in Japan. That is where we find the roots of our economic failure and national decline.

As my hon. Friends the Members for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said, when we point out such matters, Conservative Members claim that we are talking Britain down. We are not talking Britain down, but the Government are doing Britain down. It is not those people who call for action who are doing Britain down, but those who have failed to take the necessary action to secure economic prosperity.

On Tuesday, the Chancellor claimed that his proposals would help business and promote employment. What is the reality? What is the judgment of key industries affected by the Budget? The director-general of the Engineering Employers Federation said:

"This Budget does nothing to bring about the massive switch from consumption to investment which is essential for lasting recovery."

The Machine Tool Technologies Association said:

"We were disappointed that little emphasis was placed on improving investment in high technology."

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) pointed out that nothing was being done to assist technology transfer, which we so desperately need.

If there is no Government action to allow British shipping to compete fairly, it faces extinction and there will be a loss of 20,000 jobs and a net loss of £2·3 billion to our balance of payments. Mr. Edmund Vestey, the president of the Chamber of Shipping, said of the Chancellor's Budget: "it is extraordinary that he has ignored the shipping industry. This is a missed opportunity for Britain."

I promise the Government and Conservative Members —some of whom have expressed concern on such matters —that during the passage of the Finance Bill we will provide ample opportunities for them to join us in the Lobby to vote for effective measures to promote crucial national industries. Those industries are all the more crucial because of the startling deterioration in the balance of trade referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle). The current level of the deficit, although alarming, is not the only disturbing factor, because the forecast is shifting and is becoming worse. A £9 billion deficit was forecast for 1993-94, but it is now forecast to be £17·5 billion. There could be no surer measure of the Government's failure to enable Britain to pay its way in the world.

What of the measures of which the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Employment have boasted to help the unemployed? In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), I believe that we need a measure to help those—to use my hon. Friend's striking phrase—who have been in the queue longest to get to the front of it. That is why we proposed in our budget for jobs that national insurances rebates should be given to employers who are prepared to take on people who have been unemployed for more than a year.

If we consider all the measures in the Budget, it is clear that they are too little, too late, too poorly financed and will have too little impact when set against the £1·2 billion cut in the value of the schemes for the unemployed that has been imposed since 1990.

Of course it is good to help those who want to start up their own businesses, but does the Chancellor not realise that, to succeed, those businesses need customers? Of course it is good to let unemployed people study vocational courses, but why is that good for just 30,000 people? What about the many students who cannot undertake such courses because they cannot gain the discretionary awards to which my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) referred?

I accept that there is much work that needs to be done in the community, but, instead of introducing schemes with allowances barely above benefit levels, why are the Government not prepared to pay a proper rate, offer schemes that include proper training and create proper jobs? How on earth have the Government decided on the number to whom those schemes apply? Why did they choose 100,000 people? Does that stand for one in three of those who have lost their jobs since the election or the one quarter of those who face losing their jobs next year? Whatever the answer, the Government's proposals are a colossal betrayal of unemployed people, especially the long-term unemployed, who should have a right to quality when they train and a right to proper payment when they work. The Budget has also missed other opportunities to help the unemployed.

Real programmes for environmental action and improvement could and should have been used to generate jobs. The Government's attempts to dress up their punitive extension of VAT to domestic fuel and, for that matter, the increase in petrol duty as green measures are utterly unconvincing. Greenpeace rightly called the VAT proposal a setback for the environment.

If the Government wanted to help the environment by saving energy they would expand investment in rail and public transport and widen the differential between leaded and unleaded petrol. It would have been better if the Government had provided money for insulating pensioners' homes properly rather than inflating their fuels bills. They should have followed the national energy efficiency plan proposed by the Labour party. That would cut four times as much in CO_2 emissions as the Government claim will result from the VAT imposition. Our proposals would not simply save energy but create jobs.

The true recycling in the Budget was that done by the Chancellor when he recycled construction projects that had been announced before. It is high time that we had less of Ministers mincing their words and more of construction workers mixing cement. The question is when those projects will start. The Chancellor announced that crossrail would be subject to further delay. How do we know that that will not be an indefinite one? The Jubilee line project, which the Chancellor trumpeted in the autumn statement, is now subject to further problems. The north-south Thames 2000 link has also been postponed.

How can we have any confidence in the Chancellor's vague promise of a channel tunnel rail link by the end of the century, given the Government's previous mishandling of the scheme, which was described by the president of the European investment bank as a "disaster"? Alastair Morton, the chief executive of Eurotunnel, has described the scheme as "a tragicomedy in umpteen acts."

When the channel tunnel opens within the next year, the Government will have left the country with the French end of the tunnel linked to the European high-speed rail network and the British end plugged into Network SouthEast.

Above all, and as many of my hon. Friends have argued, why do not the Government even now allow the accelerated release of accumulated local authority capital receipts so that homes can be built and a start can be made on getting the 400,000 construction workers on the dole back to work?

If action is to be taken for jobs, we also need to look to international action. In his Budget statement the Chancellor welcomed, as we all do, the re-emergence of growth in the United States—a ray of light, he called it. But he failed to acknoweldge the limited extent to which such growth in the United States will have an impact in the United Kingdom. Analysts Phillips and Drew put the ratio at eight to one vis-à-vis the EC. A 5 per cent. increase in United States demand raises Europe's GDP by only 0·5 per cent. and that of the United Kingdom by only 0·3 per cent. Does not that show that much more effective and urgent international co-ordination is needed to secure expansion, including the sort of measures for eastern Europe to which my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead referred?

Why did Downing street dismiss Jacques Delors' call for an emergency G7 summit to consider urgent action on unemployment? When I tabled a parliamentary question about that, why did the Government refuse to commit themselves to such a summit? Will they give such a commitment this evening?

By making only contemptuous references to the European Community in the Budget speech, did not the Chancellor signal not merely the fact that he needs to cultivate the Euro-sceptics on the Tory Benches but his wanton disregard of the importance for jobs of urgent and co-ordinated European action for economic recovery? Christophersen, the Commissioner for economic policy, is calling for further measures—he has said that much more than what was agreed at Edinburgh needs to be done. He expects that the Danish presidency will propose as much. I challenge the Government to tell us their intentions. Do they believe that further measures should be taken? What are they; and will they give the urgency to this matter which they so signally failed to do during the British presidency?

Will the Minister apologise to the House for the fact that the Government forced out of the Edinburgh summit, despite the commitment to it of the other 11 member states, a £160 million programme for training for those who had lost their jobs or whose jobs were at risk?

There may be another reason for the Chancellor's contemptuous references to the European Community. Conceivably, he wanted to throw some of his hon. Friends off the scent of what was, at least to them, an important issue. The Chancellor said of carbon taxes:

"Tax policy should continue to be decided here in this House, not in Brussels."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 182.]

However, if the right hon. Gentleman is allowed to proceed with the 8 per cent. and then the 17·5 per cent. rates of VAT on domestic fuel, under the terms of the 1991 and 1992 European agreements this House would never again be able to levy a zero rate of VAT on fuel. I challenge the Paymaster General to make the Government's position on that clear tonight. Do they concede that what I have said is true?

Will the Government answer a question that they have so far failed to answer—the one put to them by my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central? Will pensioners be compensated in full for the extra costs of VAT on domestic fuel? I challenge Conservative Members—the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) for one, since he expressed his concern on this point—to join us in the Lobbies on Monday to honour their election promise and defeat this extension of VAT, to afford some protection to pensioners and others on low incomes by not proceeding with this disastrous and punitive measure.

Far from being the Budget for jobs that Britain needed, this was a Budget for tax increases, for lengthening dole queues and for more broken promises and wrecked lives —from a Government who can no more be trusted with the economy than they can be trusted with their own words to the British people.

Mr. Frank Field: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask you to draw Madam Speaker's attention to the fact—this applies to right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House—that most of those whom she called to speak earlier in the debate have not had the courtesy to stay to the end. She might bear that in mind when she is next drawing up a list of speakers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): It has been noticeable for a few weeks that the courtesies of the House, which have been observed over many years, are being overlooked. I hope that hon. Members will take note. I will draw the matter to the attention of Madam Speaker.

9.44 pm

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): I am delighted to commend the Budget to the House. It sets out the strategy to give confidence to the economy. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has managed to show—despite all the comments that were made in advance of the Budget—how we shall tackle the deficit without damaging the recovery. Those are a difficult pair of aims to pull off at the same time, as all the comments before the Budget made clear. Nevertheless, that is what my right hon. Friend has been able to achieve. He has done it by setting out further ahead than usual what we shall do, and planning to legislate for that as far as possible. I have found during the day or two since the Budget statement that this has been welcomed by businessmen, who themselves have to plan ahead. That is why the Budget is so important for confidence in business.

It is, of course, businesses that create jobs. I know that some Opposition Members find that difficult to accept, but it is a fact. We need sustained growth with low inflation, and that is what the Budget will achieve. That is the primary reason why it is good for jobs, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) said. The hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) spoke as though only infrastructure or spending on training by the Government would create jobs. That is a simplistic approach.

I shall respond to some of the arguments which have been advanced and draw particular attention to two important features of the Budget. First, there are the measures to help small businesses. Secondly, there is the impact of the single market. After all, this is the first Budget of the single market.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls), who for so long and so diligently has championed the cause of small businesses, correctly said that this is a five-star Budget for small businesses. My hon. Friends the Members for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), and others, supported that assertion. It was important that it should be a Budget for small businesses because they are capable of creating the jobs that we need. Stan Mendham, the active boss of the Forum of Private Business, said yesterday that small businesses created about 1 million jobs in the 1980s and could do the same again in the 1990s. I am proud of the Conservative party's record, and that of the Government, on small businesses and of the contribution that those businesses have made to the economic life of the country. It is one of the great changes that we have seen since the socialist years, when large centralist organisations—preferably nationalised—were in fashion.

At first, efforts were directed to help small businesses start. All these schemes were focused on start-up. We are still concerned to foster new businesses, but at a time of recession we need to help existing businesses. Much of the help comes from the things which help every business—interest rates, confidence and other general considerations. There are, however, specific proposals for small businesses in the Budget. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West mentioned especially the loan guarantee scheme. Like him, I am a strong supporter of the scheme. It makes bank finance possible for those who could not otherwise get it due to lack of security to put up to secure a loan or because of an inadequate track record. That is important.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that the premiums would be lowered and, in particular, that they would be a ½ per cent. only on fixed rate lending. That is valuable encouragement to this finance—which is important to small firms. Following the Budget, we are to discuss with the banks increasing the guarantee from £100,000 to a maximum of £250,000—a major increase—and increasing the proportion guaranteed from 70 per cent. in most cases to 85 per cent. There is also a further cut to a ½ per cent. in the premium for loans in inner cities. London has been mentioned a number of times in the course of the debate in that context, although most attention was obviously on the large infrastructure projects. However, it is important in this context too.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West quoted two leading bankers who are in favour of the loan guarantee scheme. As Minister with responsibility for small firms, I know from personal experience of the difficulty of selling the loan guarantee scheme to local bank managers, who are not always keen to take it up. Therefore, my advice to small firms is to ensure that they ask for the scheme, that they press for it if it is the right one for them, if necessary by going to a higher level within the bank, or for that matter by going to another bank. It is not always easy to persuade a local bank manager to go in for the scheme.

There are many other changes to help small firms—in particular, to value added tax. A couple of weeks ago, with our European Community partners, we negotiated a special agreement to raise the maximum for the cash accounting scheme to £350,000 turnover—by far the highest in the EC. In the Budget, my right hon. Friend announced that that is exactly what we are doing. This is a useful scheme, particularly for small businesses which have bad debts or are worried about bad debts. I urge all those firms who are eligible to consider joining if they have not done so already. We are also making it easier to join the scheme and consulting about simplifying the scheme altogether. In addition, we have cut the time limit for all firms for bad debt relief to six months. The need for that came out strongly in discussions with small firms—and large ones, too, for that matter—and their organisations.

We have also improved the VAT penalty regime, as several hon. Members have remarked. We have attempted to keep a balance between the necessity to collect the revenue and the need to recognise the problems that firms, particularly small firms, may have. The VAT penalty regime has to balance the necessity to collect the revenue with a realistic attitude to firms' difficulties. Hon. Members see in their constituency postbags, and from time to time send to me, hard cases of firms with difficulties of that sort. Sometimes one can assist, sometimes not. But most businesses pay promptly and properly and they have a right to expect that we will also collect the proper tax from those who are reluctant. The revenue cannot stop trading with someone it regards as being a doubtful debt in the way that a trader can. That is why we need penalties. We are not relaxing our duty to collect the tax, but we are introducing, for example, flexibility to mitigate penalties, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced, something which was much requested by business organisations.

Another important deregulatory measure which has been mentioned this afternoon is the reform of the system for assessing the self-employed personal tax. Some small firms worried that we were passing over to the self-employed work currently done by the Inland Revenue, making them do more of the work. In fact, self-assessment will be voluntary. It will be able to be on the pay-and-file basis—to borrow a phrase from corporation tax—but the self-employed will also be able, if they wish, to fill in a return and let the Inland Revenue send the bill as happens at present.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made an entertaining and vigorous speech in which he referred to some of this. He did, however, leave one big unanswered question, which perhaps he will deal with at some point—how on earth he and the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) came to be wrapped up in cement bags. He never got around to telling us how that came about, but perhaps he will do so at some later stage.

There were many other measures in connection with small firms which I have no time to go into at the moment. There was the unified business rate, affecting 800,000 properties. Again, in London, 40,000 small shops and 40,000 other business premises will benefit from what my right hon. Friend announced. There were also the prompt payment measures, the capital gains tax scheme, and so on. It is truly a five-star Budget for small firms.

This is the first Budget in the single market and I realise that many people are worried about the effects on trade of the opening up of markets, particularly trade in goods subject to excise duty. Our value added tax is below average in the Community, but our excise duties are higher than most, though not all, in the Community. Every member state has different rates, and that is exactly how it should be. Our rates are fixed here in this country by the House.

We have a land border between Northern Ireland and the Republic and that, of course, is where the problem is, or could potentially be, most acute. Our excise duties and VAT are very similar to but just below those of the Republic for the most part, so cross-border shopping where it is easiest is least distorted with the rates previously and the rates as proposed by my right hon. Friend in the Budget.

With regard to the sea border between this country and the continent, the position is, of course, different. Most of our neighbours there have lower excise duties. That means that, when it comes to personal shopping, there is an incentive which we have always recognised and which was taken into account by my right hon. Friend in making his judgment on fixing excise rates in this Budget.

I will say only two things about this at the moment. First, it is not only the duty but, as far as the customer is concerned, the price that matters. Over the last 10 years the proportion of the retail price of beer and whisky, and for that matter wine, represented by the tax has come down by 10 per cent. and 20 per cent.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman's time is short, but can he answer the questions put by me and my hon. Friends? First, will he reimburse in full the cost to pensioners of the extra VAT on domestic fuel? Secondly, can he confirm that the British Parliament would not be able to return to a zero rate on that fuel under the European agreement?

Sir John Cope: On the first point, I have nothing whatever to add to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said earlier, what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in his Budget speech, and what other Ministers have said in the course of this debate. On the second point, under the agreement made by the last Labour Government, it is true that we should need to renegotiate that in order to lower the rate. That is something which will no doubt be discussed in Committee as we go through these proposals.

Before the hon. Gentleman cut in, I was talking about cross-border shopping. People are concerned not only about personal shopping but also about potential bootlegging—people bringing back and re-selling here goods on which duty has been paid in the Community. These are early days, but the Customs have already caught quite a number of people and there are some prosecutions coming forward. Anyone who thinks of going in for bootlegging should remember that the penalties are severe —seven years imprisonment at the top, but also the duty, plus a fine, while the goods and their vehicles are subject to confiscation. If a pub or an off-licence re-sells bootleg alcohol or cigarettes, those concerned risk losing their licence. The penalties are very heavy and they will be imposed, so those who contemplate going in for it should make sure that they understand exactly the risks that they are taking.

We have had a wide-ranging discussion today. I have not had time to report to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) confessed to liking him. I have to tell my right hon. Friend, when he comes to read it in Hansard, that it was wrapped up a little and was rather a back-handed compliment. The hon. Gentleman was in the course of praising my right hon. Friend for introducing the unified business rate——.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

[Sir John Cope]

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Patnick.]

10 pm

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): At the outset of the debate, I wish to declare an interest: I am president of the Uxbridge Victim Support Scheme, which, like the National Association of Victim Support Schemes, is greatly concerned with compensation for criminal injuries. I have taken this position recently, and I am proud to occupy it.

As the House knows, I am also parliamentary adviser to the Police Federation of England and Wales. However, I wish to make it clear that I am not speaking on its behalf in tonight's debate, if for no other reason than that police officers now account for less than 10 per cent. of all applicants to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and it therefore follows that 90 per cent. are civilian innocent victims of crime.

On 23 November last year, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary announced, in reply to a parliamentary question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), that the Government had decided that introducing a simplified procedure based on a tariff structure offered the best prospects of providing quicker payments to claimants through a means that is fair, straightforward and understandable. He went on to say that further work was needed to develop the practical aspects of these new arrangements, and that that work should be completed by the first half of this year, when a White Paper would be published setting out the details of the proposed new arrangements. He expects them to come into operation this year.

Following that announcement, I decided to apply for an Adjournment debate because I believe, first, that compensation by the state for criminal injustice is a vital part of our British way of life; and secondly, that we should be very careful before we move away from the present satisfactory scheme to one which, although it might be quicker, might well provide the claimant with what I can only describe as rough justice.

It is worth recalling why the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board was brought into existence and why the scheme came about in 1964. It was realised that, in most cases, victims of crime could not bring civil proceedings for compensation against their assailants, because those assailants would be without funds.

The Government of the day recognised that the fact that there are increasing numbers of victims of crime was a sign that society itself had somehow failed the victim by allowing him or her to be assaulted. That being so, perhaps it is right that the Government should ensure that victims receive compensation.

Compensation is treated by victims as a very important part of their recovery, fulfilling as it does their desire for some sort of justice, and the payment of compensation, coupled with the successful prosecution of the offender, is usually a large factor in their recovery.

Victims of crime need proper compensation to reimburse them for their out-of-pocket expenses and to recover from any financial embarrassment that might have resulted from the assault. They also need it to deal with the interests of justice from a personal standpoint.

One important feature of the new tariff-based scheme upon which the Home Office is working could be the complete prohibition of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board making awards for past or future loss of earnings. That is an important point. I hope that I am wrong about that, but if not, it means that 90 per cent. of civilian applicants who suffer injuries so serious that they are unable to earn their livelihood could be obliged to rely on existing social security benefits, which usually would in no way make up for the shortfall in income. It would not be right for any new scheme to deprive innocent victims of crime of the right to recover income lost through violent crime.

The essence of a tariff scheme such as my right hon. and learned Friend is contemplating is to identify types of injury and to give a standard figure of damages for each injury, rather like the Northern Ireland model. If that is the case, I trust that the figures will be increased by the rate of inflation. However, my concern and the principal reason for raising the matter is that huge anomalies are bound to occur.

The recent guidance given to the judiciary and the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board by the Judicial Justice Board identifies types of injury and, according to the seriousness of the injury, gives a bracket within which compensation would be appropriate. The brackets are often wide because it is recognised that each case is individual and turns on its own factors, and that it is impossible to fix a figure appropriate for any type of injury. One broken arm is often different from another broken arm.

The present scheme allows experienced lawyers to study all aspects of the case and to reach an appropriate valuation in accordance with the principles of common law. The system is fair, and puts the criminal victim in roughly the same position as a claimant in a civil case. It must be remembered that there can be no duplication of state benefits. All benefits paid by the state, all private pensions and much private insurance are taken as a credit against damages to reduce the state's outlay.

If a victim is injured by the use of a motor vehicle as a weapon—in other words, if a victim is deliberately run down—that victim can apply to the Motor Insurers Bureau for compensation under common law. If a victim is injured by a very differently shaped piece of metal, such as a crowbar, something which we would all deplore, that victim would have to apply to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and would obtain much less by way of damages. Can that distinction be justified?

My other worry is that, in many types of injury, it will be impossible to provide any meaningful tariff for damages. Facial and bodily scarring, post-traumatic states, stress disorder and sexual abuse, including rape, are obvious examples. How can any standard figure be set for those injuries? Why should not the present system continue, under which damages are assessed by a lawyer, usually a Queen's counsel, who is experienced in the art?

I cannot believe that my right hon. and learned Friend takes the view that changes in the present scheme are necessary to improve the access of victims of violence. That is obviously not the case. I have the terrible feeling that my right hon. and learned Friend's proposed changes to the present scheme are to save the Government money. In other words, the proposals are what is commonly called Treasury-driven.

If that is the case, I do not think that the Treasury is in any position to press my right hon. and learned Friend to save money. At a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee, held on Monday of this week, the deputy secretary who is the accounting officer for an organisation called Forward, a wholly owned Treasury organisation providing catering to the civil service, had to admit to substantial maladministration, to the loss of up to £1 million, to the payment of cash sums to ghost workers who did not exist and also to other malpractices.

When I read the papers for the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee on Monday of this week, I was reminded of my late right hon. and noble Friend Lord Ridley of Liddesdale, to whom I pay tribute, who in 1979 introduced the Ghost Workers (Abolition) Bill. I obtained from the Library a copy of my late right hon. and noble Friend's speech. I was able to deploy it to considerable effect in the Public Accounts Committee and to demonstrate that Her Majesty's Treasury was in the business of employing ghost workers. I thought that that was a particularly splendid tribute to the work in this House of my late right hon. and noble Friend.

If the Treasury cannot even run the modern equivalent of a whelk stall, in the form of the civil service catering department, it is hardly, I suggest, in a position to tell my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to start saving money by reducing compensation to the victims of violence.

According to the National Association of Victim Support Schemes, which is to issue a report entitled "Band Aid for Victims?" tomorrow morning:

"the current scheme has some serious deficiencies".

One of these

"is the long delay before awards are made."

However, the report also points out that this situation has been improved and that the proportion of cases resolved within a year has increased from 25 per cent. in 1990-91 to 49 per cent. last year. The chairman of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Carlisle of Bucklow, himself reminded the victim support association at its annual conference:

"he who gives twice gives quickly."

The improvement in the speed with which the board deals with claims has to a considerable extent resulted from pressure from activity, including the management reviews carried out by my right hon. and learned Friend and in particular by the Home Affairs Select Committee. As a result, working procedures and the turnover of claims has increased enormously. The position is in no sense the same as it was three or four years ago.

I warmly congratulate the board on making the improvements it has. If those improvements are allowed to continue, there can be little doubt, by any standards that my right hon. and learned Friend cares to adopt, that the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board is likely to be meeting its targets. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, targets and milestones—the jargon of management consultants in 1993—are very important and very dear to the hearts of the Treasury, the Public Accounts Committee and this House. There cannot therefore be any justification for changing the scheme, and any suggestion that it can be improved by cutting benefits simply does not stand up to examination.

The present scheme, in fact, excludes classes of people from receiving benefit. It excludes those who have criminal convictions, those whose way of life makes it inappropriate that they should receive compensation, and those who consented to the risk of injury by indulging in, say, a good pub fight. Those restrictions are bound to continue to apply, so the innocent victims—those who are left—will merely suffer potentially vast diminution of benefits.

I wanted to wind up by putting to the Minister of State some questions that I know he will answer with his customary diligence.

How would a tariff scheme take sufficient account of the personal circumstances in a rape case? These cases are tremendously difficult and require careful consideration —not a cheque for £500. How would a tariff scheme take account of the average and future working life of a claimant? Would a man of 75 be paid the same for the loss of a limb as a man of 30 who had 35 years of working life left?

How would a tariff-based scheme take account of the effect of scarring on a young woman with her life ahead of her and with prospects of marriage and a family, compared to the effect on, say, a woman in her 50s or 60s or an older man, whose marriage prospects would not be lessened to the same degree?

How would payment for, say, a broken nose or a broken jaw be calculated? Under the present scheme, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board considers medical and police evidence most carefully. If it did not do so, the payment could be too great.

I do not believe that a tariff system would be quicker than the present system, bearing in mind the need to take into account police evidence and medical reports. If those were to be dispensed with, justice would fly out of the window. Anyone reading the 28th report of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board will be deeply impressed by the fact that, in the year ended 31 March 1992, the board received 61,400 applications, as against 50,820 in 1990-91.

I urge my hon. Friend not to replace the excellent scheme that we have at the moment with a cheaper, tariff-based scheme—a scheme based on rough justice. If the Home Office decides to do that, I for one will have the greatest possible difficulty in supporting it.

10.17 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) on obtaining this debate and on the very courteous and careful way in which he has put his case before the House. I shall certainly do my very best to answer his questions, although, as will be apparent, there are some areas in respect of which I shall be unable, for very good reasons, to give at this stage the detailed information that he has requested.

My hon. Friend mentioned his role in victim support. I congratulate him on his appointment and take this opportunity to pay tribute to the organisation. I too was much taken with the words in its latest press release, issued ahead of the report that is to come out tomorrow. The press release says that payment should be prompt. On that point, there is no gap between us.

This is a very important subject. Clearly it is an emotive issue for many people, and I am grateful for the probing questions that my hon. Friend has put. I hope that I shall be able to allay some of his anxieties and use this opportunity to explain a little more fully why and how we intend to change the criminal injuries compensation scheme.

The Government are anxious to maintain the response to those who are victims of crime that was enunciated in the 1964 White Paper, which first described the criminal injuries compensation scheme. This said that it was right that the public's sense of responsibility for and sympathy with the innocent victim of a crime of violence should find practical expression in the provision of compensation on behalf of the community. We believe that that philosophy is no less valid today. I am glad that my hon. Friend took us back to that starting point, where we share common cause.

The scheme was of course set up to deal with the volume of crime and levels of claims expected to arise in the mid-1960s. I do not think that anyone could have envisaged how, sadly, both have risen or how much more difficult the administration of the scheme would become as the range and complexity of cases increased. Despite the best efforts of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board over the years, there has been an inexorable rise in the backlog of cases awaiting resolution.

The backlog exceeded 81,000 at the end of the financial year 1991-92, and most claimants were having to wait more than a year for their case to be settled. The House will agree that that serves to show just how far we have moved away from the intention of the scheme's founders, which was to provide a quick and simple method of recompensing victims.

As my hon. Friend said, compensation is currently assessed on the basis of common law damages—in other words, what a civil court would award in damages in a comparable case. That process necessitates finely balanced judgments or assessments by board members of the claimants' degree of suffering and financial loss. It tends to make speedy and consistent decision-taking all the more difficult.

Last year, we concluded that the scheme in its present form was intrinsically incapable of delivering the type of service that victims now expect, a service that produces awards reasonably quickly, straightforwardly and in an understandable way. In saying that, I must emphasise that I imply no criticism of the board itself, and join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to Lord Carlisle for his work and that of his colleagues. They have made determined efforts to provide a better service, and with some success. It is rather a reflection of the nature of the scheme itself that we felt that we should consider a better way of delivering payments to victims.

We believed that a scheme based on a tariff of awards, which broke the link with common law damages and with the inevitable delays built into the system, was the best way forward. In order for my hon. Friend's voice to continue to be heard, I must point out that we intend to set out our proposals more fully in a White Paper to be published in the summer. I hope that my hon. Friend will understand that that is why at this juncture we are listening carefully to people's views, and this is the first parliamentary occasion on which we have had the opportunity to do so. Clearly they will be taken into account when we publish the White Paper.

It is important to reflect for a moment on the rules of eligibility which we intend to follow. They are essentially that claimants must have been the blameless victims of a crime of violence, and must subsequently have co-operated fully with the criminal justice services. We do not intend to exclude the police or any other occupational group from the scope of the scheme. There will continue to be provision for cases to be reopened if the claimant's medical condition deteriorates after an award has been made. I hope that my hon. Friend finds that reassuring.

Mr. Shersby: Will my hon. Friend be kind enough to tell the House whether claims under the new scheme will take account of the loss of wages?

Mr. Jack: I shall deal with that aspect in a few moments.

It is important to take some time at this stage to explain the conceptual change in the nature of the new scheme. Many people will accept that no amount of money can fully or properly compensate people for criminal injury, and that it is perhaps unrealistic to believe otherwise. There is no such thing as an "absolute" or "right" figure for the hurt suffered. Awards under common law damages are necessarily subjective, not objective. Even the courts are sometimes accused of inconsistency in the awards they make.

Our new scheme will no longer attempt that almost impossible task. It will continue to provide a tangible recognition of society's sympathy and concern for the blameless victims of crimes of violence. It will do so by making a payment related to the nature of the injury rather than to its effect on the victim. The new system will be based on the tariff or scale of awards under which injuries of comparable severity will be grouped into bands for which a single fixed payment will be made.

We are currently examining about 20,000 cases resolved by the board in 1991-92. That is one third of the cases that it resolved. The extensive case sampling exercise will help to decide how injuries should be grouped together, how many tariff bands there need to be, and what level of payment should be made for each grouping. Our intention is to set the tariff bands so that the average award under the new scheme is broadly the same as the average award under the current system.

I should point out that, in its first full year of operation, the board paid out £400,000 to 1,164 victims, whereas last year it paid nearly £144 million to more than 39,000 recipients. The vast majority of awards were for less than £5,000, with more than 66 per cent. falling within the range £750 to £3,000. The average payment was £3,660.

The design of the new tariff will build on the existing matrix of cases, so allowing us to take full advantage of the collective and distilled experience and wisdom of the present board. The average claimant will receive much the same award as he or she would have received under the present scheme. Our tariff scheme will remain the most generous state compensation scheme anywhere in the world.

In response to several of the points that my hon. Friend made, I refer him to paragraph 8.2 of the board's most recent report, which shows the narrow financial band within which the present scheme operates. If my hon. Friend considers that, and thinks about the element of discretion, that should give him some reassurance that what we propose will build on the collective distilled wisdom gained from what the board has done. Clearly, our mapping exercise will deal with some of the problems that he has put before the House.

I maintain that our new system should be no less fair than the current one. It will ensure that people suffering the same injury receive the same award, which is often not the case now. The payments will still be very generous when compared to those of any other state compensation scheme. In addition, victims may, depending on the circumstances, also be able to look for help from social and other support mechanisms, such as medical and social care, and from unemployment, invalidity and other social security benefits; so victims will still get all the help that the state can reasonably provide.

I should make it clear that there is much further work to be done in drawing up the detail of the new scheme. I mentioned that we envisaged the rules on eligibility remaining broadly as before, but we are also looking carefully at administrative procedures, including the handling of police and medical reports, and at such things as how the body that will run the new scheme might best be organised and managed. I note that my hon. Friend mentioned that most pertinent point.

We aim to introduce the new scheme on 1 April 1994, but claims lodged before then will be resolved by the present board under the current arrangements. Claims lodged after that will be dealt with under the tariff scheme.

We are also determined to ensure that there should be a fair and equitable appeals system. We envisage a two-stage appeals process. The first would be a higher-level review of the papers by the scheme administrators. This should help to sift out frivolous or vexatious appeals and enable any obvious mistakes to be corrected quickly. Stage 2 would be to an independent appeals panel, which might include members of the medical, business, legal and other professions and groups. I am afraid that I cannot answer questions on points of detail involving precisely how the arrangement will work, but such matters will be dealt with in the White Paper.

Of course, there will be an opportunity for the House to consider our proposals when the White Paper is published. It is fair to say that our proposals are not set in stone at this stage. We shall listen carefully to what people have to say. I should be delighted to receive any further input that my hon. Friend wishes to submit. I appreciate that he, like me, is restricted by time in his attempt to get all the detail into tonight's debate. We have already received papers from the chairman of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and from the NAVSS, and we are considering their views most carefully.

I emphasise that we are determined to introduce the new tariff scheme early in 1994, so we shall work hard to settle the details by autumn this year, so that matters concerning communication, the publishing of details, guidance, training of staff and everything else that goes into bringing a complex new arrangement into being can be done effectively and efficiently.

In embarking on an attempt to improve the service to victims of crime, we too are conscious of the issues that my hon. Friend correctly put before the House. The central necessity is to focus on the preparation involved by way of the extensive mapping exercise. That is the way to take the best of what we have now, both in human and in financial terms, and to provide it in a more effective and efficient way to the victims of crime. At the end of the day, it is their interests that must be uppermost in our minds.

We must not forget the relative generosity of our scheme compared with anything else in the world. I am glad that our new scheme will be more effective and efficient, and will remain the best that there is.

Question put and agreed to.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Disabled People

9.35 am

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I seek your permission, Madam Speaker, to introduce the humble petition of 3,627 constituents of the Wirral. It sheweth

That disabled people must have a right to the same equality of opportunity in all respects of their daily life as non-disabled people.

That people who are disabled or perceived to be disabled (for whatever reason) are continually having to face widespread unjustifiable discrimination.

The legislation is necessary to outlaw this discrimination.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your House introduce legislation to outlaw unjustifiable discrimination against people with actual or perceived disabilities as soon as possible.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Tourism

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

[Relevant documents: European Community Documents Nos. 5800/91, 5437/92 and the Decision of 13th July 1992 (Official Journal No. L231 of 13th August 1992) relating to a Community action plan to assist tourism.]

9.36 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Robert Key): This is the first time that the House has had a debate on tourism since 17 June 1988. Business of the House permitting, I believe that we should now have an annual debate on tourism, as befits an industry which is of major importance to the prosperity of our nation—an importance which is set to grow as we approach the millennium.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage very much regrets his absence this morning. He is fulfilling long-standing engagements, including the opening of the Snibston discovery park in Leicestershire.

In 1988, the debate was opened by John Lee, the former Member of Parliament for Pendle, who is still my hon. Friend. He was one of the many people who believed in the future of tourism for this country. He contributes enormously to it to this day. Since he was the Minister responsible for tourism, my noble Friends Lord Strathclyde and Lord Ullswater have been Ministers with responsibility for tourism. They, too, have played their part in a very vigorous way. I am delighted to see that for today's debate there are more Members present on both sides of the House than there were for the debate in 1988.

Tourism's importance to our country can be measured in hard facts. It represents about 4 per cent. of our gross domestic product. It contributes £25 billion annually to the economy and provides work for nearly 1·5 million people—more work than in construction or the health services. Even in a global market of ever-increasing competition for overseas visitors, the United Kingdom is sixth in the world in terms of the earnings from those visitors.

The size of the world market is simply astounding. The World Tourism Organisation calculates that international tourism arrivals rose from just 25 million in 1950 to 429 million in 1990. Overseas visits to the United Kingdom grew by 50 per cent. between 1980 and 1990, a truly remarkable decade for the industry. By the year 2000, tourism is set to be the world's biggest industry.

That emphasises the importance of inward tourism. Last year, a record 18·1 million overseas visitors came to our shores, spending £7·6 billion while here; and on the latest figures, United Kingdom carriers benefited to the tune of £1·9 billion by bringing them here and taking them back. Most visitors come on holiday, some visit kith and kin, but a significant number, around 25 per cent., visit on business.

Domestic tourism accounts for almost two thirds of our tourism earnings—£15·5 billion in 1991. That is not just long holidays of four nights duration or more, although they produce about £6 billion. An increasingly important sector is the short-break market, which is worth nearly £2 billion, and business travel, which produces nearly £1·5 billion. Day trippers spend more than £5 billion on visits to our resorts, attractions and heritage sites—and to the shops. Retailing should not be left out of the tourism equation. Increasingly, it is a leisure activity in its own right. Shopping accounts for about 30 per cent. of all expenditure on day trips, followed by outdoor activities or visits to attractions.

The creation of our Department has given new focus and stimulus to the work that the Government can do in helping the industry to meet the challenge. Tourism provides the opportunity for visitors, from home and abroad, to appreciate and enjoy the country's treasures. It breathes life into our culture and it provides a vital source of revenue to help our arts thrive, to maintain and improve our historic buildings and to help us add to the collections in our museums and galleries. About a third of the audiences for London's theatres are overseas visitors. In 1990, there were 74 million visits to museums and galleries. Last year, more than 5 million people visited English Heritage sites and more than 10 million visited National Trust properties.

In turn, tourism gains from almost everything that my Department does. The work that we undertake in support of the built heritage, museums, galleries, libraries, sport, the performing and visual arts, the royal parks and palaces, film making and the framework that we provide for broadcasting all contribute in a major way to tourism, both for our own citizens and in encouraging overseas visitors. Our heritage, in all its manifestations, is the magnet which draws visitors to these shores.

In the coming year, my Department will spend nearly £1 billion, much of which will directly enhance tourism. That very substantial support is all too often ignored when the Government's commitment to the industry is assessed. People frequently dwell on our support for the tourist boards and fail to see the big picture. Today, I want to shed light on that big picture.

In the Department of National Heritage, we are small in number—about 300 civil servants and two Ministers. We have brought under our one roof so much that interacts to create the quality of our life in these islands. We operate on an arm's-length principle, with 46 non-departmental public bodies, and in partnership with local authorities and the private sector.

My Department exists to facilitate. Let me bring this to life: in the south-west, the chairmen of the regional tourist board, sports, arts and museums bodies have come together to form the South-West Regional Heritage Agency. This is but the latest example of partnerships being formed for the benefit of all. Another is the Peak District partnership, a three-year programme of sustainable tourism. This brings together four regional tourist boards, which will work with local authorities, training and enterprise councils, the Rural Development Commission, the Countryside Commission and the Peak District national park. In addition, there is the Northern Arts initiative. Only recently, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched Chester's cultural strategy. It is a pleasure to see my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) here today.

New examples are springing to life regularly. The six major policy divisions that comprise my new Department have been brought together from different Departments of State around Whitehall, each with its own traditions and working practices. That has brought with it a challenging vitality, which is most refreshing for us all. Our national heritage is a seamless robe and, in order to ensure that the policy work in every division takes account of the importance of tourism, we have recently established a small and dedicated team to co-ordinate effort across my Department.

In the past year, Ministers and officials have visited every part of the United Kingdom to ensure a proper understanding of the responsibilities of our Department. I have criss-crossed the country from Newcastle to Torquay, from Weston-super-Mare to Brighton, from Manchester to the Isle of Wight. It is delightful to see my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) in his seat. He was here for the 1988 debate, as was my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks), who I see behind me.

I have pursued our interests in Brussels, Paris, Seville, Madrid, Barcelona and Rhodes. Next week, I will visit Antwerp and after Easter I will visit Copenhagen and Stockholm. My noble Friend Lord Astor visited New York to open the British Tourist Authority's office, and he will be there again before Easter.

In addition to our work with the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board, I have done business with regional tourist boards representing Northumbria, the north-west, the south, the west country, the east midlands, the west midlands, London and the south-east of England.

Since the creation of the Department, I have enjoyed meeting a large number of organisations representative of this massive industry, such as, and in no particular order, the British Hospitality Association, the Association of Larger Visitor Attractions, the Tourism Society, the British Association of Tourism Officers, the Association of British Travel Agents, the Association of Registered English Language Schools, the Association of District Councils, the British Self Catering Federation, the Rank Organisation, the Forte Group, Thomas Cook, the International Tourism and the Environment Conference, the World Travel Market, the World Tourism Organisation, the World Travel Forum, Blackpool Pleasure Beach, the National Council of Hotel Associations, the Institute of Travel and Tourism, Gatwick Airport Tourist Information Centre, the London Forum, the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, the British Holiday and Home Parks Asssociation and the Association of Chief Leisure Officers. The list may be exhausting, but it is by no means exhaustive. There are almost as many organisations in our other areas of responsibility—the arts, sport, heritage, broadcasting, press and films.

Clearly, it is imperative that all these organisations should be aware of the importance of working together, and Ministers are developing ways of working in a co-ordinated and coherent way with our client groups. Accordingly, I can today announce that, starting in the summer, my Department will be sponsoring a series of regional conferences, chaired by Ministers, designed to bring together representatives of bodies and organisations that reflect Department of National Heritage responsibilities. We will endeavour to share best practice, listen to problems and develop joint approaches where appropriate.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is good to know that the hon. Gentleman is having such an enjoyable time as a Minister, tripping around the country eating these lunches and dinners. I am sure that we are all extremely grateful to him. He mentioned the London Forum. Will he say something about that in his speech and, if not, may I ask him a question? I understand that the London Forum will be launched next Monday with a breakfast that will cost the taxpayer £15,000. How can that be justified? It sounds like a good breakfast—one can get a lot of bacon and eggs for £15,000.

Mr. Key: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be there. I have no idea of the cost of the launch of the London Forum, but I shall make inquiries. It is an extremely important initiative and it would be uncharacteristic of the hon. Gentleman if he were to think that anything but the best will do for London.

I should like to spend a little time outlining our general policy and how we seek to implement it. First, we fund and support the work of the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board in helping the industry to develop the tourism product to its full potential and market it both at home and overseas.

Secondly, we work to ensure that all parts of government take full account of the implications of their policies to the tourism industry, and that unnecessary barriers to its development are removed. We should also recognise that tourism is a partner in the wider leisure and recreation industry. That is increasingly recognised in the new partnership projects that are emerging. For example, last September I launched in Exeter a sport and active recreation initiative sponsored by the Sports Council (South West) and the South-West regional tourist board. There is good reason for optimism when considering the leisure market. The Kleinwort Benson leisure analyst, Paul Slattery, is quoted in the Caterer and Hotelkeeper as saying:

"At the onset of the recession the industry had a knee jerk reaction and thought frivolous spending would be cut. But we believe that the recession has had hardly any impact on leisure demand, which is still growing."

That report pointed out that 23 per cent. of hotels have leisure facilities. With only about 20 per cent. of adults staying in hotels annually, there is a major market to be tapped. The analysts see leisure demand rising to new heights as the decade progresses.

At a time when public spending is under such pressure, our critics ask why we should provide any support to such a successful industry, demonstrably full of entrepreneurs and innovators and, if we are to invest taxpayers' money, how will it be used to best effect.

I recognise that international tourism is fiercely competitive and I have no doubt that Britain will lose out to competitors if we do not continue to promote ourselves abroad. Ideally, the costs of this marketing should be borne by the industry—by the businesses that stand to reap the rewards. But overseas promotion is difficult to organise and the returns to individual businesses may be quite small and unpredictable—not worth the investment, they would say. The industry, unaided, would not put sufficient money and effort into overseas promotion. The tourism industry is particularly fragmented; it covers many sectors and it is not in the direct interests of any one private sector company to promote Britain as a destination.

We therefore recognised the need to maintain the Exchequer grant to the BTA at planned levels for the next three years. The BTA runs an effective overseas operation. It constantly scoops awards for best tourist office, most recently in Ireland. It is held in very high esteem by its counterparts and the industry in other countries. Its campaigns are first class. The "Britain is Great" campaign recently won a silver medal in Belgium and the BTA's "Glimpses of Britain" video won three awards in New York. The BTA is very good at attracting contributions from the industry—around £18 million in the current year, not counting the value of the considerable "in kind" support it receives. The BTA has partnership schemes with British Airways, Virgin, P and O, Sealink, British Rail and Eurotunnel among many others.

Our review led us to conclude that the case for continuing to fund domestic tourism was less strong. British residents are, of course, much more aware of what their country has to offer. There is also some criticism of duplication of effort by the English tourist board, regional tourist boards, local authorities and private sector initiatives. This will be one of the issues that the English tourist board will be examining in assessing its priorities across all its programmes.

We also considered the extent to which the industry has developed since the ETB was established in 1969. The ETB itself has played a crucial role in the establishment of a network of regional tourist boards, forging partnerships between players in the industry and between public and private sector bodies. The scope and effectiveness of trade associations have increased, and new ones have come on the scene. The industry is now in a much better position to take care of itself. At the same time, the ETB, like the BTA, is attracting private sector support for its individual initiatives. For example, more than half the funding for Industrial Heritage Year comes from sponsors such as Grand Metropolitan, Marks and Spencer, British Telecom and Hanson plc.

We therefore concluded that it was now right to reduce gradually the funding we provide for the ETB. We do not underestimate the ETB's achievements, which are considerable and which have helped bring about this change in the nature of the industry. The ETB has also worked to improve standards of service in tourist information centres, which now do an excellent job throughout the land. In accommodation—through the crown classification scheme, the key scheme for self-catering and the Q scheme for caravan, chalet and camping parks—the ETB encourages quality and better consumer information. It has been in the forefront of the development of new products, taken forward initiatives on sustainable, or green, tourism and supported tourism for all, to the benefit of disabled people. Holidays and leisure activity for disabled people represent an important specialist market, as yet relatively undeveloped. Another is business incentive travel, and many more niche markets await attention by entrepreneurs.

Much has been achieved. We believe that the ETB should continue to have an important, but more strategic role. Increasingly, it should focus its resources on particular areas where tourism potential will not be realised without it as catalyst.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend has said about funding for the English tourist board. I have studied the figures for 1995-96 and wonder how he can begin to justify the fact that the English tourist board will receive central Government funds of £9 million, whereas the Wales tourist board will receive £13·8 million and the Scottish tourist board £14·2 million. Why is the English tourist board to be treated as the poor relation?

[Mr. Michael Jopling]

Mr. Key: I was coming to that, but I shall answer my right hon. Friend directly. A number of factors come into play. First, the ETB operates in a market which is substantially more sophisticated, developed and mature than the markets in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, according to the judgment of their Secretaries of State. Secondly, the Secretaries of State for those countries have the responsibility of deciding for themselves what support they should give to their tourist boards. I urge my right hon. Friend to put his question to them as well as to me.

We have concluded that the time is right gradually to reduce the funding that we provide to the ETB. We believe that it should focus its resources on areas in which it can act as a catalyst. It has meant hard decisions for the board and the staff of the ETB, but we have to be sure that taxpayers' money is needed and is being used effectively. We have agreed that the board should take time to reassess its role and its programmes—indeed, we have given it some extra money this year to help it—and I look forward to seeing its plans later in the year. I hope that it will display the vision and enthusiasm that the industry deserves, and has come to expect, from its statutory board.

We are actively involved in a very thorough search to find a new chairman for the BTA and the ETB. This is a very important post and we are determined to find the right person.

In Scotland, the Government remain committed to supporting the tourism industry. Ministers are concerned to ensure that the means by which that support is delivered are still appropriate. They have, therefore, consulted those involved in the tourism industry in Scotland on whether the existing arrangements are effective and, if not, on how they might be improved. I understand that the Secretary of State for Scotland has received some 350 responses to his invitation to the industry to comment. He is considering carefully the opinions that have been expressed, with a view to making an announcement in the summer.

In Wales, a number of policy reviews have confirmed that the relatively undeveloped nature of its tourism sector justifies continuing Government support for the Wales tourist board. The board is currently undertaking a major consultative exercise with the industry and other interested parties, with the aim of drawing up a national integrated tourism strategy, to be announced later this year.

In Northern Ireland, a major review of the tourism industry in 1989 concluded that tourism could make a greater contribution to the local economy. The Northern Ireland tourist board has now been given an enhanced role in developing tourism in Northern Ireland.

Tourism is subject to a tremendous range of policy influences from a broad cross-section of Departments of State, and from the European Community; immigration policy, fire safety, food hygiene, air traffic, road policy, health and safety, licensing laws and Sunday trading all impact to a greater or lesser degree upon tourism. A year ago, the Government published "Tourism in the UK—Realising the Potential", which set out comprehensively the range of activities underpinning tourism, some of which were incorporated into our Department when it was set up a month after publication. I am glad that the undertakings in that document have been addressed.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I constantly impress on colleagues the need for tourism interests to be recognised in the development of policy in other areas. A good example of what we can achieve through this was the recently published tourism planning policy guidance note, which aims to ensure that development plans should contain clearer, tourism-related policies and proposals, with decisions based on up-to-date advice on tourism development policy. Indeed, only the day before yesterday, in Weston-super-Mare, I heard how well the initiative had been welcomed. It is good to see the guidance on tourism development carried forward into regional development plans, which themselves provide an ideal opportunity for the tourism industry to comment.

We need to rid the industry of those unnecessary pieces of legislation which still litter the statute book. Proposals to abolish wages councils are a good example of how the Government have responded positively to industry overtures. That is why I hope that the industry and the House will join me in welcoming the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's initiative to give a new impetus to deregulation, in which the Prime Minister has a great personal interest. Task forces—including one on tourism and retailing—are being established to review carefully and meticulously the need for the thousands of regulations that impact on business. This will supplement the work already going on right across Whitehall to re-examine regulations, to search for ways to simplify them or simply to abolish them. I have invited the industry to help us. We have had many positive responses, and I repeat that invitation today.

For the future, the requirement to publish compliance cost assessment for all new regulations that affect business will very much focus attention on those who are too keen to regulate. We also want consistent and practical enforcement of the regulations. The risk-related approach to enforcement, which my right hon. Friend and Secretary of State for Health is encouraging environmental health officers to adopt, must be right.

Yes, we can help the industry through our funding for our national heritage, and through our contribution to tourism promotion.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I very much welcome what my hon. Friend has just said about deregulation and about advice to environmental health officers, who often bring a heavy hand to these matters. My hon. Friend will be aware that there is great concern in the tourism industry about the impact of what are known as the food safety measures. Does he agree that individual members of the tourism industry, those running bed-and-breakfast accommodation and other representatives of the industry, should be specific in their complaints? It is no use making generalised complaints. They must be specific so that my hon. Friend and his colleagues can do something about the problems.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that observation. I agree with everything he said. We all receive general whinges and moans in the course of our duty as Members of Parliament, and it is just the same for Ministers. What really counts is when people complain about a specific problem, as a number of my hon. Friends have done. I have received a number of delegations on these issues in the past few weeks alone. When people are specific, we can usually help. I should be delighted to hear of individual problems. We can then take action. My hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) has highlighted a number of issues. It is in response to such pressures that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has formally initiated a review of the way in which health regulations are implemented. That can only be good for the tourism industry.

My Department can perform at least an equal service by ensuring that the framework is in place to enable the industry to flourish through the initiative, skills and enterprise of those working in it. A sound economy with low interest rates and low inflation is a prerequisite of a brighter future as we move out of recession. Since September, many foreign tourists have effectively had discounts of 20 per cent. on holidays in the United Kingdom. The lower value of the exchange rate is undoubtedly beneficial. It may also persuade domestic holidaymakers to look again at what Britain has to offer. The answer, they will find, is a great deal.

It is essential that, as in the United Kingdom, European Community policies take full account of the tourism industry's interests, whether those are concerned with transport, with fiscal issues, with data protection, with social affairs or with consumer protection—the list could go on.

That is why the United Kingdom has emphasised the horizontal approach which features so strongly in the Commission's tourism action plan agreed last June. It is also why provision for consultation with industry professionals is included. I wanted to ensure that the plan presented value for taxpayers' money and that it was not so ambitious that it would be impossible to deliver.

I believe that we negotiated modest, but useful, measures to stimulate tourism throughout the Community —measures which respect subsidiarity. For example, the Community is undertaking a programme of studies to inform the industry about current developments. The Community promotes the exchange of ideas and best practice in a number of areas, including visitor management, which is vital in sustainable tourism, and the promotion of tourism by people with disabilities. The main tourism plank of the United Kingdom presidency of the EC, the conference "Tourism and the Environment —Challenges and Choices for the 90s", was widely commended. It was the culmination of two years' pioneering work which has given the United Kingdom a richly deserved reputation for producing the best work available in the world in sustainable tourism. The leading expert, Professor Jost Krippendorf, has said that the United Kingdom's work in this area deserves the tourism equivalent of a Nobel prize.

I now turn to the challenges facing the industry.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Before my hon. Friend leaves the question of the European Community and subsidiarity in relation to tourism, may I ask him whether he recalls that last summer, he told some of us of a rumour, which had begun to gain ground in Brussels and elsewhere, that some of the Community authorities might be asked to bring about a unified promotion of tourism for Europe as a whole in the United States and in other markets for European tourism where we currently have British Tourist Authority offices of our own? Any such policy would be in sharp conflict with the doctrine of subsidiarity. My hon. Friend said that he intended to look into the matter. Will he be kind enough to tell us of the outcome?

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), who has a long memory. Fortunately I have as well, so I remember our conversation. The outcome is enshrined in the agreement we signed, which respects subsidiarity. I was sceptical of the idea that the European Community should promote Europe as a destination in North America and in Japan, for example. I felt that it would be more in Britain's interests if we were there promoting inward tourism to our shores, rather than tourism in southern Europe, for example. That was the outcome of those discussions. It is an argument which, yet again, we have won because we are at the heart of Europe.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Have we not reached a sorry state of affairs in Britain when a Minister who is talking about tourism tells us that in commendation he has received acknowledgements from somebody with a name like Dr. Krippendorf? Have we not reached a sorry state of affairs, as we are caught up in this Maastricht and European Community wrangle, when we have to beg to people like Dr. Krippendorf? What a sorry state of affairs.

Mr. Key: My goodness, the walls of Bolsover castle will crumble at the voice of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). The fact is that because of our supremacy in environmental tourism, we have been widely acknowledged in that area. It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to sneer just because someone has a foreign name. That is not a very enterprising way in which to carry on. I am very proud of the fact that Britain has shown that it is rather better than the Germans, whom the hon. Gentleman is running down yet again. I hope that we can have a more serious debate now.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Key: I certainly will not give way. I want to get on with a serious debate. We can have another exchange on the matter.

Mr. Skinner: We have got another Maastricht debate next week.

Mr. Key: I am delighted. The challenges facing the industry are well exemplified by the hon. Member for Bolsover.

The marketplace is increasingly competitive. Tourists are becoming more selective and more sophisticated. They know what they want and if they do not get it, they will not buy again—they will go elsewhere. Incidentally, there is an urgent need for better communication between providers and consumers in the tourism industry. The industry needs to do more to explain to British as well as to overseas customers how much the product has changed recently. What is the point of the ETB producing its excellent crown grading system if the industry does not explain it to the public?

Our broadcasters and publishers produce popular travel programmes and features which help to spread the word. We are grateful and hope that they will do more. But we must be willing to help them by, for example, facilitating the making of films and television programmes. The industry, local government and, indeed, central Government can all play their part.

[Mr. Key]

What tourists want—what we all want, for we are all of us experts in the art of pleasing ourselves—is quality and value for money. We want a product and service appropriate to the cash we have laid out—and, ideally, just a little bit more. That may mean simple, straightforward cooking and clean sheets—but with a smile accompanying the toast and marmalade, and flowers in the bedroom. It may mean organised and guided tours with a well-informed and entertaining commentary. In the case of Japanese visitors, it means not allocating them room numbers that include the figure 4. It may mean thinking about taking the kids back to that attraction they enjoyed so much in the summer holidays—and finding it is open in the February half-term, at a reduced price and with more staff and shorter queues.

How much better for the visitor to be greeted with a broad smile of welcome at ports of entry, on renting a car, on checking into a hotel or on entering a shop or restaurant. How much better still if this is reinforced by being able to converse in the visitor's own language. The BTA's "Winning Words" campaign has been well received by the industry as a blueprint for adopting good practices in an area in which we have traditionally been weak.

Of course, language is a two-way process. One of our greatest advantages as a tourist destination is our language. We also play host to large numbers of people —particularly young people—who come here to learn English. That sector of the tourism market is worth up to £500 million a year. We must remember that, for young people, the appeal of the country may not be so much for its heritage but in comtemporary music and pop and jazz —and, of course, fashion. And for heaven's sake, let us all be more polite and cheerful to each other and to tourists.

How many people know that it is perfectly possible to fly the Union Jack without any need for planning consent? I have it on the authority of Sir Humphrey himself that, in general, the national flag of any country displayed on a single vertical flagstaff, without any additional inscription beyond the approved design of the national flag, is exempt from planning control—if in doubt, consult the local planning authority. The rest of the countries of Europe fly their national flags; why do we not? Look around. Count the empty flag poles. Too often, even the flagpoles are missing. It is time for us to bring out the flagpoles—and fly our flag with pride.

Tourism is all about finding out what consumers want, and providing it at a price that they can afford. At our best, we can be very good at that. I have already referred to the unique opportunity for the industry to exploit the very favourable sterling exchange rate.

Caterer & Hotelkeeper got it right when it said recently:

"The survivors of the recession . . . are going to be the people and businesses who have listened to what their customers say to them, and have responded to what they hear; who have thought about the way they run their businesses and revisited all their rules and working methods . . . who are ready to tear up the rule book and start again if that enables them to give the customers what they want."

That is the sort of commonsense advice to which I subscribe. So do others, such as the Meetings Industry Association and the English tourist board, both of which have issued codes of practice—an excellent way of setting and maintaining necessary standards.

There is, of course, a need to get the industry's messages right in terms of both content and audience. I commend the ETB's work with the industry on the seaside resorts campaign—showing people in this country exactly what good-quality holidays exist at home. Local associations can also play their part. Through the "Value Rutland Group", potential visitors to the ancient county receive a "Rutland passport", which is stamped when they make purchases at different retailers and restaurants. The inducement lies in a prize draw for those with sufficient stamps on the passport. That is a splendid example of local co-operation aimed at marketing a relatively small area in a novel and innovative way.

Success can be as simple as sightseeing or farm visits. Sightseeing visits in the United Kingdom generated a record expenditure of £880 million in 1991. Revenue rose by 10 per cent. that year. Visits to farms rose by 5 per cent., and this is the second year running that farms have had the fastest visitor growth rate amongst the 10-day visit categories mentioned. Some 81 per cent. have opened since 1980—a much higher proportion than for any other type of attraction.

Of the 345 million day visits made in 1991, 76 million were to historic properties, 58 million to museums, 49 million to country parks, 34 million to leisure parks, 23 million to wildlife attractions and 19 million to art galleries. Visits to garden centres, workplaces, farms and steam railways ranged between 5 million and 15 million.

Many people believe that theme parks are not quite the thing. I think that that is misplaced snobbery. There is a balance to be struck. Neither I nor any serious player in the tourism industry would wish to see the United Kingdom turned into a large theme park. But the best theme parks have an impeccable academic provenance and respectability. Many are endorsed by leading figures in the world of archaeology and history. Just two that would fall into that category are Jorvik and the White Cliffs experience at Dover. I entirely accept that theme parks, along with visitor centres, can do much to quench the mighty thirst for education about and understanding of our historic heritage. In fact, it is increasingly difficult to draw the distinction between a traditional, museum-based approach—for example the dinosaur exhibition at the natural history museum—the entertainment-based approach of, say, Madame Tussauds, and the wider explanation that is so often demanded at world heritage sites such as Stonehenge.

I said that I hoped more Britons would decide to take their holidays at home. Apart from the relative value of the pound, the factors most likely to influence such decisions lie within the control of the industry itself. The last time a Government tried directly to stop holidaymakers going abroad, banks were required to limit foreign currency issued. I well remember my passport being stamped, and all the fiddles that went on. Did it work? Of course it did not. I have no intention of encouraging such a banana-republic mentality, which would achieve little—except, perhaps, flotillas of small boats setting off from our shores, under cover of darkness.

As a former teacher myself, I believe firmly that the future success of the industry depends on a well-trained and flexible work force, able to provide the quality and standards demanded by visitors, and increasingly familiar with the best available internationally.

The education and training system that we now have in place is responding to that need. All those hours some of us spent in the Standing Committee that considered the Education Reform Act 1988 are bearing fruit at last. The national curriculum allows students to study tourism-related topics within main subjects. Study of a foreign language, so important in welcoming the overseas visitor, is now compulsory for students up to the age of 16.

Provision of further and higher education places on tourism courses has risen considerably in recent years. In 1986, just two institutions offered tourism degree courses, with a total enrolment of just over 100 students. By 1991, 13 courses were available offering tourism, either as a single subject or as a major component of the degree, with a take-up of well over 750 students. The Council for National Academic Awards has forecast a remarkable rise to possibly 23 courses by the beginning of the 1993-94 academic year, with upwards of 1,400 students enrolled.

General national and general Scottish vocational qualifications give a broadly based vocational qualification for people working in the industry. A wide range of NVQs relevant to the industry are available from level 1 to level 4. To ensure their continued and coherent development, the Government have funded the Tourism and Leisure Consortium to bring together lead bodies and main players in the development of occupational standards. The consortium will promote those qualifications and ensure their take-up throughout the industry.

I am urging the regional tourist boards and individual businesses—where they do not do so already—to work closely with their local training and enterprise councils to ensure that tourism issues are taken up at local level. That will mean that employers are investing in their own success and employees will have a coherent career structure.

Our tourism industry is indeed big business. But it is about small enterprise. Above all, there cannot be any industry in Britain that relies more on people—people as providers and people as customers. I do not underestimate the recent difficult trading conditions that have affected the industry, not just in the United Kingdom but throughout the world. There is, however, an undoubted enthusiasm and a strong determination to succeed.

It is very much in the nature of a debate such as this that we dwell on the problems. We can never eliminate the negative—and it would be wrong to try to do so. In seeking to accentuate the positive, however, I acknowledge the numerous messages and letters that have come from those throughout the tourist industry and across the country who have expressed a welcome for the establishment of the Department of National Heritage, and great confidence in their own ability to succeed. That includes interests based in those parts of the country that have felt the chill winds of recession most severely.

In its regional strategy for the south-west, the South-West Regional Planning Conference has articulated its key strategic principle of tourism:

"Encouragement, renewal and promotion of the region's tourist industry must be focused on the achievement of quality and the regeneration of existing resorts, with recognition of the varying physical and environmental capacity of different areas to accommodate the pressures"

The Government will indeed encourage the industry and recognise the pressures. But not according to yesterday's sepia-tinted rule book. That is not in the interests of the small businesses that make up the back-bone of the industry. Nor is it in the national interest. The Government have created the first new Department of State for 30 years specifically to uprate the importance of all those features of our national life that make Britain world famous. Tourism is the golden thread which runs through all our Department's areas of responsibility. In proposing a new blueprint for the future, we offer new partnerships and new horizons.

The tourism industry has come of age. It is a huge success. Its rich diversity and maturity are envied across the globe—and our achievements are widely imitated. It is our purpose to ensure it keeps its place, with pride, as a world-class industry.

10.19 am

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): The Opposition very much welcome this debate on tourism which, as the Minister said, is the first such debate for five years. It would be churlish of Opposition Members not to recognise the part played by many Conservative Back Benchers who have helped to bring the debate about. After hearing the Minister, I am sure that many of them are wondering whether their efforts were really worth while and whether the Minister's journey was necessary.

The Minister promised us the big picture, and he gave us the small screen. Simply trotting out figures and statistics that we could have obtained from the House of Commons Library is no substitute for Government policy which should relate to the problems facing the industry.

The Minister gave us an impressive shopping list of future visits. My colleagues who are shadow National Heritage Ministers would very much like to participate in some of those visits. However, when my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) wanted to go to Dover to see some heritage sites, the Fees Office asked her to pay her own fare. We are therefore limited. It is a disgrace that the Opposition cannot pursue their proper function without having to pay the fares involved. I hope that the Minister will rally to our cause because very soon, of course, he will be in opposition himself.

People, particularly those in the tourist industry, must have been bitterly disappointed by this week's Budget which gave the industry very little. I did not hear the Minister bemoan that fact. I need hardly tell him that there is great foreboding, despite the picture he painted, within the tourist industry about the Government's lack of commitment, and in particular the lack of commitment of the National Heritage Department, for the industry.

Morale within the English tourist board and the British Tourist Authority is at an all-time low. The English tourist board in particular, with 40 redundancies recently declared, is at a low ebb. Is it any wonder that William Davis has resigned from the chairmanship of both the ETB and the BTA in utter disgust at the way in which the Government view tourism in this country? He believes that a fragmented industry like tourism, made up mostly of small business men, needs Government help if it is to prosper. The Opposition share that view.

I accept that the Minister cannot be blamed for all the ills facing the industry. In the past decade, there have been numerous acts of treachery by a host of Ministers responsible for tourism.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): The hon. Gentleman said that the industry is very fragmented and comprises many small businesses. Those are the very businesses that will have welcomed the Budget, as it was a deregulating Budget, which modified VAT thresholds and increased the loan guarantee scheme. It was actually a Budget for small businesses. The tourist industry reflects the economic climate. As that economic climate improves—and the Budget will help that—so the tourist industry will benefit.

Mr. Pendry: Once more, the hon. Gentleman shows that he is absolutely out of touch with reality. Those of us who have been in touch with people in the industry over the past few days since the Budget know that that is not the case. At best, many of them are saying that it is neutral. However, the Budget is certainly not welcomed.

During the decade in which the treacherous acts occurred, every sponsoring Department cut funding and reduced staffing levels at the BTA and ETB. Therefore, perhaps we should not have been surprised that the Chancellor did not do overmuch for the industry in his Budget. When the Chancellor was the Trade and Industry Minister responsible for tourism in 1983, he cut the grant to the BTA and the ETB. That resulted in 50 job losses.

In 1989, the current chairman of the Conservative party, then the Secretary of State for Employment, announced changes that resulted in 150 job losses. Now, in 1993, out of a total United Kingdom establishment in those boards of 340, 72 posts have been lost as a result of cuts in funding by the current patron of tourism—the Department of National Heritage.

The situation is bound to worsen this year and next unless the projected grants in aid to the ETB for 1994-95 and 1995-96 is restored to current levels. Any cut in funding to the ETB is bound to have a dramatic effect on the BTA. I accept the praise that the Minister heaped on the British Tourist Authority, but it is no use his playing one off against the other.

Both organisations have been inextricably linked for more than a decade through the establishment of common services departments. That relationship has had to change this year, with the BTA increasing its share of the common costs. If the funding for the ETB continues to decrease, it is obvious that the BTA will be forced to absorb the whole cost of common services—a cost which it cannot afford to bear.

Those additional costs come on top of the reduced spending potential of the BTA's grant in aid following the devaluation of the pound. That will dramatically reduce the BTA's overseas spending capacity by, some say, up to 15 per cent., as most of its expenditure, as the Minister is aware, occurs overseas and is payable in local currency.

Even a Select Committee on Employment report in 1990 recommended that an increase in funding for the BTA's overseas marketing would produce significant returns. Without adequate resources for the BTA, the United Kingdom is unable to compete effectively for the international tourist trade. In 1991, Aruba—a small South American country in the Cayman islands—spent more on destination advertising in the USA than Britain. That is a disgrace.

The way in which tourism has been shunted around from Department to Department and from Minister to Minister has not helped to stabilise the industry or helped its morale problems, However, the buck now stops with the Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage. He must carry the can from now on. To show the feeling out in the real world, I want to quote from an editorial in the latest publication of Travel GBI:

"The government is supporting neither tourism in general, nor England in particular. No-one in Cabinet is fighting tourism's—or England's—corner. Ministers need to be made aware that the patience of the United Kingdom tourism industry is exhausted and that the time has come for action. Perhaps withdrawing Robert Key's invitation to British Travel Trade Fair, where he would bask in the reflected glory of a battered but still remarkably successful industry which neither he nor his colleagues have done anything to support, would be a start."

I do not know whether that invitation has been withdrawn, but an invitation to that fair is winging itself to me as I speak.

What are the major casualties of the current cuts? They include the elimination of the common services division set up by the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) in 1983. I am told that its director and a number of staff have been made redundant, and were given five days to clear their desks. That is, of course, no way to behave towards staff who served tourism so loyally over the years. However, what is worse, they have taken with them a wealth of knowledge and experience, particularly in areas of information collection. Perhaps the Minister would inform the House whether the future of £2·5 million tourism database is secure.

Another casualty of the cuts has been the tourism resource library—a net revenue earner, and the only tourism reference resource if its kind in the country—which is invaluable to industry and educational bodies. The abolition of the post of resource manager threatens the continued publication of three widely used research reports. I understand that messages of concern are flooding into the boards in respect of the future of those reports. Will the Minister give the assurance that that fine service will not be eroded along with the jobs?

The tourism information centre network is one of the ETB's major achievements. It has taken 21 years to build it up, and it has been instrumental in spreading the benefits of tourism throughout the country. However, many at the ETB believe that the network cannot survive with so many of its team being made redundant. The loss of the BTA's product marketing department will affect the board's ability to stimulate the marketing campaigns which have so often generated a huge amount of free press coverage for Britain.

The list that I could recount to the House of the important areas of activity that will be affected by Government cuts is indeed long. I hope that other hon. Members will deal with areas of concern other than those that I have highlighted. However, it is clearly absurd for the Secretary of State to maintain:

"the case is now much less strong for central Government funding of the promotion of tourism in England."—[Official Report, 13 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 997.]

I know that Conservative Members, who perhaps are being rather loyal today, nevertheless share that view.

Is it any wonder that the staff of the English tourist board, who were not given the opportunity to contribute to the review to which the Minister referred, reached that conclusion and are at a loss to understand how the Government, who purport to support the tourist industry, can allow such destructive cuts to be made?

Is it not ironic that, at the time that the Government were announcing a reduction of £6 million in their funding to the English tourist board over the next three years, they managed to find £6 million to support an arts festival in celebration of the Prime Minister's uneventful presidency of the EC? Why were not the commercial friends of the Tory party asked to stump up that cash, instead of taking it from tourism? I bet that the hon. Members for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) and Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks), who is not in his place, would have loved to see a slice of that money, as would other hon. Members from both sides of the House. It is amazing how easily the Government can abandon their commercial principles in such situations.

The March edition of Holiday Which? graphically points out that the historical sights of Britain leave a lot to be desired, yet we have relied on the historical significance of those sights in the past to attract visitors. It is clear that there is an urgent need to face ever-increasing competition from abroad.

As the Minister said, it was a welcome initiative of the English tourist board to launch its £650,000 campaign to promote English seaside resorts in 1992. It is vital that our domestic tourist market be promoted, but £650,000 is a relatively small figure when set against the £100 million which tour companies and overseas Governments spent last year in persuading Britons to holiday abroad.

With the Minister commending the English tourist board's initiative, it is disgraceful that the Government turned down a request to give a mere £150,000—the same amount as that provided in 1992—for this year's initiative. I hope that the Minister will reconsider that matter and perhaps do something about matching those funds.

Britain's tourist industry needs resources to develop its considerable potential for growth. Let us face it: how many potential areas of growth are there at present? The Government must invest more if Britain is to maintain its share of tourist receipts in the face of increasing competition from abroad—especially from the United States, France, Italy and Spain. While it is right and proper that Britain needs to spend substantial sums on promotion overseas to maintain the increasing incoming tourism to this country, it is equally important that the Government increase funding for the promotion of United Kingdom holidays to the domestic market, because it helps to create and maintain jobs and naturally has a positive effect on the balance of payments.

As Baroness Young pointed out in another place, the tourist industry is the fourth highest earner of invisible exports. Indeed, if restaurant and theatre earnings were included, tourism would be the highest invisible export earner. In 1991, invisible earnings grossed £109 billion, producing a surplus of £7·5 billion, compared with a £10·3 billion deficit on visibles.

Clearly, the cuts to the English tourist board and the British Tourist Authority will not help the situation in future. Many small hoteliers do not have the clout to promote themselves in domestic or overseas marketplaces. Of course, the Government may well feel that the recent devaluation of sterling and the general recessionary pressures will camouflage the underlying problems of our tourist industry, but is it not ironic that the biggest boost to United Kingdom tourism comes from the Government's own economic failings?

The proportion of overseas visitors to the United Kingdom is not all good news, either. Recent figures show that a high proportion of overseas visitors are here, as the Minister acknowledged, on business and not pleasure. One might surmise that they are foreign salesmen engaged in activities that will increase the United Kingdom's import bill. From any close analysis, it becomes abundantly clear that the economic potential of the tourism industry is not being realised, and that the United Kingdom's competitive performance is in decline, despite what the Minister said this morning.

I hope that the Minister had an opportunity to read the fine publication from the National Economic Development Council's working party on competitiveness in tourism and leisure. That body gave an informative insight into the current state of the British tourist industry, which is perhaps why it was abolished in June 1992. Figures from the report highlighted the fact that the United Kingdom's share of world arrivals was the same in 1990 as it was in 1970. Indeed, the share in receipts generated from those arrivals declined from 6·1 per cent. in 1970 to 5·6 per cent. in 1990. [Interruption.] It is no good the Minister chuckling at those figures.

Mr. Key: That is an entirely false way of looking at those arguments. If one is looking at the massive development in the world market, it is not surprising in the least. The hon. Gentleman should address the fact that Britain remains one of the top six destinations in the world. He should be proud of that fact, not denigrate it.

Mr. Pendry: I will not give way too much to the Minister, who distorts the argument. I shall continue with my speech. I shall make a much more constructive speech than he gave.

According to the provisional figures issued by the World Tourism Organisation, the picture has worsened in 1991 with the United Kingdom's share of world arrivals falling to 3·7 per cent. while its share in receipts fell to 4·9 per cent.——

Mr. Brandreth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pendry: No, not again. I know that many hon. Members want to speak, including the hon. Gentleman.

Overall, investment in the tourist industry for the first half of 1992 declined by £2 billion compared with the same period in 1990. That is happening at a time when capital values for hotels have fallen dramatically throughout the country. A record number of hotels are in receivership. Soon, the banks will own more hotels than the major hotel chains.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pendry: No, I will not. One of the most significant reasons for the lack of investment and development in new tourist facilities is the withdrawal of section 4 grants to England in 1989. The Scottish and Welsh tourist boards operate with rather more help from central Government. They receive a constant level of grant in aid, as well as section 4 assistance. Also, the national boards for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland have independent powers to market overseas: England does not.

I read in the current edition of Tourism Enterprise that, following a delegation to the Minister, the hon. Member for Cornwall, North said:

> "When asked why it was that tourism in Scotland and Wales had maintained their funding levels whereas the ETB funding had been drastically cut", the Minister allegedly said:

> "they had a Minister batting for them".

If that is true, it is a disgracefully complacent remark. We had hoped that the Minister was batting for England when his colleagues were batting for their boards.

Mr. Key: No.

Mr. Pendry: I am glad that the Minister is denying that. I hope that the hon. Member for Cornwall, North will put his own point of view if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that the Minister will address the remarks of William Davis, who said:

"The Ministers for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland clearly take a different view of the domestic market than the Department of National Heritage. In the next financial year, for example, Scotland and Wales will each receive almost as much money from the Government the ETB and the 11 English regions combined. It is a pity that there cannot be an agreement on a common policy."

I concur with that, because many regions of England are every bit as deserving of those grants as Scotland and Wales. There seems to be a clear lack of fairness and balance in the allocation of those grants. The Minister must address that imbalance, as there has been an increasing fragmentation of the tourist industry in recent years.

If the United Kingdom is to improve its competitiveness, every organisation that is contributing an element of the total holiday experience must play its part. Mr. John Lee, who is a former Member of the House and a former tourist Minister, stressed, in an article in this month's Leisure Management, that he favoured an increasing partnership between the private sector, local authorities and the Government. If ever he was considered—rumour has it that he was—as a replacement for William Davis as chairman of the BTA and ETB, he blew it when he stated in that article:

"There is a clear need to convince government of the importance of increasing tourism funding, and that means making individual MPs more aware of the role of tourism in their own constituencies . . . I have always argued for government to give more funds to the industry."

He also shared a belief with the National Economic Development Council that a national body is needed to co-ordinate and bring the regional tourist boards together, ensure participation in national schemes and also lobby and advise Government on tourism in England.

Mr. Waterson: In his discussions with hoteliers and the like in his constituency or other constituencies, has the hon. Gentleman ever made clear to them the implications for their businesses of his support for the social chapter, the continuation of the wages councils and other anti-competitive measures which would effectively put many hoteliers out of business?

Mr. Pendry: I am amazed by that intervention. If the hon. Gentleman were to look at some of our competitor nations in Europe who have the social chapter and a minimum wage and at the graph in Holiday Which? this month, he would see that those nations are much more competitive than we are, even with those wage levels. Anyone can go to the Library and read that; it is a fact.

Some local authorities within my region of the north-west are already working with the private sector to market and develop their tourist attractions, but, without adequate funding at national level, the regions cannot co-ordinate their efforts. The potential success of implementing a policy that pulls all the tourist attractions in a region together and selling that region to tourists across a wide range of attractions is clearly the way forward.

We really do live in a beautiful country, and we do undersell it. If one looks at the north-west, for example, where my constituency lies, we can see the North-West tourist board actively working closely with local authorities and the ETB to develop new tourist site opportunities, as well as infrastructure improvements on existing areas of interest.

Let us take Blackpool. I am sure that, if the hon. Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson) catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will expand on the tourist industry in Blackpool. I understand that Blackpool is embarking on a scheme such as I have described. Blackpool council is working with Blackpool Pleasure Beach and Blackpool Leisure Co-operative—two of the area's major private leisure industries. Blackpool football club is developing a super-stadium for not only its soccer team—which is not doing quite so well as it should at the moment—but for Pavarotti or Madonna concerts. It is also developing a new built-in hotel complex.

Liverpool council is also working with the private sector and British Rail to provide visitors to the city with complete tourist packages. Those exciting developments, coupled with the natural beauty of the Pennine range and the nearby Lake district, should be expanded upon in a regional context, but we need an English tourist board with resources to bring them together within a national strategy.

While I am dealing with the north-west, and perhaps wearing the shadow Minister for Sport hat, I must ask how the Government can be committed to the Manchester 2000 bid and not develop the tourist industry to the full in that region. I can tell the Minister from my experience that the International Olympic Committee members, and particularly their wives, have to be sold a diverse and interesting package of tourist and leisure facilities alongside the sporting ones on offer.

Opposition Members and, I suspect, many Conservative Members believe that investment in Britain's tourist industry is vital. It may well be that the sun, sea and sand sightseeing tour which dominated the 1980s is in decline. The forms of tourism that are expected to grow faster in the next decade are cultural tourism, active sport-related tourism and rural tourism related to local crafts and products. Those forms of tourism can make Britain's climate less of a drawback and its historical heritage an even greater asset.

We need a tourist policy that takes advantage of the EC action plan, because it is chiefly in the context of regional development plans that EC funds can be accessed. The debate gives us all the opportunity to give the Government notice of the hon. Members who represent constituencies throughout the land want—indeed, they are determined to ensure that tourism is taken seriously and funded properly. I certainly welcome the Minister's statement that we shall now have an annual debate on tourist. The more debates we have the better. The tourism industry deserves nothing less.

10.44 am

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I begin by commenting on two of the points that my old friend the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) made. First, I associate myself with his welcome for the creation of the Department of National Heritage to embrace tourism. That seems a logical place to put tourism. In recent years, as the hon. Gentleman said, we have had too much of tourism being bandied from Department to Department simply because a Secretary of State felt that he did not have enough work to do or enough responsibility. That is no way to treat tourism.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his team are now looking after tourism within the context of their overall responsibility. However, I did not agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments on the Budget. It is appropriate that the debate on tourism comes in the middle of the wider debates on the Budget in which the House is engaged. The Budget has been warmly welcomed by many people, especially people in the tourist industry, who largely own small businesses.

I quote as an example a letter that I received, funnily enough, only yesterday from the chairman and managing director of one of Lake district's largest hotel groups. He said:

"On a personal note, I thought the Chancellor's budget was strategically very sound for the long term interests of the country."

To demonstrate his impartiality, he followed that up by saying:

"This is the first kind thing I have said these last 3 years of either him or his predecessor."

The Budget was good for the tourist industry.

Of course, I am principally interested in the tourism industry in the Lake district, which I have supported for many years in the House and about which I have spoken on many occasions. It is by far the most important industry in the Lake district. It involves 40,000 jobs directly and indirectly, and has a turnover of £364 million.

The Budget has been warmly welcomed. That comes on top of the welcome given to the abolition of the wages councils. The various VAT concessions in the Budget are warmly welcomed. So, too, are the new arrangements for capital gains tax, which will be helpful to many of my constituents.

The third particularly welcome factor is the freezing of transitional help with the uniform business rate. That has been warmly welcomed. However, in that context, I wish to make a point that is not the direct responsibility of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage. I shall take it up in the next day or two with the Treasury. However, I should like my hon. Friend to look into the problem, which I regard as serious. It is summed up in a letter that I was handed literally on my way to the Chamber this morning. It is from one of the largest firms of chartered surveyors, which is a specialist hotel rating valuer in the north of England. The firm, which is based in Leeds, expressed to me its serious anxiety about the way in which its appeals against rating assessments, in the hotel industry in particular, are being dealt with in Cumbria. First, it refers to the delays at the Cumbria valuation offices. The letter states:

"We had a period of 18 months when the valuer who had dealt with hotel business rating was taken off that work to carry out Council Tax work and in that period, no progress was made."

The revaluations have caused my constituents great difficulties and for their appeals to be delayed in that way is very serious.

I apologise for raising this subject in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks), but the same firm has brought another factor to my attention. The letter states:

"The Lake District rateable values represent a disproportionate comparison with potential trade, and as compared to other areas such as York and Harrogate where we have successfully obtained reductions of between 25 per cent. and 50 per cent. of rateable values, the Valuation Office in the Cumbrian area seems not to be prepared to listen to logical and realistic argument."

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will agree that those are serious allegations and that they are harmful to the tourist industry. I hope that, with me, he will look into them with the Treasury.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend will recall that I had the honour of serving as a Minister with responsibility for local government finance and I understand the importance of those issues and the way in which they can, we hope, be sorted out. I will draw those important matters to the attention of the Minister responsible for local government and I very much hope that a solution will be found.

Mr. Jopling: The Minister is exceptionally helpful. Finally, perhaps my hon. Friend might be good enough to take up, or bear in mind, a third matter that has been drawn to my attention by the same firm, which told me that some people in the hotel industry are paying too much. The letter says:

"but what I am also concerned about are the people that do not seek professional advice and I am finding in many cases are paying far more in rates than should be necessary."

That is a serious matter, which causes me a great deal of concern.

In an admirable opening speech, the Minister said that the tourist industry is fiercely competitive, and so it is. Countries throughout the world are spending huge budgets to try to entice tourists. We know how popular foreign travel is becoming. We also know that, with the coming of the channel tunnel, more of our citizens are likely to be tempted into the delights of foreign travel, which will put pressure on our domestic tourist industry. Small fragmented businesses—many family controlled—face the problem of massive bills for publicity, which is essential for the success of the tourist industry.

I speak for all of the north of England, and I believe that a massive publicity effort is essential to publicise the region. I am frequently amazed that so many people in London and the south of England have a negligible knowledge of the north of England. Too often, overseas tourists and many of our citizens spend time visiting London, Stratford, and perhaps Oxford and Cambridge, but then take a jump up to Edinburgh, ignoring the north of England.

I shall give two examples of what they are missing. I am astonished at how few people in this country are aware of Durham, which is one of the almost unknown glories of England. Anyone who has been there never forgets it. Also, few people know the English Lake district where, as the House knows, we have one of the world's greatest heritage sites. Apart from the beauties of the lakes and mountains, there is the rich heritage of Wordsworth, De Quincey, Coleridge, Ruskin, Beatrix Potter and Arthur Ransome, to meet all tastes. I do not need to explain that to the Secretary of State, whose knowledge, interest and participation in the Lake district is so well known—especially his active participation in Dove cottage, the old Wordsworth home.

How are those massive and essential publicity schemes to be financed by businesses that are generally small and family run? That question demonstrates why the role of the regional tourist boards is so vital. Cumbria is well served by the Cumbria tourist board, which does a fine job under the presidency of our old friend Willie Whitelaw and the chairmanship of Mrs. Sheila Hensman. They get only one quarter of their £1·8 million budget from the Government and the rest is raised locally, so there is no question of the Cumbria tourist board lying back and expecting the Government to do everything for it.

I welcomed the Secretary of State's statement that central Government support for the regional tourist boards will be maintained, as that is essential and it is not as though the Government are supporting everything. They are making a vital, minority contribution and most of the money is being raised locally. What concerns me is that the continuation of such support is likely to denude the English tourist board of much of the budget that it needs to do all the other things besides supporting regional tourist boards.

I have been told that as a consequence of the new arrangements, the budget of the English tourist board, after it has financed the regional tourist boards, will be reduced from about £8 million to about £2 million. I know that many of my constituents are worried—they have told me so—about the effects of such a large reduction in the activity of the English tourist board. Again, I shall quote from a letter that I received yesterday from the chairman of one of the largest hotel groups in the Lake district. Speaking of the importance of the English tourist board he says:

"Because of this fragmentation"— of the industry—

"it is vital that there is a 'central' organisation to look at standards; education and training; product development".

I am alarmed about the reduction in available money, but, above all, my constituents are outraged about the issue on which the Minister was kind enough to give way to me during his speech—the totally dispropotionate amount of money that will be available to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland in the financial year 1995-96. They can see no justice in the English tourist board getting £9 million from central Government when Wales gets £13·8 million, Scotland £14·2 million and Northern Ireland £11·5 million. It has been suggested, for example by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, that the reasons for the discrepancy are that the Secretaries of State for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are more enthusiastic and vigorous in their support for tourism, and my hon. Friend the Minister did not dispel my suspicions in his reply to my intervention. That simply will not do. There is no reason to treat England in a niggardly way. I hope that the Government will look at the matter again, because my constituents see no reason whatever for such disparities.

10.59 am

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I am about to be interrupted by the forthcoming statement, but I shall start. I welcome this opportunity to raise an issue that has caused me some concern since last summer, when one of my constituents visited my surgery. It is the issue of holiday insurance, especially as it relates to coverage for accidents and illness abroad. Ironically, by raising the matter, I may do something for the home tourist industry, which is obviously important. I shall disgress slightly.

It being Eleven o'clock, MADAM SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 11 (Friday sittings).

Liquor Licensing

11 am

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I apologise to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) for interrupting her speech.

With permission, I should like to make a statement. I am today publishing a consultation document inviting comments on a number of proposals for possible further changes to the liquor licensing laws of England and Wales.

It is nearly five years since the Government's last substantial reform of this area of the law took effect. The Licensing Act 1988 allowed public houses and other bars to stay open on weekday afternoons and for an extra hour on Sunday lunchtimes. It also introduced certain other procedural reforms and tightened up the law on under-age drinking. That measure is generally regarded as a success.

In keeping with the Government's step-by-step approach to reform in this area, the time is now right to consider what further changes are desirable to ensure that licensing laws are kept up to date.

The first of the proposals in my consultation paper is the replacement of the absolute discretion that the licensing justices currently enjoy over the grant of most licences. I propose that the only grounds on which such applications might be refused in future should be specified in statute, as has been the case in Scotland for well over a decade. This change should, I believe, make the licensing process clearer for all those involved with it, and also more consistent in its application throughout the country.

The grounds on which an application for a licence might be refused are set out for comment in detail in the consultation paper. Briefly, they concern the suitability of the applicant to hold the licence, the suitability of the premises for the purpose for which they are intended and whether the use of the premises for the sale of drink is likely to cause public nuisance or a threat to public order and safety.

We will also consider the important issue of whether under any new arrangements the licensing justices should continue to have the power to refuse new licences because, in their view, there are already sufficient licensed premises in that particular locality, and therefore no need for a new one.

I appreciate that this is a question on which strong opinions are held on both sides. My consultation paper sets out for comment the arguments for and against the inclusion of any "need" criterion among the grounds for refusing a licence. The Government have not yet made up their mind either way on this issue, and will consider very carefully the responses to this section of the consultation paper.

The second proposal is the introduction in England and Wales of a system of children's certificates for the bars of licensed premises similar to that which came into operation in Scotland in January 1991. This would permit, after a successful application to the licensing justices by the licensee, the admission of accompanied young children under 14 years of age into suitable bar premises in certain defined circumstances—for example, for a family meal—and then only up until, say, 8 o'clock in the evening. These arrangements have worked well in Scotland, and it is time to consider their introduction south of the border.

Coupled with this is a third proposal for the introduction of a new category of licence which would authorise the sale of alcoholic drinks in café-style premises, without a bar counter, provided that food and non-alcoholic drinks were on sale at the same time. Accompanied young children ought, we think, to be allowed into such premises, but again perhaps only up to a set time in the evening.

The Government would welcome views on both the principle and the detail of these proposals, which are aimed at providing greater choice for the customers of licensed premises, particularly families with young children. They should also encourage competition and generally higher standards of provision for customers, assist the tourist industry and help to promote the further development of premises for civilised moderate consumption of alcohol, instead of heavy drinking.

I must emphasise that, although these proposals envisage greater access by accompanied children to licensed premises than is now permitted by law, the Government have absolutely no intention of relaxing the prohibition on the sale of alcohol to young people under 18, and their consumption of it in the bars of licensed premises.

The final proposal set out in the consultation paper is the abolition of the Welsh Sunday opening polls, following any which might be called in 1996. Only one Welsh district is now dry on Sunday, and the Government believe these polls have become increasingly anachronistic, as well as unjustifiably costly. This is, I am glad to say, essentially a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

I am asking that comments on all the matters set out for consultation in the paper, other than those simply concerned with the Welsh polls, be sent to the Home Office by 30 June this year. Comments on the future of the Welsh polls should be sent direct to the Welsh Office by the same date.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I thank the Home Secretary for his statement. Does he accept that, as in Scotland, there must be rigorous controls on the granting of children's certificates? Does he agree that their purpose is to allow families to enter pubs together, not to encourage children to drink? Given the enormous problem of under-age drinking in Britain and the link with crime, will he endorse and implement his Department's proposals, set out almost six years ago, to prevent under-age drinking?

How many café bars have been licensed in Scotland? Does he recognise that the success of café bars abroad is at least as much due to the habits and traditions of the countries as to their licensing laws? Potentially, the most far-reaching part of the statement is the proposal canvassed in the White Paper to remove the criterion applied by licensing justices of "public need" when deciding whether to grant a licence.

I entirely agree that there should be much greater consistency in the granting of licenses, and that the criterion of public need should not be used simply to fortify a local monopoly or to deprive local consumers of choice. However, I should like to offer the Minister a strong counsel of caution in this area.

First, does he not understand that, in abandoning an anti-competitive view of public need, he should not abandon the whole notion of public interest? There may be good reasons—to do with disturbance to local residents, the character of a town or village or the dangers of trouble and difficulties of policing—to limit the number of pubs. The interests of local people should not be cast aside simply in the commercial interests of those who want to open more public houses.

Secondly, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the problem in many parts of the country is not the number of pubs that want to open and are prevented from doing so by the licensing laws, but the number of pubs that are closing and being boarded up? Does he accept that, whatever the motivation of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report of three years ago, when the brewers had to sell off pubs, last year was the first year since 1960 that the number of licensed premises fell? There are now 2,000 fewer pubs than there were in 1989, and there is a greater concentration of ownership.

Does the Home Secretary agree that the practical consequences of his proposals should be their test? Will he comment specifically on recent reports from Australia that deregulation has led to lower standards and a spate of liquidations? If regulations on the numbers of pubs are relaxed and families use pubs more often, as many want to do, is there not a powerful case for that to be balanced by a much stronger and better defined criterion of a fit and proper person to hold a licence? Is it not high time that some form of structured training and qualifications were demanded along with the licence?

These important proposals can dramatically affect the leisure of our people and the culture of our country. Will the Home Secretary ensure that they are subject to genuine and open consultation, going far wider than the vested interests simply of the industry concerned, so that the right decisions in the public interest are taken?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about under-age drinking. Our proposals must be accompanied by continued stringency to avoid under-age drinking. We are talking about encouraging families to have access to premises in suitable circumstances, where the licensed justices agree that the environment is a suitable one for families to gather in. It could be argued that we could help to tackle the problem of alcohol abuse by introducing children to the moderate consumption of alcohol in civilised settings and more up-to-date circumstances in the company of their families.

About 1,000 café-style licences have already been granted in Scotland, and the innovation appears to be a success. Many people in this country are accustomed, when abroad, to being able to consume alcohol in a variety of circumstances, not just British pubs. Many foreign visitors to this country are perplexed at the narrow range of premises where alcohol is available. It is worth looking to see whether we should follow the Scottish precedent.

I share the caution of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) about whether need should be taken into account when granting licences. I accept that we must canvass carefully and ensure that we protect any legitimate public interest when deciding whether to open new premises. We must be certain that the licence holder is a fit and suitable person, and I will consider the suggestion that we should define the role carefully.

We must ensure that the premises are suitable in every way—that includes considering the impact on the surrounding area of the premises to be licensed. Public order and safety are also important issues. We must consider whether, having considered all those aspects, need also constitutes a criterion.

It is true that some pubs have closed in recent years, but there are still 13,500 more licensed premises than there were 10 years ago. The recent changes are the result of the changing commercial pattern and changes in living habits. The proportion of the population who were accustomed to going to traditional pubs has fallen, and more people now consume alcohol at home within the family environment, and look to different forms of leisure and entertainment. It should help the licensed trade, the tourist industry and other sectors if we update the licensing laws, make them more flexible and allow alcohol to be consumed in a greater variety of premises.

The hon. Gentleman stressed the importance of undertaking the widest possible consultation, and I agree with him strongly about that. A weakness of public consultation in this country is that, all too often, the only responses that the Government receive are from predictable, often legitimate, vested interest lobbies. It is difficult to achieve a genuine consultation process that involves the general—the man and woman in the street. We need to receive the public response to our proposals, together with the responses of vested interest groups.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Before calling other hon. Members to speak, may I ask for brisk questions and answers, as the statement is eating into today's debate?

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I congratulate my right hon and learned Friend on his statement, which will help to resolve the problems of the serious increase in drinking by the under-nines that was highlighted in a recent report—the numbers have doubled in recent years.

Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider the important issue of public houses being able to stay open longer? Only three months into the single market, 10 per cent. of the drinks brought to this country by one means or another come from the European Community. There has been no prosecution, and there are no proper guidelines on that subject. What can be done about that? If we do nothing, there will be no pubs left.

Mr. Clarke: Customs and Excise should be enforcing the law against abuses of the single market provisions that have come into effect. I share my hon. Friend's concern about the impact that the changes are having, particularly on the south of England. My proposals should enable us to counter those effects to some extent if they enable the owners of English licensed premises to contemplate more attractive and up-to-date ways of offering alcohol for sale —undoubtedly, home-sold alcohol.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): While welcoming in principle the move to lay down criteria in statute, I share the caution already expressed and wish to make three specific points. First, will the Home Secretary look again at the complicated and confusing rules relating to types of drink? Secondly, does he propose to look again at the extension of licensing hours as a follow-on from today's statement? Thirdly, will he comment on the need to tighten up the measures relating to the provision of alcohol to drivers? Is it not time to consider incorporating into law some undertaking to enable the licensee to take away the car keys of a driver to whom he is selling alcohol?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman means when he speaks of the confusion over types of alcohol. If he writes to me, I will give him a considered response.

I am not canvassing further changes in licensing hours in the consultation document, as the hours were changed only recently and I am not aware of any widespread demand to reconsider them. I anticipate that people will respond to many aspects of the licensing laws once the document goes out to consultation, and we will consider the responses.

There is far more respect now for the breathalyser and drink-driving laws, and there has been a welcome change in the public's attitude. We are always looking at ways to improve the enforcement of the law, and I shall certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's suggestions, although they are essentially matters for the Department of Transport.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): My right hon. and learned Friend's announcement today will be warmly welcomed. As he probably appreciates, the Isle of Wight licensing bench is one of the largest in the country. I believe that its clerk has, from time to time, advised my right hon. and learned Friend's Department on regulations.

One of my constituents, Mrs. Sketcher, has had her licence refused only this week. Her premises are unusual, but highly popular with visiting yachtsmen from the East Cowes marina. The island attracts many overseas visitors to events such as Cowes week, and they can never understand the peculiar licensing laws affecting who can enter pubs in this country.

Is there any possibility of today's announcement dealing with the serious restriction on the off-licence trade imposed by the Sunday licensing hours operating only between 12 noon and 2 pm, which is a cause of great irritation to visiting yachtsmen to the Isle of Wight who cannot restock their victuals in time to catch the start of a race?

Mr. Clarke: I think that our licensing laws have been a source of bewilderment to most overseas visitors for many years, but they are improving and are less confusing than they were. I think that the Isle of Wight will undoubtedly benefit from the changes that we are canvassing. The proposals will make clear the grounds on which licences can be refused and, in some cases, will allow discretion to be exercised.

I would not presume to comment on the premises in the marina mentioned by my hon. Friend, about which I am sure the Isle of Wight licensing justices know more than I do. We are not canvassing further changes in the licensing hours, as the House discussed that subject only five years ago. If the response to the consultation document reveals a widespread feeling of the sort anticipated by my hon. Friend, we shall consider including that subject the next time the House considers legislation on licensing laws.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is there any truth in the rumour that today's statement should have been made yesterday, but the Home Secretary could not get to the House of Commons as he was stuck at Cheltenham guzzling ale?

Does the Home Secretary realise that some people in the House and many outside believe that, the last time the law was changed, it marked a retrograde step, and that the present proposals will make matters even worse? The idea of taking young kids into cafés and other places when they are 13 and 14 years of age and educating them on drinking is nonsense. The Government will be putting it on the national curriculum next—but that is about as much as we can expect from a Government who are concerned not about the social fabric of society but about putting money in the pockets of brewers, who then transfer it to the Tory party. What can we expect from this place, when there are 16 pubs in the Houses of Parliament?

Mr. Clarke: First of all, not a drop of ale passed my lips yesterday at Cheltenham, which seemed a suitable place in which to celebrate my right hon. Friend's Budget, which was being discussed in the House. It received a warm welcome among the crowds at Cheltenham and elsewhere, and I have returned to my duties today.

The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said that the reforms of five years ago were widely unpopular. As so often, he is completely out of touch with public opinion, and reactionary and out of date in his views, which are not in tune with modern society. His idea that we propose introducing children to traditional pubs shows a complete misunderstanding. Justices will not give children's certificates unless they are satisfied that the setting is suitable. But the hon. Gentleman must be one of the few people who defends the idea of families sitting on a sunny day in the garden of a public house in a perfectly civilised setting enjoying their day out and then, if it rains, not being allowed to take their children into the building even though there may be a perfectly suitable part of it in which children could be introduced to liquor in civilised surroundings or spend time with their families.

Consultation always gets more than one reaction, but I think that the hon. Gentleman's reaction is that of an embittered, left-wing and rather out-of-date reactionary.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's recognition of the needs of families with two parents and children who can be introduced with no danger to public houses and other places where liquor is available. May I draw to his attention the real problems resulting from older teenagers, perhaps from broken families, who tend to drink in pubs until late at night and then go out into communities smashing shop windows, urinating in gardens and causing a hullabaloo that disturbs the peace of law-abiding citizens? Will the consultation exercise consider such problems? If not, we shall be failing our electors.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend that the problem of alcohol abuse of all kinds is closely connected with a great deal of crime, with large numbers of social problems, and with quite a bit of disorder. Traditionally, the licensed house was a pub—often a pleasant and civilised place of the sort to which many of us doubtless go. But the tradition was also one of male heavy drinking, rushing towards early closing time. Nowadays, there is the additional complication of teenagers drinking strong lagers in the kind of setting that my hon. Friend describes.

The consultation document does offer the prospect of a more civilised approach. The sort of premises encouraged by what we are canvassing are those where families will be present—that is, people of all sexes, and children—and where their children, only if accompanied, will be able to enter settings which the licence justices have been satisfied are the right sort, where families can have a meal, snack or other refreshment together. In itself, the exercise will not tackle the real problems that my hon. Friend describes, but it is certainly a step in the right direction, towards introducing more civilised drinking habits to this country.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Northern Ireland is often considered here to be a restrictive society, but in many ways we have always been ahead of England and Wales in our licensing legislation. I had the honour as a Minister to introduce a major reform of licensing more than 20 years ago in Stormont. One of the provisions was to allow drinking in public houses from 11 am right through to 11 pm.

The Minister referred to café-style licences. Will alcohol be sold in these cafés to people who are not having a meal? If so, will not that be a retrograde form of unfair competition with public houses, which make a major contribution to local government finance and which have to fulfil strict criteria to be given a licence? It seems that these cafés will be able to sell alcohol and be, in effect, public houses without a bar.

Mr. Clarke: I acknowledge the right hon. Gentleman's first point. In the mid-1970s, I tried to introduce a private Member's Bill on licensing—it included the idea of children's certificates and café-style licences—and it was greeted by huge opposition, on the ground that we were about to take the nation's children to alcoholic ruin. Since then, Northern Ireland has had the experience of licensing reform. Scotland led the way with licensing reform, but it took the English many years to discover that reform had led to improvements in the social climate surrounding licensed premises in Northern Ireland and in Scotland. So we are catching up slightly.

Experience in Scotland of children's certificates and of café-style licences has generally been regarded as beneficial. I was wrong to refer earlier to 1,000 café-style licences. I should have referred to about 1,000 children's certificates being issued in Scotland. Rather fewer café-style licences have been granted. We shall have to look into what difficulties there may have been.

Café-style licences will involve alcohol being sold with or without meals. For such licences, it is necessary that food and non-alcoholic drinks should be available as well, making such cafes like tearooms or continental cafes, in which some people will be having food, others drink, others non-alcoholic drinks, and so on. Children can be brought in, and there will be competition, although it will not be unfair competition. This will widen consumer choice and increase the number of outlets. Such outlets will be particularly attractive in areas frequented by tourists.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I warmly congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on updating a very outdated system. That will be welcomed especially by families. I hope that the idea of parents leaving their children at home is now a thing of the past.

I should like to ask the Home Secretary to clarify his answer to the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler). Will both wines and spirits be served in family areas, or will only wine be served, bearing in mind that children will be present?

Mr. Clarke: No, children's areas will sell the same range of alcohols as are sold in the rest of licensed premises. The children's certificate will allow accompanied younger children to go to these areas, because the licensing justice is satisfied that they are suitable parts of pubs or restaurants for children to be taken to. There is no question of a children's certificate restricting the sort of alcohol that adults can consume in these areas.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May I take the Home Secretary back to the question directed to him by his hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway)—about the vast amount of alcohol coming into this country through cross-border shopping? He said that that could be dealt with by making premises more attractive, but the fact is that it is the price that attracts the booze, not the circumstances in which it is drunk. We have a bootlegging industry in this country; it is of concern to the licensed trade and to everyone else, because much of the drink is being sold on. What will the right hon. and learned Gentleman do about this thriving bootlegging industry which has sprung up, especially in the south of the country?

Mr. Clarke: Customs and Excise will enforce the law against imports of liquor which break regulations and go beyond the single market arrangements which allow people to bring in drink for their own consumption. Operating a single market within which there is differing taxation on various goods will always promote scope for smuggling. That is what the Customs and Excise are for: to take action against such smuggling.

Because there is such a wide discrepancy in the duty on spirits, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor felt restricted when it came to raising duty on spirits. The country could have done with the revenue, but we have to be alert to the need to reduce the incentive for smuggling, which will certainly be tackled with all vigour by the Customs and Excise.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I also warmly welcome today's statement. Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that one of the lessons of the relaxation of licensing laws in Scotland has been that fewer cases of drunkenness have been reported? Will he further agree that many visitors to this country find that London and our other great cities close down at 11 o'clock, which inconveniences them? Will he elaborate on the flexibility of hours and on the possibility of extending drinking times in pubs?

Mr. Clarke: Certainly the impact of Scottish licensing reform in the 1970s was wholly beneficial when it came to directly drink-related offences. In the light of that, we introduced the reforms in England five years ago. I am not sure how much further measurable improvement has resulted from café licences and children's licences, but I think that the general reaction in Scotland is that they were a further beneficial step which improved Scottish drinking habits—as I hope they will eventually improve English drinking habits as well.

We will consider representations about the 11 o'clock factor, if we receive any, although we are not canvassing further views on hours. There are plenty of licensed clubs available after 11 o'clock, and I am sure that my hon. Friend would like us to consider whether there may be undesirable effects arising out of the fact that only certain types of premises stay open after 11 pm, attracting large numbers of young people, whereas ordinary premises close then.

We are moving step by step. At the moment, changes in the hours are not a further step that we are contemplating.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): When pub landlords decide what facilities to provide, they do not have to consider just the state of the law and the market. They also have to consider the considerable pressure that the brewers place upon them. Will the consultations take into account the link between brewers and landlords and the considerable pressures that landlords are under?

Mr. Clarke: There will be nothing in my consultation document about that. The complex relationship between brewers and landlords is affected more by the changes to the landlord and tenant law, the effect of the untying of premises and so on. That is changing considerably the world of the licensed premises. However, it is not for me to intervene in the relationship between brewers and their tenants. I hope that the changes that we are canvassing will benefit customers by producing an ever-wider range of choice and type of premises available.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): My right hon. and learned Friend's statement will be welcomed by the tourist industry. In the context of this morning's debate, we have been talking about product development. Café bars and children's certificates will be particularly relevant. Can my right hon. and learned Friend reassure me that the tourist industry will be involved in the consultation process, and that its input will be very much taken into consideration?

Mr. Clarke: I hope that the tourist industry will respond strongly. I share my hon. Friend's views. The growth of the tourist industry is extremely important to this country. As a result of the devaluation of the exchange rate, we need to see a very considerable surge in tourism, which is potentially one of the major sources of new employment that we can hope to see.

I shall be amazed if the tourist industry does not welcome my proposals. I hope that it will respond with vigour to counter any doubting voices. If we implement these proposals, I see great potential for expanding employment and for improving the attractiveness of those places that bring in foreign visitors.

Tourism

11.31 am

Questioned again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

Dr. Lynne Jones: Like many of those hon. Members who have spoken during the last half hour, I agree that the Home Secretary's proposals will help our tourist industry. Furthermore, as the mother of two young sons, I welcome them. During the 10 years that I have been a parent, it has become obvious to me that families with children are made much more welcome abroad when they visit cafés and restaurants than they are in this country. Anything that encourages families to spend more of their leisure time together is an excellent idea.

There can be no greater pleasure than seeing a parent playing snooker or darts with his or her 10, 11 or 12-year-old child. That is far better than children being left on their own on the streets, and being bored, while the parent goes off to drink with other adults. We in this country seem not to like children very much. Adults appear to think that, to get the most enjoyment out of life, their leisure time should be spent away from, rather than with, their children. Therefore, I welcome these proposals, which I hope will encourage families to spend more time together.

We all agree that tourism is important to our economy. Although that is not the main burden of my speech this morning, even a city such as Birmingham is conscious of the need to attract visitors.

My hon. Friends and I are, however, concerned about the low rates of pay that many workers in the service industries have to put up with. We do not agree that the introduction of a minimum wage would be harmful. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) said, countries such as France that have a minimum wage are the most popular tourist destinations. According to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, France attracts the largest amount of foreign investment. Growth in foreign investment there in recent years has outstripped growth in this country.

Therefore, we do not accept the pronouncements of those who sit on the Treasury Bench. The Department of Employment published information that linked minimum wages and employment and provided 26 references, of which only 10 established a link between minimum wages and unemployment. Most of the information showed that the opposite was the case. It suggested that, provided that minimum wages were not out of step with other wage rates in the economy, they could promote employment.

It is about time we knocked on the head the idea that our policies on the social chapter and a minimum wage are detrimental to the economy and employment. If some of the low-paid workers in my constituency were paid a little more, they might be able to buy some of the goods and services that their fellow citizens are producing and thus help to ensure that they keep their jobs.

I want to take this opportunity—something which has delayed my return to my children this morning—to refer to holiday insurance, particularly the insurance cover provided when British tourists fall ill or sustain injuries while abroad. Hon. Members may, like me, have been on package holidays abroad, for which they have taken out insurance. We often do so without thinking. We accept the insurance policy that is offered by the travel agent, or which comes as part of the holiday package, without thinking too much of the consequences. The experiences of some of my constituents and others who have contacted me suggest that we should take more care.

Last year, 12 million people took out holiday insurance cover, and 800,000 of them made a claim—a quarter of them for medical bills. According to a survey carried out by the magazine Which?, of over 56,000 of their readers, 18 per cent. suffered illness or accident while abroad.

Many of us, when we go abroad, also heed the advice in the Department of Health booklet "Health Advice for Travellers". It explains the reciprocal arrangements, under form E111, for mainly European Community countries and also Gibraltar. The booklet refers to a range of medical care that is available under the reciprocal arrangements and says that, outside EC countries, the health services that are likely to be provided will be less than those we can expect under the national health service and that only urgent treatment is likely to be provided.

Quite rightly, that booklet encourages tourists to take out insurance. It says:

> "No matter where you are travelling, the cost of medical treatment may not be fully covered by any existing reciprocal health care agreements—make sure you have adequate private medical insurance."

Furthermore, it advises people to check the small print. The booklet gives the impression that to take out medical insurance is all one has to do for peace of mind.

Unfortunately, as my constituent, Dorothy Savage, found to her cost, that was not the case. This lady went to Malta for a Christmas holiday. While she was there, she unfortunately contracted gastro-enteritis. Apparently, there was an epidemic in the island at the time, about which she had not been warned. She was taken to St. Luke's hospital in Malta. In hospitals such as St. Luke's the standard of care that is available even to people who have taken out insurance is, unfortunately, far less that that which we might expect here.

I have seen photographs taken by Mrs. Savage's daughter of the conditions in that hospital. They were far from hygienic. The linen was torn and not in a very good state. Most important of all, the majority of nursing care in such hospitals has to be carried out by friends and relatives of the patient.

One evening, after Mrs. Savage's daughter had had an exhausting day looking after her mother and had decided that her mother was well settled and that she could go back to her hotel to get some rest, some problems unfortunately arose. Mrs. Savage was left without any attention. After she had called for a bed pan, she waited for six hours; she hoped for some assistance, but none came. Eventually, she tried to get out of bed on her own. Unfortunately, she slipped and broke her leg. When her daughter returned early next morning, she found that her mother was not in the usual place, and that she had undergone emergency treatment.

Miss Savage immediately contacted the tourist representative, who put her in touch with the medical insurance representative. Seven or eight days later, that representative contacted her, during which time her mother had been kept in quite appalling conditions without adequate care. She was left without a catheter in urine-soaked sheets, which would not have been changed if her daughter had not changed them. When Mrs. Savage was provided with a catheter, it was not changed throughout her three-week stay.

Insurance policies often claim that air ambulance repatriation is available, which Miss Savage tried to arrange for her mother. It was not available, but Mrs. Savage was taken home on a scheduled flight on a stretcher across three seats that had been booked for the purpose. Unfortunately, when she arrived at the airport, Mrs. Savage started haemorrhaging and the pilot would not allow the necessary drip on to the plane. The medical adviser, Dr. Angel—unfortunately, he did not administer angelic treatment for Mrs. Savage—advised that she should not travel without a drip, which, I am sure hon. Members will agree, is fairly basic medical epuipment.

Mrs. Savage was flown home two weeks after the incident. Despite her broken leg, she was forced to sit upright, the medical adviser having instructed that her plaster be removed above the knee. Sadly, when she returned to the United Kingdom, her condition deteriorated rapidly and she died.

Mrs. Savage's family had expected their family holiday insurance to cover them for treatment in a better hospital and better transport home. Mrs. Savage is not alive—directly, in my view, as a result of the unfortunate events that took place during her holiday.

A couple from Perry Barr in Birmingham were on holiday in Malta. The lady was knocked down by a Maltese driver and admitted to the same hospital as Mrs. Savage. Nursing care, again, was non-existent. She suffered multiple fractures to her leg, which was operated on and put in plaster. She experienced severe pain following the operation due to excessive swelling. The stitches burst as a result and her leg became ulcerated.

Unfortunately, the insurance agent was not helpful. He tried to return the lady home more quickly than he should have, because he was worried that the couple might sue the driver who knocked them down, for which his company would have had to pay. That couple had to return on a scheduled flight, with the lady's leg in plaster. She still suffers problems as a result of the medical treatment that she received in Malta.

Vera Willey was admitted to Clinica Benidorm with a chest infection. Her companion was not allowed to stay with her and had to return to Britain. She was left alone for 13 days as her daughter, who was in the United Kingdom, was unable to arrange a flight home. She was finally flown home in a Swiss air ambulance 13 days later and admitted to Dudley road hospital. Her treatment was delayed because the only documentation that she had with her was in Spanish. Having seen a translation, the medical adviser recommended that Mrs. Willey should be transported by air ambulance, which took 13 days to arrange.

Again, sadly, that lady died a day after she returned to the United Kingdom. her bed sores were down to her bones, and her chest area and arms were bruised from flooded intravenous drips and injections. She had been very frightened during her stay, and had received no bilingual assistance.

Molly and Frank Hudman were on holiday in Sorrento when a wall collapsed on them. Mrs. Hudman was badly injured and had several broken ribs. Fortunately, her husband received only superficial injuries. When they were in hospital in Sorrento, they had to rely on the relatives of other patients for basic medical care—to watch them during the night and to provide bed pans and drinks. They were able to communicate only because one of the patients in the ward spoke good English.

I have discovered that, in countries such as Malta, Italy and Greece, it is normal for nursing care to be provided by relatives and friends rather than by the hospital.

In other countries, it seems that people who are taken ill are almost forced to have unnecessary treatment. "Watchdog" recently broadcast cases in which people who had been on holiday in Tenerife and Spain were forced to undergo unnecessary medical treatment.

Ann Caldwell, a nurse, was admitted to Clinic San Eugenio in Tenerife suffering from a stomach infection. She was given an electrocardiograph and an abdominal X-ray without checking to see whether she was pregnant. She was an infectious patient, yet she was put in a ward next to a girl recovering from surgery.

George Deeley from Leamington Spa was admitted to the same clinic with a cut nose. He was put on a drip, confined to hospital for several days and given surgery against his will. Unfortunately, he had handed over his flight tickets and pasport to hospital officials, as requested, who refused to return them until he had complied with the treatment. He and his wife were frightened by the experience.

Another hospital in Spain sought permission from the medical assistance company to carry out a complicated operation for which the surgeon had received no training and had seen only a video tape. Spain has two types of hospital—the public hospitals, which generally offer high standards of medical care but perhaps less comfortable surroundings, and private clinics. It seems that British tourists who have medical insurance are encouraged to undergo private treatment, whereas they would probably receive better treatment under the normal reciprocal health care arrangements.

I have taken up those cases with the insurance industry, and would like to comment on some of the information that it has provided. The Association of British Insurers says that it is well known that medical facilities in some parts of the world may not always be of a standard that we have come to expect in this country. That is accepted, but, according to the advice issued by the Department of Health, it is the very reason why people take out medical insurance.

The association says that, although insurers will do all they can to ensure that the medical treatment arranged is of the highest standards available in the locality, it is not in a position to guarantee or influence the standard of health care available. It would be useful if it included that advice in the information that it gives its customers. The same applies to other aspects of the policies.

In responding to my questions about the use of air ambulances, Commercial Union said that there was a great deal of misunderstanding among the general public —including general practitioners—about exactly what an air ambulance is. The perceived impression of the policy holder is of an aircraft fitted with emergency medical equipment and constantly on standby, similar to road ambulances. In fact, that is not the case.

Air ambulances tend to be executive jets with the seats removed. The medical equipment taken on board the plane is exactly the same as if repatriation were to occur by scheduled or even chartered air liners. Commercial Union also said that air ambulances should perhaps more correctly be termed "air taxis".

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): The hon. Lady makes an important point about repatriation from overseas. I have an interest in this issue, as declared in the Register of Members' Interests. She might be interested to know that the Foreign Office recommends only two companies for the repatriation of remains from overseas, which gives rise to a considerable increase in the costs to insurance companies. That is one reason why holiday insurance is becoming so expensive.

Despite the endeavours of myself and others to try to expand the information issued by consulates and embassies across the world, the Foreign Office has been quite difficult about allowing the information to be expanded to include other companies within the United Kingdom.

Dr. Jones: I thank the hon. Member for his intervention. However, the Department of Health makes no recommendations about insurance companies. There are a number of policies available, and I shall refer later to the practice of companies when selling those policies.

A company called Home and Overseas Insurance also responded to my questions. It said that air ambulances are usually used only in life or death cases, and that patients can be transported on life support machines with the plane equipped as a mini-intensive care unit. I contacted one of the companies that provides such a service and was finally convinced that air ambulances really exist. The company in question runs three, which are executive turbo-props. About 150 cases a year are flown home using that service. That is rather different from the impression given about the availability of such a service.

The company states that air ambulance planes are usually very small and cramped and, for European journeys, often do not have even toilet facilities. It believes that some members of the public may have a "glamour vision" of what an air ambulance is, but such planes are less comfortable than scheduled flights and often have to make a couple of stops for refuelling, which can be unhelpful and perhaps even a matter of life and death in itself when transporting urgent cases. Other insurance companies to which we wrote responded in similar terms.

Why has that information, which the industry has made available to me, not been made more widely available? Why is it not contained in the brochures? Other services offered in many insurance policies and in many brochures include multi-language assistance and co-ordination. The cases that have been drawn to my attention suggest that such a service is not widely available, or, if it is, is used only in very rare cases or is available to a limited extent.

Under the package tour regulations, brochures are required to contain information about health formalities, including optional travel insurance, but those requirements need to be strengthened if the reality of the services available in the countries to which I have referred is to be brought home to people who, in the words of the insurance policies, believe that they have peace of mind when they pay their premium. It would also be welcome if the Government would consider providing local authorities with additional resources to enforce the regulations.

Only the day before yesterday, the Office of Fair Trading highlighted the malpractice occurring in the sale of insurance policies. As I have done in the past, people often buy the insurance policy that comes with their package, not knowing that the tour organisation is getting up to 40 per cent. commission for arranging the policy. The travel agent may seem disinclined to point out that cheaper, and perhaps even more comprehensive, policies are available which really offer an air ambulance service.

There are also exclusions in many policies, which are not drawn to people's attention or which are in very small print. Under the Jetset comprehensive travel insurance, the definition of an injury is one which occurs fortuitously but does not include an injury caused by, or which results from, sickness, disease or a gradually degenerating illness. People with medical problems should have such exclusion clauses drawn to their attention, but, judging from the cases pointed out to me, that does not happen.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) said that cheaper policies were available. A reader of The Times wrote from London to say that, if she had booked her holiday insurance with her package, she would have been charged £29, plus £12 for an over-65 surcharge, but that, by shopping around, she was able to get insurance cover for £15·50. That individual was shopping around for a better price, not to find out exactly what cover would be provided if she were unfortunately to fall ill or have an accident.

Another letter that I received from a lady in Cheshire states that an insurance company refused to pay back a deposit of more than £300. She had unfortunately had to cancel her holiday because her husband was unwell after heart surgery. She had tried to complain to the insurance ombudsman, but the company was not a member of the insurance ombudsman's bureau, so she was unable to get help from that source. Perhaps the Government should reconsider their decision not to make an arbitration scheme similar to that run by the insurance ombudsman compulsory, so that citizens such as that lady receive a proper service.

I have attempted to draw attention to the problems that can occur when people go abroad. I have drawn attention to the fact that many hospitals abroad rely heavily on patients, family and friends for basic care such as washing or even feeding patients, for providing and changing bedpans and even for the provision of basic items such as toilet paper. I have mentioned the misleading and—to use the industry's word—"glamour" image created by the brochures of the availability of air ambulances. I hope that, as a result, the public at large will be more aware of the problems and that the industry itself will take note and provide better information.

I should like to encourage the Government to review the booklet containing information about travelling abroad and to ensure that it gives more information about the health services available abroad. The Government should also correct the impression given by the booklet that, by taking out medical insurance, a holidaymaker is not dependent on the medical care available for the rest of the population at their holiday destination.

Some of the issues that I have raised, especially about the way in which descriptions give misleading impressions and about the way in which insurance is sold—sometimes by agents who do not even have copies of the policy available—suggest that the Government should consider the operation of the holiday insurance industry. I hope that the Government will take note of those points and that they will take whatever action is needed to ensure that, when British citizens go abroad, they get the treatment they would expect in this country, or, if that is not available, that they are flown back to the United Kingdom in suitable aircraft and in a way that is not detrimental to their health.

11.59 pm

Mr. Harold Elletson (Blackpool, North): As the representative of Britain's, if not Europe's, leading tourist resort, I feel today rather like the king of the jungle. I am surrounded by hon. Friends and hon. Members who represent lesser tourist resorts. I feel like a lion surrounded by alley cats—[Interruption.]

Mr. Pendry: That went down well.

Mr. Elletson: I thought that it would. My comment went down well with the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) who made kind remarks about the great resort of Blackpool. I know that he has often visited the town and I was especially grateful for what he said about the partnership between the local authority and the private sector. He mentioned a number of examples, especially the development of the new football super stadium. I know that the hon. Gentleman has visited Blackpool football club when the team have played somewhat better than has been the case recently.

As the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde said, this is the first tourism debate in the House for five years. I and some of my hon. Friends are a little disappointed that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) should have spoken for almost half an hour on overseas tourism. That may be of great concern to many of her constituents, but her speech frustrated the opportunity for many of my hon. Friends to raise subjects relating to the far more important issue of the state of the British tourism industry.

Mr. Jessel: Is not the answer that the hon. Member for Selly Oak should tell her constituents to take their holidays in Britain? They could, thereby, if they fell ill, take advantage of our excellent national health service and boost the tourism industry in Britain, which is what we are supposed to be doing today.

Mr. Elletson: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It would have been more appropriate for the hon. Member for Selly Oak to raise the topic in an Adjournment debate.

Dr. Lynne Jones: By raising the issue, I may encourage more people to stay in this country, which would be welcome. However, many people choose to take their holidays abroad and it is important that when they do so, potential problems should be drawn to their attention. The information provided in booklets, such as that produced by the Government, should be adequate. The Government have a responsibility in the matter.

Mr. Elletson: I am sure that the hon. Lady has a point, but I believe that there are more appropriate occasions for making it than a debate on British tourism and the problems faced by the industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I draw to the hon. Gentleman's attention the fact that the debate is not purely on British tourism.

Mr. Elletson: I understand that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the hon. Member for Selly Oak raised her concerns absolutely legitimately. None the less, the British tourist industry faces severe problems. It is a highly important industry and it is appropriate today that we should discuss those problems with the Minister, in the first debate on the subject in the House for five years.

I greatly welcome the Minister's statement that there will be a tourism debate once a year from now on. That will be greatly welcomed throughout the tourism industry and will do a great deal to dispel some of the increasingly widely felt disillusion in the industry, as will the Minister's undoubted enthusiasm for the subject. He gave us today a highly enthusiastic performance. So great was his enthusiasm that it seemed almost to conjure the Home Secretary out of the ether like some latter-day Ariel to give us a bit more good news. What the Home Secretary said about licensing regulations is good news for the tourism industry. What could be better than that people should be able to drink with greater freedom in an attractive tourist resort such as Blackpool, Eastbourne or even the Isle of Wight?

I mentioned that there were problems of which we were all aware in the tourism industry. Many of my hon. Friends have sought, and continue to seek, to raise them with the Minister, so I shall not delay the House unnecessarily. I shall refer to some of the problems, but I shall not be over-critical, because I do not want to dent the Minister's enthusiasm and because I know that he is aware of many of the problems. We must focus on those problems and on the opportunities that tourism provides for curing some of our greater economic ills.

People feel that there is a lack of leadership and that we do not quite know where the tourism industry is going. That feeling is reinforced by many people's concern about the fact that we do not now have a Minister for tourism. We have had such a Minister in the past and I hope that we shall have a dedicated Minister for tourism in the future.

Mr. Key: There are two.

Mr. Elletson: My hon. Friend says that there are two. It is true that tourism has a voice in the Cabinet through the Secretary of State for National Heritage. However, I believe that the Department of National Heritage should have a Minister for tourism. I know that my hon. Friend has a great work load. He is clearly able to cope with that, because he is a man who displays great enthusiasm and I have no doubt that his enthusiasm carries him through his work load on a great tide. None the less, people are concerned that tourism does not have its own dedicated Minister.

There is also concern about the way in which tourism has been shuffled from Department to Department over the years. It has moved from the Department of Employment to the Department of Trade and Industry. It has ended up in the Department of National Heritage. Who knows, next year it may be in the Department of the Environment or even in the Department for Education. I feel that the most appropriate place, in which we could really get to grips with the problems of the tourism industry, would be the Treasury. The Treasury could then see the problems that the tourism industry faces and the opportunities that it provides for increasing the Treasury's share of national economic receipts.

The other main reason for disillusion in the industry is the reduction in the grant to the English tourist board, to which the Minister and others have referred, and the fact that we have still not appointed a chairman for the British Tourist Authority and the ETB. I know that the Minister referred to the need not to look at the question of the ETB reductions in isolation, but to see it as part of a bigger picture. People do not see the matter like that. People who run small businesses are extremely worried about the cuts in the ETB and they are even more worried about the possibility of those cuts being passed on to the regional tourist boards. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's reassurance that the cuts will not be passed on to the regional tourist boards. That will go some way towards reassuring many of my constituents who are deeply upset about the ETB's grant being cut.

I shall quote from a letter about the cuts in the ETB's budget, written by a constituent, Mrs. Lawrence, who runs a hotel on the Queen's promenade in Blackpool. She says:

"Recently we hear that the Government intends to cut funds to the English Tourist Board which in turn will affect the regional north-west offices. Many businesses, large and small, benefit from their membership of such tourist boards by way of advice, co-operative buying and advertising as well as many other services they provide. All this supports our survival and we cannot afford to lose any of it."

That lady has a point, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take note of her remarks. The cuts in the English tourist board budget will cause problems for businesses like Mrs. Lawrence's and constituencies like mine, not least because it may affect the seaside resorts campaign, to which the Minister referred. The other week, we were told by the chief executive of the English tourist board that that campaign may well be a victim of the cuts in the English tourist board budget. I certainly hope that it will not, because the campaign has done an enormous amount of good for coastal resorts, which have seen a growth in business and significant job creation as a result.

Mr. Waterson: Is my hon. Friend aware of the considerable success in my constituency of the partnership between the ETB, the public sector and the private sector, which is mainly led by the excellent work of the Eastbourne marketing group?

Mr. Elletson: I was not aware of that, but I am sure that the campaign is especially valuable to Eastbourne. My hon. Friend further illustrates my point.

Conservative Members are concerned about high unemployment in many tourist resorts—particularly coastal resorts—and their apparent continuing ability to act as magnets for unemployment and other social problems. That is a significant problem in my constituency. At least four wards in the borough of Blackpool now have over 20 per cent. unemployment and over 30 per cent. male unemployment. The problem is worse in some other areas. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Mr. Lennox-Boyd), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, wanted me to draw the Minister's attention to the problem in his constituency, where many guest houses and hotels act as a magnet for the unemployed from all over the north-west. That has a highly deleterious effect on the quality of the town.

The solution lies not merely in financial investment but in the way in which we structure our response to the problem in those areas. Much could be done, not necessarily by the Department of National Heritage but by the Department of the Environment, particularly in respect of the change of use order. It should not be nearly so easy for a hotel or guest house to change its use to a Department of Social Security hostel, for example. Action on that matter would go some way to ensure that towns such as Blackpool, Morecambe and Eastbourne—our coastal resorts—maintained their high quality rather than simply turning into a dumping ground for social problems from all over the country.

Other problems continue to perplex tourist resorts—the strains on businesses caused by the attitude of unsympathetic banks and the over-regulation which threatens them at a local level, to name but two. I know that my hon. Friends will be delighted by many of the measures announced in the Budget—especially the Government's crusade to reduce bureaucracy. I am delighted by what the Minister said earlier about the establishment of the special task force to look at reducing bureaucracy in the tourism sector. That will be popular with small businesses, which are continually hampered by over-zealous local authority officials who make what comes out of Brussels look quite insignificant.

The fundamental problem that tourist resorts face, particularly in a recession—this applies both to small hotels and guest houses and to organisations and local authorities—is that they simply do not have the capital to reinvest in upgrading facilities. That has happened at a time when Britain's tourist industry faces more competition than ever before.

Take an organisation such as Blackpool Pleasure Beach, for example. That competitive, well-run private company now faces significant opposition from companies such as EuroDisney in northern France, which are not competing on a level playing field and which do not have to compete with the same sort of VAT burdens. EuroDisney is being charged a reduced rate of VAT by the French Government and that makes the competition all the stronger. I should be grateful if the Minister would consider that and take the matter up with the Treasury. At least if we can offer our domestic industry the possibility of competing on a level playing field with other businesses elsewhere in Europe, we may go some way towards alleviating the problem.

Despite all its problems, tourism presents significant opportunities. We have heard this morning of the scale of the British industry and its importance in the economy as a whole. It now accounts for some 4 per cent. of gross domestic product and creates £25 billion-worth of revenue each year. It is not a smokestack industry that has been gradually run down. It is one of the most important growth sectors in the economy of western Europe as a whole.

Within the European Community, expenditure and revenue from international tourism increased more than sixfold between 1970 and 1984 and continue to grow. The internal European Community market now has an estimated 180 million tourists—they are sitting on our doorstep. As we heard, after the financial services industry, tourism is the second biggest industry in the United Kingdom.

Much more significant, however, is the fact that tourism is a highly labour-intensive industry. If we support and develop tourism, we shall inevitably create jobs. It is entirely wrong that we should support industries that are being run down—which are essentially loss-making, no-hope industries. I do not believe in pumping public money into industries that will lose it, simply as a means of saving jobs. I accept that the Government have a role to play and that it is entirely right to co-ordinate investment and develop a strategy of support for an industry that is capable of justifying such investment and support. I believe that tourism is such an industry. Indeed, we have seen that that is so, because the support that still exists in Wales and Scotland, but which, shamefully, England does not have, has been thoroughly justified. The gearing ratio of investment on the Welsh tourist industry is something like 1:5, which means that for every £1 invested, £5 is returned. That is pretty good, and we could do just the same with English tourism, precisely because it is a successful industry.

The argument that has traditionally been advanced for the removal of section 4 grant simply does not apply. The argument was that section 4 grant should no longer apply in England because the English industry was mature. It may well be approaching maturity, although what should concern us is not whether it is mature but whether it is successful and whether it continues to grow and to create jobs.

Faced with those problems and with the opportunities that tourism clearly presents for economic growth and job creation, what should we do? The Department of National Heritage should focus on a number of matters. The Minister should consider providing the leadership and clear strategic thinking that tourism requires to enable us to take advantage of the opportunities that tourism presents. He should develop the role of tourism and of his Department across the rest of the Government. We want to see a tourism Minister with wide-ranging powers across other Departments to co-ordinate a proper tourism strategy.

More importantly, tourism requires investment if we are to make the most of the opportunities. Some form of section 4 development grant must be reintroduced, particularly in view of the cuts in the ETB's budget and the severe discrimination against England. The only equitable way to balance the situation and to seize the opportunity for job creation and economic growth presented by tourism is for a return to section 4 development grants, but not in the comprehensive way in which they previously applied. Clearly, mistakes were made. Development grant money was snapped up by large organisations and it was not targeted effectively.

We need clear and effective targeting of development grants so that they provide development finance for projects specifically in areas of high unemployment or specifically to develop projects such as tourism for the disabled or tourism in areas where it is not self-evidently a mature part of the industry.

If we can provide a clear, targeted reintroduction of even a limited form of finance, even a paltry sum of £10 million, there would be a significant job creation and economic growth. My resort of Blackpool does not have assisted area status and it receives no outside assistance from the Government or from the EC because tourism has not yet been granted objective 2 status. If we can provide some form of limited assistance, and clearly money can now be found as a result of the savings being made in respect of the ETB budget, we shall go a long way towards solving some of the problems that we face.

Finance might also be found from the national lottery. I hope that the Minister will ensure that receipts from the national lottery will be used substantially to invest in our tourism infrastructure. I hope that the receipts will not simply be eaten up by the arts and sport, although they certainly have an important role to play in attracting tourists.

The Minister should carefully consider tourist-related projects such as the Blackpool illuminations, the Blackpool tram system and, even more importantly, the centenary of Blackpool tower which will be celebrated next year. That will be a very important event in the calendar of the north of England. Two or three years ago, when the far less significant Eiffel tower celebrated its centenary, the French Government managed to come up with something like £7 million or £8 million for a great jamboree to celebrate the event. We are not asking for anything like that sum. The mere presence of my hon. Friend the Minister at one of our humble celebrations would suffice.

Mr. Barry Field: Will my hon. Friend confirm that, unlike the constructor of the Eiffel tower, the constructor of the Blackpool tower did not throw himself off it when he completed it?

Mr. Elletson: It does not surprise me that the constructor of the Eiffel tower threw himself off it. The constructor of the Blackpool tower, as he looked out across the swathes of beautiful Lancashire countryside up to the Pennines, to the Welsh hills and to the Lake district and to Scotland, would have descended from the tower reinvigorated by all that he had seen. He would have understood that Blackpool was a magnificent tourist resort.

Those are some of the projects that I would like the Minister to consider when he decides where to spend the receipts from the national lottery. Those projects concern me and my constituency, which is an important tourist resort. People in other tourist resorts clearly have other priorities. However, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to remember and then to fight for tourism infrastructure projects, because that will pay enormous dividends for him.

We have seen great successes in our tourism industry. The Government have done much to encourage the development of tourism, most recently through the Budget. However, much more can be done for very little extra investment, at very little extra cost. I urge the Minister to give that some thought.

Mr. Jopling: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Do you agree that it is a very long-standing courtesy of this House that when one has made a speech, one sits and listens to the speech made by the hon. Member who follows? The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) who, to be fair, is a new Member of the House, walked out very soon after my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson) began his speech. That is a growing and very unattractive habit which is creeping into the House. Would you be kind enough to point out gently to the hon. Lady, or any other hon. Member who may act in that way, that it is against a long-standing courtesy of the House as we have all understood it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his intervention and I confirm what he has said. I imagine that all hon. Members will read Hansard.

12.26 pm

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): We have had a most interesting debate, which has taken us through the tourist delights of the whole of the United Kingdom. I congratulate the Minister on the enthusiasm that he displayed when he opened our debate. As he said, it is regrettable that we have not had a debate on tourism since 1988, almost five years ago. Many hon. Members have referred to the Northern Ireland tourist board and I wish to restrict my remarks to the tourism industry in Northern Ireland.

The news from Northern Ireland is very good with regard to tourism. I have heard some hon. Members complain about their tourism industry today and I listened to them with interest. However, I can be very upbeat about the progress of tourism in Northern Ireland.

Northern Ireland is well known for its many attractive places such as the Giant's Causeway, for fishing and for the lakes of Fermanagh, the Mourne mountains and, I am glad to say, for Strangford lough, which is one of the most attractive areas in the whole island of Ireland. However, those places are not all that Northern Ireland provides. I want to give the House some facts and figures about how the tourist industry has progressed in the Province.

In Great Britain and across the world, one only hears of Northern Ireland from the occasional incidents of terrorism which are shown on television screens. One does not hear of the great progress that has been made in education, agriculture, industry—and tourism. Many people may find it suprising that tourism is advancing so well in Northern Ireland with the backcloth of terrorism. Of course, one must remember that terrorism is restricted to specific areas in Northern Ireland and is not widespread.

We have the figures for tourism in Northern Ireland up to March 1992. For the third consecutive year, our tourist industry has increased. Visits were made to the Province by 1·2 million people in 1992. When one considers that our population is only 1·6 million people, one can see that that is a fantastic number coming to visit Northern Ireland in a year. Many of those visits would have been family and business trips from Great Britain, but the number of purely holiday visitors was up by 18 per cent. to 263,000.

The Northern Ireland tourist board is well on target to achieve its 1994 figure of 1·6 million visitors, including 425,000 purely holiday visitors. It is interesting to see the source of those visitors. Recently, we have commenced, in co-operation between the Northern Ireland tourist board and the southern Irish tourist board, Bord Failte, to promote Ireland as a whole in Europe and North America as well as in London and Great Britain.

It is good to see that, in 1992, Northern Ireland got 380,000 visitors from the Republic of Ireland, which is an increase of 11 per cent. I welcome that increase because one of the problems in the whole island of Ireland is the lack of knowledge that many southern Irish people have of Northern Ireland. Only a small percentage of southern Irish people have ever visited northern Ireland; many others judge it by what they read in the newspapers. During the debate, hon. Members from the north of England complained that many people from the south of England had never visited the north and, likewise, are ignorant of the tremendous tourist delights in northern England.

Despite those 380,000 visitors from the Republic of Ireland in 1992, Britain remains our main market. We had 650,000 visitors from Scotland, England and Wales, of which 75,000 came for holidays. That was an increase of 7 per cent. On the continent of Europe, we are advancing strongly, with people from Germany, France, Holland and Italy—in that order—being the main holidaymakers in Northern Ireland. Germany sent 23,000 holiday visitors to Northern Ireland in 1992, which was an increase of 10 per cent. Holland sent 7,600 holiday visitors and Italy, 6,700.

The North American market is important to Northern Ireland. There are 44 million people in the United States who claim Irish background. More than 50 per cent. of them claim Scots-Irish background which, of course, is Northern Ireland. A minority of the Irish claim Gaelic-Irish background—a fact which is sometimes overlooked. Traffic between Belfast and Canada is greater than that between Dublin and Canada. That shows the strength of the Ulster-Scot connection in Canada. In 1991, we had 51,000 visitors from North America, which was an increase of 9 per cent. on the previous year.

One can see that the news on tourism is good for Northern Ireland. We are attracting more tourists from the Republic of Ireland, Great Britain, Europe and North America. Much of that is the result of something to which the Minister referred—the reorganisation of the Northern Ireland tourist board. That reorganisation has taken effect and is in place. Much of the credit must go to the former Minister, the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham), for his enthusiasm in developing the tourist industry and reorganising the tourist board.

Today, the tourist board is chaired by the hon. Hugh O'Neill, who comes from a well-known Ulster family which has served the Province for hundreds of years. He carries on that tradition of service to the community with enthusiasm to develop our tourist industry. The recently appointed chief executive of the tourist board is Mr. Ian Henderson. He was employed by the board in other positions and, therefore, has been an important contributor to the development of the work of the tourist board and the growth of the tourist industry in the Province.

The tourist board is important in advertising tourism and giving grants to tourist projects in Northern Ireland. However, there is more to tourism than simply media coverage and grants. Transport and access to the area are important. Support and interest from the European Community, which is involved in the subject of our debate, is important, as is a special fund for Northern Ireland called the International Fund for Ireland. We benefit from that fund which does not exist elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Major projects are being developed across the Province at present. I think of the European Community scheme for the visitors' park at Millisle in my constituency which was aided under the cross-border tourist project. Unfortunately, I understand that the Community has ended that scheme. The scheme resulted in a £1 million project in the small village of Millisle. That was welcome investment.

European Community support has been given to the new St. Patrick's trian project in the ancient city of

[Mr. John D. Taylor]

Armagh. It is right in the centre of that city below the old St. Patrick's Church of Ireland cathedral. Armagh is the Canterbury and Durham combined of Northern Ireland. It is the ecclesiastical capital of all Ireland and a beautiful old city. The project will be a tremendous source of tourism for the city when it is completed at the end of this year.

The old Navan fort just outside the city of Armagh is being restored. [Interruption.] The Minister has been there. That is fairly impressive. The fort was the seat of the ancient kings and queens of Ireland, based once again at the city of Armagh. The project is being funded to a considerable extent by the International Fund for Ireland. The IFI and the EC are important sources of finance and have contributed to an impressive growth of tourism in the Province in recent years.

Mr. Key: I wish to put it on the record that I was saying that I am assured by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage that I must not fail to visit the Navan fort because of its importance and excellence.

Mr. Taylor: I hope that the Minister will visit it. I look forward to meeting him there, because I live not far from the location.

The growth of tourism contributed £217 million in 1991—the last year for which figures are available to me—to the economy of Northern Ireland; hon. Members can see how important it is to a small Province of 1·5 million people that our tourist industry provides more than £200 million.

As I said, transport is important. It is no good advertising a place and obtaining IFI and EC grants if people cannot travel to the Province. The Government have a role to play in the various transport systems. I accept that the Government may not have a role to play in the ferry services by private operators, but they have a role in the development of the road and rail systems that lead to ferry ports.

The Larne-Stranraer ferry is the busiest ferry between the island of Ireland and Great Britain. We also now have an excellent Sea Cat and hovercraft service between Belfast and Stranraer. We hope that there will be a service between Belfast and Liverpool later this year. It is also important that we have road systems to service those ports. That is where the Government could help us more, by, for example, improving the road to Larne. The road to that major port—the largest in the island of Ireland—is still not dualled all the way to Larne. We need the Government to submit a programme to the European Community to upgrade that road so that we can benefit from European regional development fund finance.

Equally, it is no use having a good road to Larne and the best ferry service between Ireland and Great Britain, if there are not good roads to and from Stranraer in the west of Scotland. The main road is the A75. We hope that the Scottish Office will do its utmost to improve the roads in western Scotland because we find them a disappointment.

Many Northern Ireland people go to Scotland for their holidays. Probably more people go to Scotland than anywhere else. The roads and ferries in the west of Scotland are chock-a-block with Ulster motor cars and caravans. But the roads are not good and we need an improvement.

We also need an improvement of the road from Dublin to Belfast. That is not mainly the responsibility of the British Government. It is the responsibility of the Dublin Government. But the United Kingdom Government should make every effort to encourage Dublin to upgrade the road system from Dublin to the border and to apply for grants from the European Community to do so. Under the provisions of the Maastricht treaty, the Dublin Government will be able to benefit from EC funds as no one else can—through the cohesion fund. The Dublin Government should use that to improve the road system to Northern Ireland.

Railways are also important. I am glad to say that the Belfast-Dublin railway is being upgraded and will be a first-class communication system between the two cities. Likewise, the Northern Ireland Office is investing £75 million in a project, already under construction, for an impressive cross-city rail link in Belfast city to link the two railway systems of the north and south of the Province. Thereby, one will be able to travel by rail direct from Larne harbour to the centre of Belfast, which is to be commended and is a great step forward.

One worry is the Government's proposal for upgrading the railways in Great Britain and I again appeal for further consideration to be given to upgrading the railway system in the west of Britain up to Glasgow. Only when that is upgraded can we in the western part of Scotland and in Northern Ireland advance our tourist industry.

Aldergrove airport in Belfast is the sixth busiest airport in the United Kingdom and is advancing every year, reflecting the growth in the tourist industry. We now have international flights to France and the Netherlands and for about five years we have had direct flights to Amsterdam. I went there last weekend with the Round Table from my constituency and I was interested to see that the plane was packed—there was not an empty seat on the flight to Amsterdam and I could see only two empty seats on the way back, although I do not think that we lost any members of our party.

It is good to see a new service of that nature—operated by KLM through City Hopper—doing so well. I should like more European connections to be developed between Belfast and the continental mainland.

There has also been further growth in flights from Belfast to North America. Globespan has moved into the city and operates direct charter flights between Belfast and Toronto. Interestingly, one can fly from Belfast to Toronto for £160 return, but the return flight from Belfast to London costs up to £206. It is therefore cheaper to go on holiday to Toronto than to London, which is not good news for the British tourist industry.

Flights from the United States to the Republic of Ireland are important to North American tourism in Ireland. In these days of a single market, what happens in the Republic of Ireland is a legitimate concern of this House and of Europe. In Northern Ireland, we co-operate with the Republic to promote tourism. As I said, 44 million people in the United States of America have connections with Ireland, mostly with Northern Ireland.

Flights from America to Dublin are an important gateway for tourists coming to Northern Ireland, but the Dublin Government have rigidly refused permission for direct flights from the United States to Dublin and still make it a condition that no flight can come from America to Dublin unless it first stops at Shannon airport, which is not what people want. People want to get to Dublin, and if they get there they will come to Northern Ireland, and assist our tourist industry.

A fortnight ago, I was in Washington and I met many prominent Irish Americans, including some senators and congressmen. Everywhere I went in the capital I promoted the idea of direct flights. In that respect, I am helping the Americans, as they want access to Dublin airport without having to stop elsewhere. Since we have an interest, and we have the Anglo-Irish Agreement, that is a matter on which the British Government could make representations to Dublin to ease restrictions on flights from North America to the Republic and especially to Dublin airport.

I have one somewhat critical comment on the International Fund for Ireland. I praised it earlier and its money has been most useful to Northern Ireland. I know many of the projects that it has assisted and have read in detail its annual reports for the six years that it has been in operation. I have also discussed those reports with members of the IFI board, who represent the Canadian and United States Governments. As the House knows the European Community also helps to finance the International Fund for Ireland.

Having placed on record the fact that the IFI does good work, I should like to mention a problem that is special to Northern Ireland. I must be careful about how I phrase this. Northern Ireland has a divided society. Some villages are predominantly Protestant while others are predominantly Catholic. It is always important for the Government and their agencies and for public authorities financed by the United States, Canada and the EC to ensure that the agencies and those who distribute the funds act in an even-handed manner.

The International Fund for Ireland recently proceeded with a scheme to regenerate 20 villages in Northern Ireland. That involves the provision of heritage centres or small museums or the improvement of buildings that have fallen into decay. One of the problems is that, although the majority community in Northern Ireland is Protestant, the IFI selected 20 villages that were all Catholic. That decision may have been made in all innocence, but it creates the wrong perception in Northern Ireland. It creates resentment, and that breeds other things that are bad for the Province.

I am using this occasion to appeal to the board of the International Fund for Ireland to look more carefully at how it selects villages in Northern Ireland and to ascertain how it ended up financing only villages that are lived in by one section of the overall community. The Governments of the United States and Canada and the European Community would be greatly embarrassed if an independent inquiry into the allocation of funds by the International Fund for Ireland concluded that they had been allocated on a sectarian basis.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I welcome the first debate in the House on tourism for five years. I join the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) in recognising the fine work of the Northern Ireland tourist board.

We are debating an industry which is worth £25 billion to the British economy. It is a successful industry, which employs 1·4 million people and competes fiercely with other countries. It is massively fragmented, with hotels, heritage and leisure attractions, historic towns and houses, retail outlets and country and seaside resorts—to name but some of its constituent parts. The tourist industry is good for Britain and, with a little more help from its friends it could be even better. It is to be admired and should be discussed regularly in the House. In that context, I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister's willingness to try to persuade the authorities to arrange for an annual debate on tourism.

The report on tourism produced by the Select Committee on Employment in July 1990 contained 25 recommendations to the Government and to bodies in the industry about how to improve the quality of tourism. It would be instructive for the House to dwell for a few moments on what has happened to those recommendations. I shall not refer to all of them, but I urge the Minister, if he has not already done so, to look at them and to weigh up the progress made in implementing some of those suggestions.

The first recommendation was that there should be no change in the structure of the tourist industry. There has been no change in that structure, but what will be the effect of cutting by one third the grant to the English tourist board? What will be left of the board?

Hon. Members have already mentioned the reduction in grant to the English tourist board. It is hard to see how a fragmented industry such as tourism can do as well when it needs co-ordination, organisation and a English tourist board that is strong and proactive, not emasculated, as I fear it will be if the grant is reduced by a third or more in years to come.

The Select Committee's second recommendation was that there should be no change in departmental responsibility. That was the consensus in 1990, and in 1992 the Department of Tourism was set up—sorry, the Department of National Heritage. It was interesting that the Minister referred to the golden thread of tourism running through the work of his Department. Some of us felt that it could have easily been called the Department of Tourism, but that was not to be. The Committee's recommendation in 1990 was borne out of the belief that inertia was inevitable. We were wrong, and the new Department is to be welcomed if it believes in the value of tourism to this country.

The Committee warned of the dangers of competitive subsidies for tourism. We were thinking of the need to keep up with the support given to tourist industries in other European countries and elsewhere in the world. In the past three years, support for our industry has declined in cash and real terms, while in other countries the support given to their industries has substantially increased.

Mr. Brandreth: Does my hon. Friend realise that what he is saying is not universally true? I think that I am right in saying that Canada and Australia, which also have mature tourist markets, concentrate on overseas promotion. When internal promotion is being considered, the need changes.

Mr. Coombs: If my hon. Friend will allow me to develop my argument, he will see that I am referring not only to the ETB, but to the BTA. I have an important point to make in that context, which will, I think, deal with my hon. Friend's observation.

We have seen a decline in cash and real terms. The grant to the ETB has been substantially reduced, while the BTA has suffered a reduction in its grant in real terms, brought about by the decline in the value of the pound over the past six months. That means that the BTA's ability to spend in overseas markets to tell people in other countries about the glories of Britain has been reduced.

That issue should be directly addressed by the Department of National Heritage. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to consider that matter to see whether he can find a means of restoring the value of the contribution made to the BTA by public funds to enable it to continue its vital work.

The Committee mentioned the tourism information centres, which have already been referred to in the debate. They make a tremendous contribution to the tourism infrastructure of this country. They need resources if they are to be an effective shop window for tourism in localities throughout the United Kingdom.

There is a danger that, as a result of the recession, those tourism information centres are having to bear financial pressures. It is important that all of us who admire the work of the industry recognise the tremendous contribution made by the tourist information centres and urge all those involved—whether the private sector, local authorities or the Government—to ensure that TICs survive and continue to do the excellent work made possible by their many dedicated staff.

The Committee tackled the thorny subject of section 4 grants. In this instance only, it may be helpful if I read to the House the recommendation we made, as nothing has changed since 1990:

"Circumstances in some areas of England are so similar to those in Wales and Scotland that no case could be mounted that would prove that section 4 offered a proper use of public funds in job creation and raising of standards for tourist facilities in Wales and Scotland, but nowhere in England. Therefore, we recommend that section 4 equity partnerships and revolving loan funds be offered on a trial basis to the tourist boards in disadvantaged parts of England. If funds could be made available for this purpose, and boards were required to make no loss on their use, profitability of projects entered into would make the funds grow without more Government input. It is our firm view that public support of tourism targeted to areas of high unemployment and tourist attraction, through judicious expenditure as outlined in these proposals, brings real jobs and lasting prosperity to areas of Britain where other industries find difficulty in flourishing". Nothing has changed since we made that recommendation to the Government.

We are told today that assisted area status could be conferred on some parts of England particularly associated with tourism—seaside resorts, for instance. It could be helpful if grants were provided for improving boarding houses and small hotels—installing ensuite bathrooms, better facilities and so on—but why cannot the Department of National Heritage take the initiative on this, since it is responsible for tourism? After all, it has a £1 billion budget, as the Minister said in his excellent speech, so surely a few million pounds could be found to assist in these areas.

The Committee report also dealt with the need to streamline the planning processes in rural areas. There has been no sign of that happening, although many local authorities have been more responsive.

I hope that my hon. Friend will allow me to welcome the project at Longleat in Wiltshire, where Center Parcs will be shortly embarking on the construction of its third holiday village in the United Kingdom. Thanks to the excellent work of my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Faber) and the positive approach to planning adopted by the district council, this exciting project is to go ahead.

The Committee went on to discuss the BTA and ETB campaign to lengthen the holiday season. It is crucial to do everything we can to tell the outside world that the British holiday season does not run just from the first gleam of sun in May to the last gleam in September. It is now an all-weather, all-season holiday package, and it is being promoted with vigour. I welcome the progress that has been made with the provision of wet weather activities and attractions—for example, Rock Circus at Piccadilly and the Center Parcs holiday villages which I have already mentioned. Such places do a spendid job and are well known here, but they need to be more widely known overseas.

Many people come to London during the summer; more would come in the winter if they knew about attractions such as Rock Circus, Madame Tussaud's and other places that provide against the wet weather with which we are occasionally blessed in this part of the world.

The Committee also called for a more even distribution of bank holidays. I am delighted that the Department of Employment, which was responsible for tourism until only a short while ago, is consulting on the possibility of moving the May day bank holiday to October. There are differing views in the industry about that proposal. I recognise the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson) and of Blackpool pleasure beach operators, who think that it would be advantageous to keep the holiday where it is, but many others in the industry believe that the chance to extend the season with a late October bank holiday would be beneficial. I hope that that will be the outcome of the consultations.

We called on the English tourist board to promote the dispersal of tourists outside London. That is not to say that we did not recognise the excellent work done by the London tourist board, now to be taken over by London Forum. In the past few years, the LTB has been enormously successful in boosting London's attractions, but the Committee wanted tourists to visit other parts of the United Kingdom, and I hope that the Government will continue to help with the infrastructure. Like the right hon. Member for Strangford, I believe that it is crucial to the well-being of the tourism industry.

I hope that my hon. Friend will also think carefully about the report "Tourism and the Environment" which was published a couple of years ago. If we are successful in dispersing tourists out of London, we shall inevitably send them to some of the historic towns of England—York, Canterbury, Oxford, Cambridge and so on—which already attract large numbers of tourists and which undoubtedly, if faced with more, will experience difficulties in managing them. When we talk about dispersal, therefore, it is important to look at the whole package.

As for accessibility for the disabled, I welcome very much the tourism for all campaign, which is bringing real benefits to the disabled, who represent one of the most important growth markets—both disabled people coming to this country and those who live here.

As for the Committee's recommendation about the need to encourage multilingualism among tourist industry employees, I pay tribute to the British Tourist Authority for its "Winning Words" campaign, which has been enormously successful in the last two or three years.

I turn now to the need for resources for the British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board. The ETB's case has already been made in the debate by a number of hon. Members. However, I wish to expand on what I said in answer to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth).

The BTA needs to spend substantial sums, raised from both the private sector—which, of course, we welcome—and public funds, if we are to compete in an increasingly ferocious and competitive international market for tourists. In the last six to nine months, the BTA has effectively been shorn of 15p in every pound of the money that it has available to it for below-the-line promotion of the English and United Kingdom tourist industry. That has created a very serious problem for the BTA.

My hon. Friend the Minister really must address this issue. If it was right and proper for the BTA to have a full pound last September to spend on overseas promotion, how can it now be right for it to have only 85p? I do not see the logic of not tackling that problem, if we believe that the BTA's overseas promotion work is good and worth while. I know that my hon. Friend believes that to be the case, so he must now address the question of where to find the missing 15p in every pound. The Committee was at pains to stress the importance of the BTA'S work overseas. Its importance has not diminished as the competition from other countries has grown fiercer and fiercer.

Implicit in many of the suggestions that I have made and in those to which I have referred in the Select Committee's report is the need for a strong and active ETB and BTA. We spend £2·5 billion a year on training. According to the Budget, a welcome £230 million is to be spent on the long-term unemployed. Nevertheless, the relatively small sums needed to make the ETB and the BTA effective in promoting the tourist industry have not been made available.

If we look back to the Committee's recommendations, I have in mind an additional £5 million for the BTA to spend overseas on tourist promotion. I have also in mind a sum of £5 million to restore the cut in grant that the ETB suffered recently, and also a small contribution to a revolving fund to replace the old section 4 scheme. That would be much more effective than the money that has been allocated in the last few days to training and the long-term unemployed.

Tourism is an industry which is highly geared to employment and to the use of small sums of money to generate large returns. If the Department of National Heritage is not prepared to take action to help the tourist industry in areas of high unemployment where the industry could, with marginal support and encouragement, do extremely well, we shall miss a great opportunity.

I conclude with one salient point about the tourist industry, which is facing tough times. This morning, I received a copy of this month's Holiday Which? Its contents page is revealing. On page 74, we are invited to read about Paris—

"A city that's ideal for a Spring weekend. Use our guide to plan your time and make your money go further—plus plenty of good hotels".

Page 82 asks:

"How much for a room? Find out how much you'll pay for a hotel room this summer, and read why British hotels are so expensive."

Page 90 is on

"Washington and Virginia. Visit the home of American presidents and tour through Civil War battlefields and countryside where European colonists settled."

Page 96:

"Britain's top sites. Our inspections reveal that you could be getting a raw deal."

I recognise that the Consumers Association and Holiday Which? have the interests of consumers at heart, but who speaks for the British tourist industry? Who is prepared to say that we are one of the best in the world, and that we are in the top six? The industry has done marvellously in the past and has gone through hard times in the past two or three years, but it will return to greatness with a little help from its friends. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister speaks up for the industry, but words are not always enough; it needs wholehearted encouragement and selective financial assistance.

I invite the Minister to consider some of the points that have been made, to see whether we can find a way of ensuring that British tourism not only keeps pace with that in other countries but moves ahead, of reducing the imbalance between inward and outward tourism potential, and of establishing the British industry at the top of the tree.

1.7 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): It is apparent from the debate that a number of Conservative Members do not share the Minister's hollow complacency. The hon. Members for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) and for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson) and the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) showed that they share the concern of many Opposition Members.

The Minister has been invited to Cornwall, but has not yet been able to come. Fortunately, the Prime Minister visited Cornwall in recent weeks, recognising that the Cornish spring comes earlier than the Paris spring. He said:

"The West Country in a sense is its own best advertisement for tourism; we do not need to tell people about the West Country as a tourist centre, it is instinctively there. When people think about holidays, they will instinctively think of the West Country among other places as somewhere to go."

That was the rationale of the Prime Minister, who was seeking to explain to one of Britain's premier holiday destinations why he and his Government had decided to cut the promotional budget of the English tourist board and the British Tourist Authority. I believe that that cut is a grave mistake.

I agreed with much of what the hon. Member for Blackpool, North said, but he was wrong in one regard. He said that the current contribution of the tourism industry to our GDP was about 4 per cent. It is not. It was almost 4 per cent. in 1989, but it has now slipped to 3·4 per cent. It is precisely because it appears that we shall lose our position in the top five or six international tourist economies that we should be so concerned.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development forecasts that, by the turn of the century, tourism will be the biggest single industry in the world. Britain, which founded or invented tourism, looks as if it will slip. It is an extremely important industry at the moment and makes a contribution to the United Kingdom economy three times the size of that of the motor industry. It is bigger than the food, drink and tobacco industries put together, but, let us be clear, we could slip.

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

Three major structural factors are causing that slip. First, as many hon. Members have said, we suffer from an uneven playing field in comparison with our competitors in the European Community. The holidaymaker reading Holiday Which? is faced with a simple fact. If he chooses an ordinary hotel in Greece, he will be charged 8 per cent. value added tax, in Spain 6 per cent., in France—our most immediate competitor—only 5·5 per cent., while in England our hotels are struggling with a rate of 17·5 per cent.

With the imminent opening of the channel tunnel and the nascent single market, the VAT rate differentials distort the picture. They will encourage the traditional short-break tourist to travel to France and the continent rather than to stay at home. The differentials are a distortion of the single market, which is unacceptable. If the industry had half the political muscle of the motor industry, it would be knocking on the door of No. 10 to make a change. It is a subject for derogation—it is open to Ministers to decide whether to assist the industry by changing VAT.

A second major structural problem facing the industry is the huge discrepancy in the application of fire, health, food and hygiene regulations in some other European Community countries and in Britain. Our competitors find it much easier to circumvent or modify those regulations. An example is the recently introduced regulation on kitchen utensils. To make a traditional club sandwich in a pub, hotel, restaurant or cafe in this country, one must have at least three knives and at least three chopping blocks. Such precautions are not only impractical but extremely costly. The Minister asked to hear about specific problems, and I am sure that the industry will supply him with many.

It is not enough for the Government to set up their own internal task forces to deal with the problem of regulation. Employing poachers to rewrite the game laws has never been a satisfactory basis for changing legislation. Why should there not be an independent commission to take evidence from the industry and others to ensure that there is practical scrutiny?

The third factor is the uniform business rate, to which a number of hon. Members have already referred. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale is no longer here. I raised the issue with the Treasury months ago when it become apparent that the Inland Revenue valuation regulations are paying little regard to the peculiar and special nature of the industry, and the changing and cyclical nature of its business. A business that is effectively open for only four months of the year—perhaps even only six weeks—pays the UBR on a valuation that takes account of a full 12 months' operation. That is inequitable and unfair. The Government need to consider urgently not only the specific questions asked by the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale but the general basis for valuation.

There are one or two other incredibly important factors for the industry which, although within the Government's purview, are perhaps not so much structural as tactical. For example, a number of the areas that have traditionally relied on the holiday industry are affected by disproportionately high water charges. The north-west and the south-west come first to mind. Since privatisation, in the south-west 2 per cent. of the population are now paying for 10 per cent. of the coastline to be cleaned up. The effect has been a huge rise in water charges—16 per cent. in the current year—which are likely to double by the end of the century. The absence since privatisation of any effective national equalisation element and the reduced eligibility for European Community help have compounded the inequality. To some extent, such high charges are also charged for electricity, as many areas in the south-west are far away from the main sources of power generation.

Another issue that has been very much in the mind of the industry in recent months—I had a call from Bath last night which highlighted the matter—is that holiday businesses face the problem of bank costs. I am talking not just about bank charges and interest rates, but about bank costs generally. Since the late 1980s, when many businesses were encouraged by the Government and by the tourist industry's own boards to invest heavily both in property and in improvements, the industry has found itself heavily burdened by bank costs. Many businesses are now in severe financial trouble. It is estimated that the biggest single operator of hotel beds at present is a liquidator. Bank managers and business advisers fell over themselves to encourage wanton increases in indebtedness in the 1980s, yet those who were so ready to provide money then have been only too ready to pull the rug out since.

The industry now faces the threat of rail privatisation. As other hon. Members have said, the railways are extremely important, especially to the far-flung resorts that many of us here represent. British Rail has told me that in 1991-92, 100,000 British Rail passes were sold internationally. After privatisation, who will undertake such a function? The sales of passes doubled in Germany in 1991-92 and British Rail international sales grossed £89 million in that year. Bringing people to this country is precisely the sort of objective that one would think that the Government would have in mind. InterCity services have improved in a number of directions, although sadly, with the threat of privatisation, British Rail has already had to look at some of the through services to major resorts such as Newquay, the most famous, important and beautiful seaside holiday resort in the United Kingdom, and to other resorts that might try to vie with it, such as Blackpool.

There are other ways in which British Rail's activities to encourage the use of trains by holidaymakers have been extremely effective in taking pressure off the roads. A particular example are the park-and-ride schemes in operation for St. Ives, for Looe, in the Yorkshire Dales national park, and on the Settle to Carlisle line.

The tourist industry will be one of the first victims of the disintegration of the national railway system. Hon. Members of all parties, especially in the south-west, know that that is the case.

In that context, I hope that the Minister has listened carefully to the representations of hon. Members from all parties about the cuts in the English tourist board. It is not only the centralised board that is being massacred; the regional boards are also affected.

As other hon. Members have said, more than 70 jobs will go as a result of the cuts. Who will be left in the ETB to undertake the important examination to which the Minister referred? What skills will be left for that examination? The seaside resorts initiative, which is extremely important and valuable in a number of areas, is likely to be downgraded. We already have a £4 billion trade deficit in tourism, which is damaging to the national economy as well as to the industry itself, yet the Department of National Heritage appears to be so obsessed with the national lottery that it is ignoring the developments that the industry so desperately needs.

It is in that context, too, that, without in any way criticising the support that the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Northern Ireland and for Wales give to their tourist industries, we must view the extraordinary discrepancy between their enthusiasm for intervention and investment and the attitude that prevails in England. The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale gave some figures. I am sorry that he is not now in his place, because I should like to give him some additional figures, which the Minister was kind enough to pass to me earlier in the year. Expenditure on tourism per head of population is £6·26 in Northern Ireland; £5·06 in Wales and £3·20 in Scotland.

I do not criticise those figures because tourism is a proper priority. But for England—and in this context, I include the Duchy of Cornwall, even though Cornwall is a separate celtic country—we are talking about the princely sum of 42p.

That is bad enough, but matters are to get worse. By 1995-96, the figures will have increased to £8·60 in Northern Ireland and to £5·39 in Wales. In Scotland, there will be a modest reduction of 6p to £3·14. England and Cornwall, the biggest destinations for holidaymakers, will have the princely sum of 21p per head of population—precisely half the present figure. That is what the Prime Minister meant when he came to Cornwall and told the The Western Morning News that we did not need any promotion because everyone knew instinctively that we were there. How can we compete nationally, let alone internationally, on that basis?

Some 85 per cent. of tourism to the United Kingdom is to England. Nearly half the nights spent away from home by United Kingdom residents are spent in England. That is as high a figure as those for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland put together, yet we do not have a Department, a Minister or a Cabinet who are committed to the promotion of this vital industry.

The hon. Member for Swindon talked about the Select Committee report. I do not believe that we paid enough attention to its recommendations—in particular to the passage that the hon. Gentleman quoted concerning ways of adapting section 4 grants and making them into effective roll-over grants that did not cost a great deal of money. Rural economies such as Cumbria, Devon, Cornwall, Northumberland and North Yorkshire would benefit enormously from that targeted investment. I hope that the Minister will take that on board and give a firm assurance to all hon. Members that he will look at the matter again.

Tourism is still very vulnerable to the general state of the economy. The Minister himself said that survivors of the recession would be in a better state to take advantage of the new situation. Many people have not survived the recession, however, and we are vulnerable to any squeeze on disposable incomes. Expenditure on tourism is peculiarly subject to such pressures. If we have a national economic revival and if employment improves, it is in tourism that we can gain the most.

It is a sad fact that 11 of the top 20 unemployment black spots identified by the Department of Employment are in areas that predominantly rely on the holiday industry. It is extraordinary that more work is not done to invest in those areas. I have a list, which includes Clacton, Newquay in my constituency, Skegness, Penzance, Torbay, Bideford, Hastings and the Isle of Wight. Those are areas where limited, targeted investment of Government funds would make the most tremendous difference to the local economy and the employment situation.

A number of matters need to be addressed urgently. In addition to the harmonisation of tax, regulations and controls in the European Community, which, sad to say, were totally neglected while the British Government were in the driving seat, we must do something about the inadequacy and inflexibility of the uniform business rate.

We must do something about the inequity of water charges and the way in which they cast especially great burdens on areas of low income and those affected by the tourism industry. In a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), the Prime Minister seemed to give that assurance. However, we have yet to see what the Prime Minister will do about that problem.

We need an emergency package, similar to that negotiated with the lending institutions by the Government on behalf of home owners, to help businesses in a similar position that face repossession at the worst possible moment in the cycle of the property value slump. Most importantly, in order to give new confidence to the industry, the question of funding the boards and the section 4 grants, or their modernised equivalents, is critical if we are to extend the season, to modernise facilities and to ensure that promotional budgets can stand up to international competition.

Even on a Friday, when most hon. Members who represent the more far flung holiday resorts find it difficult to cancel engagements in order to be present in the Chamber, it is clear that there is a groundswell of concern on both sides of the House about what is happening to one of our premier industries. It is vital that we have an annual debate and a Minister prepared to take on board the recommendations of the Select Committee. In addition, we must find another vehicle or mechanism to consider these extremely important issues.

During business questions last week, I suggested to the Leader of the House that tourism was an ideal and important subject in respect of which he could reconstitute for England the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs. A rather long-forgotten Standing Order, No. 100, on which dust seems to have settled, has prevented us from having that Standing Committee.

If we are to harness the all-party enthusiasm and concern for the industry, that Standing Committee would be a very important mechanism for achieving that. I invite the Minister to endorse that request so that we can have more discussion and more effective action on behalf of the industry.

1.26 pm

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): I also welcome the Minister's recommendation that we should have an annual debate on tourism. I believe that the Department of National Heritage was born from my political loins. John Lee, who gave such distinguished service to the House and to tourism, my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and I went to see my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister before the last general election.

[Mr. Barry Field]

We asked him to combine the arts, tourism and our national heritage into one Department, so that we would have a great package for selling Great Britain. I am delighted that that suggestion fell on fertile ground and that the Minister is with us today.

I am very pleased that the Minister mentioned his visit to the Isle of Wight. I am certain that he will not have forgotten the great problem we have with the international sign for a zoo, which is an elephant. He will recall the difficulties that that has caused us when we have tried to use it to advertise a flamingo park.

However, it was of considerable comfort to me to see in today's Times that English Heritage is dealing with a very serious case of tooth decay in a unicorn. I am pleased to see that it is repairing the unicorn using funds from the Department of National Heritage. However, if English Heritage can get the unicorn to open wide to repair its tooth decay, I wonder why I have not been successful in getting English Heritage to open Osbourne house all year round so that our winter tourism can benefit from that wonderful attraction on the Isle of Wight.

As has already been said, tourism employs more than 1·4 million people in the United Kingdom. Of those, 1,115,000 are to be found in England, 185,000 in Scotland and 95,000 in Wales. Tourism accounts for more employment than construction and transport put together. I must also refer—as others have done today—to the fact that Scotland and Wales continue to receive section 4 grants. Scotland, which has only 9 per cent. of the nation's unemployment, gets a third of all taxpayers' assistance in the United Kingdom. That shows the imbalance. This was well alluded to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) in his remarks about the English tourist board.

I recall when I made my contribution to a previous tourism review. In this debate, it has been said that tourism has moved from Department to Department. I also point out to my hon. Friend the Minister that tourism has had many reviews. The previous review was started by my right hon. Friend the party chairman when he was involved in employment. I asked him whether we would examine section 4 grants, and the answer was that they should follow unemployment. That was a much better, more scientific and more logical approach to the whole thing than simply peppering them around the countryside generally.

I think that the fact that section 4 grants were not always seen to be as wisely spent as they might have been was the reason why there was some denigration of the system. If they had followed unemployment, that would have met the point.

The party chairman and the Secretary of State for Health are two protagonists. They are leading members of our party, who take their annual holidays in the United Kingdom. Perhaps, when I greet them on the Isle of Wight in the future, I shall be wearing a kilt and eating a leek. Perhaps I shall have a piece of shamrock in my turban and a heavily nailed shillelagh in my hand to get my point across: does anybody still speak for England?

We must find niches in the holiday market. One has been well found by our tourism office on the island. I pay special tribute to Peter Holyoak and Hal Matthews for producing an excellent brochure only this week on conference opportunities for the island. We have already had the social services conference at which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health announced the ring fencing for new community care. That was a great success, which went down well in local government.

The conference of the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives is coming up later this year. We have the inter-island games which her Royal Highness Princess Anne will open for us. Every year, we have the round-the-island race—the biggest yacht race in the world—and we have Cowes week, which, alternately, is Admiral's cup year. We have the opportunity of attracting more business to fill us up during the shoulder months and to get conference business on to the Isle of Wight because it is profitable.

I have had a letter, as have many other hon. Members who have taken part in the debate, about the English tourist board, its finances and so on. Martin Humphrey, the chairman of the commercial members group, makes a specific point which has perhaps not come out strongly in the debate—that the tourism industry has had put on it the EC travel package directive. My hon. Friend knows that the island's Euro Member and I went to see the Department of Trade and Industry. We met the solicitors to get the most difficult parts of the package ironed out.

I believe that Brussels never intended the package to apply to domestic tourism. It certainly was not meant to apply to a hotelier or guest house proprietor on the Isle of Wight who provides a ferry fare with the bedroom charge. We were not successful in that, but I think that we got some of the knobs knocked off it. They have the fire safety furniture regulations in self-catering accommodation—I see the Minister nodding because he knows about the problem—and food hygiene, to which reference has already been made.

I think that my hon. Friend has missed a trick today. We have heard about the VAT threshold being raised in the Budget and the fact that customs officers can now have discretion in misdirected penalties. That will be widely welcomed throughout the tourist industry. Of course, the business rate has been frozen for another year. I know that my hon. Friend, having been a local government finance Minister in the Department of the Environment, will know just how popular that will be with small business which predominate in the tourist industry.

My hon. Friend has missed a trick—the extension of VAT to the bloodstock industry. The bloodstock industry in the United Kingdom is a tremendous tourist attraction. When the Home Secretary came to the House this morning to make an announcement, he was challenged about where he was yesterday. He was at Cheltenham surrounded by Irish people who had come to England to watch the most excellent horse racing in the world. I am sure that that will make a major contribution to our tourism.

As the Minister will be aware, England attracted three quarters of all United Kingdom residents' spending on hotel and residential accommodation when staying away from home. The Isle of Wight has the greatest percentage of repeat holidays of any resort in the United Kingdom. I am sure that you will agree, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that these days product loyalty—perhaps a little like party loyalty—is rather rarer than dodo manure, but the high level of repeat holidays shows the opportunity for increasing residential United Kingdom tourism. Some £4 billion was spent last year on going overseas. If that money was spent on the Isle of Wight, every pound would be a pound saved from our balance of payments and a help for our balance of trade.

The Minister, a former teacher, mentioned education. I am sure that he will want me to remind the House that, when eventually hon. Members get their lunch today, it may be served by a waiter from the Isle of Wight. As a result of project initiated by me, and of the excellence of the Isle of Wight college of training and technology, five waiters who were trained in silver service on the Isle of Wight obtained jobs in the House. My initiative was in conjunction with Sir Charles Irving, who has given such distinguished service to the House.

When I first set out in politics to become a Member of Parliament, people on the Isle of Wight were displaying in the back of their motor cars a most miserable and nasty sticker which said, "Don't blame me, I'm not a tourist —I live here". I thought that it was awful. We spend a great deal of money attracting people to the island. The Isle of Wight has a great reputation for friendliness in England, Scotland and Wales and internationally. Everyone knows how friendly the Isle of Wight is.

I set out to alter the perception of tourism which that miserable sticker represented. In those days, my campaign was not perceived as a vote winner. My political opponents, the Liberal Democrats, did not see a natural parish for the ballot box, so my campaign was denigrated.

I started an initiative called the "island smile competition". The first prize was lunch at the House of Commons. The second prize was two lunches at the House of Commons. I gave a prize out of my own pocket so that we could find the person who had the most welcoming smile on the Isle of Wight and contributed most to the tourist industry. The competition has been revamped as the "courtesy awards". The tourism industry sponsors it, and it is a great opportunity to find the individual on the Isle of Wight who contributes most to people's enjoyment of their holiday.

One of the leading protagonists in tourism on the Isle of Wight and in changing perceptions is the Conservative-controlled Medina borough council. It has gone out of its way to show that things can be done on the island. It has ignored its detractors and the criticism of the Liberal Democrats to such an extent that the other authorities on the island are trying to follow suit. They are not nearly so successful as the Conservative-controlled Medina borough council. It has tarted up the sea front at Ryde and throughout the borough and built a new complex with a bowling alley and ice rink. Now South Wight council is following suit to some extent.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) made his usual carping criticism. He made a point about water charges in the south-west. The other day, when the matter was raised with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in the Chamber, he should have replied that the hon. Gentleman's colleagues took part in demonstrations with "Surfers Against Sewage", the very organisation which has been the protagonist in the campaign throughout Cornwall to improve the water quality of the beaches. Now that the water industry is spending money to improve the quality of bathing water, it is typical of the Liberal Democrats to criticise it. They always want to have their cake and eat it.

Mr. Tyler: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Prime Minister should not review water charges in the south-west? If so, many members of the Conservative party who currently represent seats there will be interested to hear it because they know that they are vulnerable to the Liberal Democrat advance.

Mr. Field: The hon. Gentleman heard precisely what I said, but, as he did not get the point, I shall repeat it. His colleagues have taken part in demonstrations with Surfers Against Sewage about the quality of bathing waters in Cornwall and have made a lot of publicity and noise about it. Now that the water industry is improving bathing water quality and recouping the capital costs, as always, the hon. Gentleman is the first on his feet to complain about it.

Finally, I must tell the House about a marvellous new Liberal Democrat policy for tourism on the Isle of Wight. They are so in love with cracked pavements that the Isle of Wight county council has spent £160,000 to buy a swimming pool with a crack so large that it is just like a Liberal Democrat policy—it will not hold water. We now have a dry and irreparable swimming pool, at a cost of £160,000. I hope that that will be my hon. Friend's answer to the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) when he says, "We want more funds". If that is what Liberal Democrats would do with it, God help us.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. There are 50 minutes left and six hon. Members wish to catch my eye, so I appeal for some brevity.

1.40 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I note your suggestion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall try to follow it, but, with respect, it is a bit much when hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber have spent the whole morning here, but others, who have taken part in the debate, have already departed. I think that that should be noted.

The debate has been interesting and we have heard from many hon. Members about the great advantages, in both revenue and employment, brought to this country by the tourist industry. I accept that argument and I am pleased that we have got away from the traditional tourist spots. Although I accept that London, Stratford and Edinburgh are still popular, other parts of the country equally offer a great deal to tourists from overseas or from this country.

I am the first Member representing a London constituency to take part in the debate; I hope that other colleagues will be able to participate. London is possibly the most popular tourist centre in the United Kingdom, so some aspects of London should be mentioned, because, with great respect to the Minister, he did not refer to them.

I have been an MP for some time, and I question the amount of planning and co-operation on tourism between the London boroughs. How does one borough interrelate with another? How do they decide to spend the money that the London boroughs contribute to tourism? I understand that the Minister will not reply to the debate, but perhaps he will find time to rise to answer some of my queries, as —to his credit—he has done when leading from the Front Bench in the past.

I understand that soon the London Forum and London First are to be established, to promote the affairs of London. One gets the feeling, however, that they will follow their own plans and policies. The London Forum and the London tourist board are certainly not flavour of the month to many London boroughs. The London boroughs grants committee provides a large sum of money —something in the region of £300,000 a year—to the London tourist board to help to meet its running costs, yet I understand that neither that committee nor the local authorities were consulted about the establishment of the London Forum. It would be interesting to know what its exact role will be and whom it will consult as it starts to develop the function that we understand that it is to perform for London on tourism.

Many of our 32 London boroughs have a great deal to offer and could interrelate, but I wonder how much co-operation there has been within inner and outer London areas.

Hon. Members have spoken about Government Departments. The press handouts for the London Forum came from the Department of the Environment, and the Secretary of State for the Environment has loudly proclaimed the benefits that the forum will bring. The Department of Transport and the Department of National Heritage also have obvious roles. Does each of those Departments know what other Departments are doing?

Mr. Key: As always, there is no rancour between us on these issues. I am delighted to tell the hon. Gentleman that Departments know what other Departments are doing. One good reason for that is the establishment of the Cabinet Committee on London in which these issues, including relationships between the London boroughs, are co-ordinated and discussed in depth. The hon. Gentleman is right to raise the issue of relationships and I am glad to give him that assurance.

Mr. Cox: I am pleased to hear that reassurance. We shall watch to see what takes place.

Mr. Tony Banks: I thought that I had demonstrated during the Minister's speech that what he has just said in his intervention is not true. I asked why it was costing £15,000 of taxpayers' money to pay for the London Forum's breakfast launch. The Minister did not know anything about that. I do not know what his Department is talking about, but it is not talking about bacon and eggs.

Mr. Cox: The Minister will need to send a letter not only to me but to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on the matter that my hon. Friend has again raised.

In view of the request for brevity, I shall just touch on some issues. If there were more time, I should go into them in more detail. Coach parking presents inner London with enormous problems. One has only to walk along Millbank any day of the week to see enormous congestion. Extra parking facilities have been provided, but are they sufficient? Not only British but ever-increasing numbers of European coaches come to London. They need to be able to park without hassle to the tourists on the coaches or the drivers. They should be able to park for an hour or two so that passengers can get off and see the parts of London that they want to see.

Hon. Members spoke about transport deregulation. It is interesting to read the comments of Saga, a world-famous travel organisation catering not only for British people but for people in all parts of the world. It has expressed enormous concern about the proposed legislation on the privatisation of British Rail. Saga currently knows who it is trading with and can get good deals, but it is deeply concerned about the number of private operators it will be forced to deal with compared with the number that it deals with now. That issue must be considered.

Some Conservative Members have expressed concern about Government funding. I and other hon. Members have served on the Council of Europe. Places in Europe have twinning arrangements with places in this country and many others. Other European countries put a real effort into that and it brings life to twinned areas. However, British local authorities have a poor record on financing twinning arrangements. That also needs to be examined.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) and other hon. Members spoke about hotel costs. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) asked how my hon. Friend could relate those issues to the Labour party's commitment to the social chapter. When a comparison was made between a hotel in Birmingham and a hotel in Rouen, France—a comparison of like with like —it was found that the hotel room in Rouen was £24 a night cheaper than the hotel room in Birmingham.

We hear much talk about our commitment to the social chapter and the enormous disadvantages that it would bring to this country were we to subscribe to it and accept the conditions to which the other 11 members of the European Community adhere. The article in Which? clearly outlines the difference between the costs of hotel rooms and shows the myth of that argument. We should face up to reality, not to the myths that some Conservative Members try to create.

The report of the National Economic Development Council published in July last year was highly critical of many aspects of the tourist industry. It stated:

"1. Quality . . . The industry must achieve world-class standards, and concentrate on the management of quality.

2. Government and Industry. The industry must accept that it has much to do to make itself modern, efficient, competitive and attractive as a career."

The report says of tourist information centres:

"These make a vital contribution to the industry. Arrangements have to ensure: that there are enough of them in the places where they are needed; that they provide high quality and consistent service".

Sadly, we know that that is not the case.

The report continues:

"The uneven level of support by local authorities for tourism and its needs should be ended; they should be given a statutory duty to provide adequate, consistent tourism centres for their localities."

I could give more and more examples from the report, which was published nine months ago, and much of which is still extremely relevant to our debate.

I shall bear in mind your request, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you have always been fair to me when I have sought to catch your eye, and I accept that other hon. Members want to participate in the debate. Therefore, I shall bring my speech to an end.

We have much to offer that could benefit us all. We must realise that we cannot just say, "The United Kingdom—what a great country." We face more and more competition from those countries that now call themselves central European—part of the old Russian empire of yesteryear. People are going to those countries in ever-increasing numbers, as there is much to be seen there.

Until last November when my term of office expired, I was treasurer of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Delegations came to this country and I spent many hours inquiring about the costs of hotel rooms. Many of the medium grade—not top-quality—hotel rooms in London are an absolute rip-off. They used to offer bed and breakfast, but now they offer only the room, at a heavy cost. If people want breakfast, as many of them do, they are required to pay a substantial additional charge over and above the cost of the room. Will the Minister use his influence with hotel organisers in London to persuade them to consider how they manage their costs? I speak from the experience of having been the treasurer of one of the major all-party organisations in this country.

This debate has been superb. There has not been much Government bashing, as the subject is of interest to us all. I look to the Minister to reply to my points and, so that I may keep in the good books of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West, to my hon. Friend's comments as well.

1.53 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Not only the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) but some of us Conservative Members should express gratitude to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) for being so brief. We know that he would have liked to say a great deal more.

I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage on the tremendous record of the tourism industry that he set out —the work, the enterprise and the activity which, together, amount to an annual turnover of £25 billion in terms of firms' incomes, of employment and of expenditure by the public. I also congratulate him on the 50 per cent. increase in tourism in Britain in the past 10 years, reaching a record in 1992 despite the recession; and on the fact that 1·5 million people work in tourism.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) disparaged the Budget in the context of tourism, but he did not mention the low tax announced by the Chancellor on the forthcoming national lottery. That relates to tourism, because the national lottery is designed to produce funds for sport, the arts, heritage, the millennium fund and charities. All those, with the possible exception of charities, help to generate tourism. By keeping the tax rate on the lottery low, the prospects for prizewinners will be increased and more money will be available for these good causes. There were fears a few months ago of a tax rate of 20 per cent. or even more, and it is a tremendous tribute to the Secretary of State for National Heritage and to the Under-Secretary, who have been making strong representations to the Treasury, that they have persuaded the Chancellor to keep the tax rate low, thereby making certain that the national lottery gets off to a good start. That will help the arts and other causes, and it will help to boost tourism.

It is remarkable that we are sixth in the world in terms of our income from tourism. Four of the first five have a lot more sunshine than we have; the fifth has a lot of alpine mountains—Austria—and a great deal of sunshine, too. People cannot count on fine weather in this country, but they do not come to Britain for our weather. They come for our heritage, arts, royal castles and palaces, museums, galleries, villages and towns. They come to see our opera, ballet and orchestral concerts. In all these, we have a great deal to offer—far more than most other countries.

The hon. Member for Tooting referred to London. I am glad to see the English tourist board preparing for a London festival next year to boost London as one of the arts capitals of the world.

We must protect our heritage. English Heritage does a first-class job. If we do not protect it, future generations will curse us, and they will be right to do so.

One aspect of all this has been largely left out of the debate: the monarchy. I believe that the monarchy and the Queen are tremendous tourist attractions—a great draw. We have the best Queen in the world; she is hugely respected and admired, and she is a great draw for tourists. It is important for tourism that we keep our monarchy as it is. Tourists, as well as the British people, would rather we had a grand and splendid monarchy than a bicycle-riding monarchy of the sort favoured by Opposition Members and such as one might find in Scandinavian or Benelux countries.

The British people do not want us to become a banana republic. We should keep our royal yacht, our royal train and the Royal Mail. We should keep our military bands, which are trained at the Royal Military school of music at Kneller Hall in Twickenham. It produces the finest Army bands, whose standards of excellence are the envy of the world. They lift the spirits of the nation. Who does not thrill to the sound of a British Army band?

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): My hon. Friend will agree, perhaps, that this House is a tourist attraction in itself. The messages that are taken back to many countries after people have listened to the speeches today will be a reflection of that fact. Does my hon. Friend agree that this House is itself a tourist attraction?

Mr. Jessel: Yes it is, and that should be fostered. Furthermore, this House should not hand any of its powers to any foreign body.

1.59 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I should have loved to follow up many of the interesting strands in the speech of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). However, I do not have time to do so. All I would say is that if that speech does not get him a knighthood, I do not know what will.

I should also have liked to speak at some length about the attractions of the London borough of Newham to tourists. I remember people mocking me when I suggested that a long Sunday walk down the north London sewer outfall is a very pleasant occupation, but it is a very pleasant occupation for those who know it. Newham is an interesting part of London. It has a rich historic legacy. The area is steeped in Labour traditions. There are many things that are worth coming to Newham to see.

I jotted down some of our advantages. We have our own port on the Thames. We also have our own airport, football team—West Ham—a good motorway and railway links. Furthermore, the Greenwich meridian runs right through the constituency. When I come out of my constituency office I cross from the west to the eastern hemisphere. We are superbly poised to go for independence, to stake our claim in the United Nations and to arbitrate in the world between east and west. There are so many advantages going for us in Newham.

With Government assistance, through the money that they provide for the city challenge programme, we are developing our tourist attractions. Other Ministers have been to Newham. If the Minister with responsibility for tourism has not already stepped into Newham, I hope that he will come and have a look at the things that we have got which could extend the tourist industry of London away from the centre, with which we here are associated, and move it to the east.

Many things need to be done for London generally. Tourism is an enormous industry for this capital city. It earned an estimated £4·4 billion for London in 1991—£3·6 billion being spent by overseas visitors and £720 million by British visitors. I only wish that we could offer them more facilities—more reliable transport, for example—and much higher quality souvenirs. I despair of some of the trash, brought here from Hong Kong and Taiwan, that is being sold not a few yards from the Palace of Westminster. I should like tourists to go away with souvenirs of a far higher quality than some of the trash that is hawked on the streets of London at the moment.

The London tourist board has done an excellent job of promoting tourism in the capital city. It has listed a number of problems. Unfortunately, I shall be unable to do them justice. However, the London tourist board refers to the fact that one of the problems in London is the growth of touting for theatre tickets and other events and also for hotel rooms and, most recently, hackney carriages. The LTB says that touting is undesirable and that it damages London's reputation for fairness, honesty and value for money.

We do not want visitors to our capital city to be ripped off by predators. It does nothing for the reputation of London. All it does is to lower it. We want people to leave our capital city having enjoyed their time here and wanting to come back, knowing that there are things here that they can see and enjoy and that they will not be ripped off while they are here.

The London tourist board suggests that ticket agencies should be licensed by the local authority and that it should be a legal requirement to inform the customer at the moment of purchase of the face value of a ticket so that an informed choice can be made. It suggests also that the touting of tickets outside major events should be banned. I know that the Minister will not reply to these points, but the London tourist board has made them and I assume that the Minister will be sympathetic towards them.

Mr. Key: I am more than sympathetic; I am acting on all the points that the hon. Gentleman has made, in conjunction with my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. We are currently addressing these very important issues.

Mr. Banks: Splendid. I am glad to hear that in between dodging, ducking and diving around all these lunches, dinners and trips abroad, the Minister still has time to nail his feet for a little while in London and speak to the London tourist board.

I hope that the Minister is also doing something about another concern of the LTB: the need for fairly speedy decisions on the big transport infrastructure investments that will also mean a great deal to tourism. The channel tunnel fast link is not part of the Minister's brief, but it touches very much on it as he is the Minister with responsibility for tourism. Decisions are also needed speedily on crossrail, the Thames link and the London underground system.

The London tourist board—keep nodding, Minister—said that deregulation is not a good thing. I do not see the Minister nodding in agreement with that. Those who know realise that deregulation will make it more difficult for tourists, never mind those who live here, to understand how the bus system operates. He should listen carefully to the advice that is being proffered.

The Minister would describe my last point as somewhat more carping. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) mentioned the London Forum, about which I am becoming very worried. Under the current financial arrangements, the London tourist board receives more than £300,000 from the London boroughs. Representatives of the major local authority associations—Conservative and Labour—sit on the London tourist board. The London Forum has been set up by the Government and consists, essentially, of unelected business men and one business woman. I find that disturbing.

Why are the Government always so suspicious of local authority representation? Why do they not like elected people? It is strange that elected people in this place are so mistrustful of other elected people, including members of their own party, on local authorities.

London Forum has been charged with the promotion of London tourism. It is effectively taking to itself the functions of the London tourist board, but without the accountability that we require. I tabled a series of questions to an environment Minister about the functions, responsibilities and remit of the London Forum, what expenses its members will be paid, how they were selected, whether he would give details of its budget, what it will be doing, why the Government found it necessary to set it up and why there are no local authority representatives on it when a substantial amount of its finance will come indirectly from local authorities. The reply stated that London Forum

"will be a private sector company which will look to the private sector for its funding", except that it will receive money indirectly from local authorities.

The Minister informed me today that the breakfast to launch the London Forum will cost £15,000—not private sector money but public money. I still want to know how £15,000 can be spent on a breakfast. That can buy an awful lot of eggs and bacon, and many people in London would like to go to a breakfast that cost £15,000. It will be champagne all the way and I shall see the Minister there. But if we are to have a body responsible for tourism in London, it should be accountable to the people of London.

2.7 pm

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): If there is one thing that should emerge from this debate it is that the tourism industry is a front-line industry and is recognised as such. Let there be no doubt again about the role of tourism in our economy. It employs 1·5 million people and has grown by about 27 per cent. in the past 10 years, compared with growth of only 2 per cent. in other industries. It is the most important industry we have. It employs legions of people whose livelihoods depend on it.

I pay tribute to the British Tourist Authority—the overseas marketing arm that has made tourism so successful in this country. For three years running, it has won the National Tourist Office award in New York, which is a great credit to it. My hon. Friend the Minister, who spoke so well and with such ebullience and enthusiasm, referred to its award in Dublin. It receives about 1·5 million inquiries each year, operates in 65 countries and runs 400 joint schemes. That combination has yielded the enormous benefits of growth in our tourism.

I should like to pay a brief tribute to William Davis, who is retiring as chairman of the BTA and the English tourist board. He has always been wholly committed to his work for the BTA and the ETB and has undertaken it with enthusiasm and efficiency. He has always worked extremely hard for tourism in this country.

Last night I received a report from Mr. John Trickett, a senior director of one of the largest United States tour operators, which was flown over especially from California. He drew my attention to a number of complaints about the way tours of this country are put together for American tourists. However, he also said:

"The UK continues to be the largest European destination for American tourism, there is however a great untapped potential. Were Britain able to more effectively present itself in the American market . . . I feel there is opportunity for a much greater number of American visitors each year".

That brings me to the shortfall in the BTA's budget because of the lower value of the pound, an issue which has already been mentioned. It affects our marketing offensive in the United States. With the £11 million highlighted for overseas marketing, coupled with £27 million raised in the private sector, the BTA has done a remarkable job, especially when one considers the £25 billion that the industry generates for this country. However, we need to put money into the marketing effort to take quick advantage of the lower exchange rate in order to get more visitors from America and elsewhere. We could achieve an immediate response if we went about it in the right way.

The Yorkshire and Humberside tourist board has an allocation of £500,000 a year. In addition, it raises £1 million a year, which is a great tribute to its director, Mr. Handley. It does a great job, but let us compare the money available to the English tourist board and, ultimately, to the regions, with that available to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland for 1994-95. On a per capita basis, Wales will receive £5·39, Scotland will receive £3·14, Northern Ireland £8·60 and England 21p. It is ridiculous that the Treasury allows such sums of money to go to Wales and Scotland, whereas the promotion funds for England, which has by far the largest tourist industry, are severely pruned. Let us remember that the Yorkshire and Humberside region itself is larger in population than Scotland.

Another issue that I believe should be reviewed is the number of tourist boards. On the map of the United Kingdom, there is a line through the centre, with boards to the left and to the right. There is a case for discussion to see whether we should amalgamate some of them, especially to draw the east and the west more closely together. I suggest that that issue should be considered in the consultations, which I was so delighted to hear my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary announce.

Industrial Heritage Year is of major importance to this country. It will, of course, highlight our historic manufacturing base, but, more important, it will also allow and encourage more firms to cater for tourists to this country to show how modern Britain operates. The modern element of Britain is as great a tourist attraction as our museums and heritage. I welcome the fact that Tetleys of Leeds is spending £6 million to upgrade its tourist arrangements so that people visiting the brewery will have a much better demonstration of its functions.

Our catering industry has done us proud. I pay tribute to the Restaurateurs Association of Great Britain and the Académie Culinaire de France. Those two organisations have worked miracles for food standards in restaurants the length and breadth of this country. The RAGB award schemes that they have introduced to encourage young chefs and waiters have been exceptionally well received. They have enhanced the standing of the catering industry and of the food that we enjoy. Let no one say that British food is not the best in the world.

2.14 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I express my gratitude to hon. Members who have made it possible for some of us to find a slot in this very good debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister and the business managers on finding time in which to have this debate, and I heartily endorse my hon. Friend's comment about making it a regular annual event. From the interest shown and the quality of speeches today, it is clear that tourism is of considerable interest to many hon. Members and to their constituents, so the more regularly we can have such debates the better.

There is great interest in tourism in all parties. The all-party group is ably led by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks) and there is also the Conservative Back-Bench tourism committee, of which I have the honour to be joint secretary. I am sure that there are equivalent bodies in other parties.

Tourism matters to our constituencies and to the country as a whole. In Eastbourne, which is a quality resort above all, tourism means £90 million a year and almost 6,000 jobs. Much has been and is being done by the Government and by others to help tourism. The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) said that there was nothing in the Budget for tourism. He is wrong; there is much in the Budget for businesses, and especially for small businesses. About £1 billion-worth of burdens have been removed from businesses across the board, and many of the businesses affected are in the tourism sector.

I heartily endorse the abolition of the wages councils, which was mentioned earlier. For the first time—I mention this because a churlish note has crept into the debate at times—we have a Cabinet Minister with direct responsibility to speak for tourism.

I welcome the Minister's announcement about regional conferences. The change in the exchange rate has been advantageous and will continue to be so. Several of my hon. Friends have mentioned the exciting benefits of the English tourist board's seaside resorts campaign which, in its second year, involves 41 resorts, including Eastbourne. I draw attention to the partnership between the ETB and the public and private sectors in my constituency, and to the important and pivotal role of the Eastbourne Marketing Group. Local initiatives are often the best.

What more can be done? Like most hon. Members, I have a few suggestions. We need another Minister in the Department of National Heritage to build on the success of the new Department. We need to work at cutting bureaucracy and over-regulation, whether on working hours, on the social chapter, on the package holidays directive or whatever. My hon. Friend the Minister should talk to our right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to ensure that standard spending assessments for holiday resorts reflect more closely than they do now expenditure on promoting tourism and on providing facilities for tourists. The SSA should also take proper account, as I believe they may do in the coming year, of day visitor statistics.

Other hon. Members have mentioned assisted area status, which is also important. The ETB's review of assisted areas in Britain in September 1992 says:

"Coastal Resort TTWAs tend to suffer from higher than average unemployment rates but below average long-term unemployment".

It points out that such areas have a high reliance on seasonal employment. The redefining of the travel-to-work areas map for coastal resorts is long overdue; I hope that there will be some movement on that.

I do not intend to discuss the vexed question of section 4 grants at length. We have heard that 85 per cent. of United Kingdom tourism is in England. There is a need for something, perhaps a development beyond section 4 grants, to assist in upgrading hotels and the like. Perhaps we need a better funded alternative along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs). From talking to local hoteliers and others, I find that they regard section 4 grants as a litmus test of the Government's concern for and interest in tourism. A more highly targeted and more selective means of aiding tourism, especially in England, would be helpful.

I very much endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson) who spoke with great authority about the need to create more jobs in this important area. The tourism industry does not need handouts or long-term subsidy. It is not an industry with no future: it has a great past and an even greater future.

The tourism industry is labour-intensive. The ETB-BTA report on tourism and employment training pointed out that, between September 1985 and September 1991, the number of jobs in tourism-related industries increased on average by 17·8 per cent., with job opportunities in hotel and catering sectors rising by more than 40 and 25 per cent. respectively—and that at a time when the number of jobs in all other industries had increased by only 3·3 per cent. Tourism has the capacity to create jobs very fast as we start the economic recovery. Any investment now will be repaid many times over. It is a matter of pump priming. We also heard how, on the balance of payments, we still have a £4 billion tourism deficit.

I have no doubt whatever about the Minister's personal commitment to this vital sector of our economy and our national life. I have tried to suggest a few ways of developing that commitment and putting it to even better practical effect. I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) who once memorably described tourism as the mortar that binds the bricks of the Department of National Heritage together; and the expression "the golden thread" has been used today.

I firmly believe that tourism encompasses all that is best in Britain. Despite the occasional attempt by Opposition Members to talk down tourism and other sectors of our national life and industry and commerce, I believe that that is still very much the case. Tourism is still vibrant and competitive. It has been coming through the recession better than many other sectors, even though it has had its problems. I believe very strongly that, with a Cabinet Minister, with a new Department, and given the personal commitment of my hon. Friend the Minister, we have nothing but good to look forward to in British tourism, both locally and nationally.

2.22 pm

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): I thank the occupants of the Front Benches for sacrificing their time to allow Back-Bench speeches to continue.

I must begin by revealing to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have two interests to declare. One is that I come from the city of Chester. Chester is to tourism what Maria Callas was to opera, what William Shakespeare was to language and what the Duke of Westminster is to the expression "comfortably well off". Chester is the ultimate, the acme, the jewel in the crown. This is not hyperbole; it is plain, unvarnished truth.

We have the lot—a splendid castle, a magnificent cathedral, just 900 years old, a matchless river. We have the Egon Ronay hotel of the year. This is for your information, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I know that you will be looking forward to your visit. We have a racecourse that is a gem, a theatre that plays to capacity houses, a town crier who never loses his voice. We really have the lot. I imagine that is why the Secretary of State for National Heritage chose to come to Chester a fortnight ago: he felt that he was not properly briefed for his duties in his new Department until he had visited that great historic city—a city which is truly as modern as tomorrow, yet has a lot of time for yesterday.

I have a further interest to declare. I have the honour to be the recipient of a British Tourist Authority "come to Britain" award. I have worked in the tourism industry and I know the challenges it faces, not just in the abstract but hands on. That is why I may be bringing a slightly different perspective to our proceedings. It is also one reason why I applaud the changing balance that the Government are introducing between what they give the BTA and the English tourist board respectively. I know that the balance is very important, and I shall return to that if I get the opportunity.

I received the award from my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), who was then Secretary of State for Employment. As we have made clear this morning, the tourist industry is one of the country's key employers. We have talked about how it employs 7 per cent. of those in employment in Great Britain. What was not mentioned today was the fact that the number of employees working in tourism has grown by 27 per cent. between 1982 and 1992.

That is the period during which the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) told us that the ETB was constantly attacked and the amount of money made available to it reduced. If that was the case, one would have thought that the number of people working in tourism would have fallen, but in fact the numbers have grown by 27 per cent.

I want to pay tribute to all the people who work in the industry at every level. They have, of course, been working recently in a very challenging environment. Although I have been singing the praises of my constituency, we too have our difficulties, particularly in relation to employment.

What does the tourism industry want from the Government? Above all, I believe that it wants the right economic climate. Low inflation, to which reference has not been made today, is critical. We now have low inflation. January's retail prices index was 1·7 per cent., which is the lowest since 1967.

When I began work in the tourism industry presenting son et lumiere, which I came to know as a history lesson in the rain—I had hoped to do one indoors, in Westminster Hall, but Mr. Speaker at the time did not think that that was a good idea for security reasons, although it may be a possibility during the summer months—when there was a Labour Government, inflation topped 26 per cent. That is quite a contrast with the present.

Mr. Pendry: What year was that?

Mr. Brandreth: I am talking about 1976.

We have also achieved low interest rates. Interest rates have declined from 15 to 6 per cent., saving the industry about £11 billion. We also have a competitive pound. Reference was made earlier to the disadvantage to the BTA of a competitive pound, but what about the advantage to the British tourist industry? Let us salute everyone in the tourist industry in general, and hoteliers in Chester in particular, for taking full advantage of a competitive pound to bring good business to Britain—and, of course, the best business to Chester.

We had a good Budget for tourism. We must welcome the fact that there will be no real increases in business rates for properties next year. We must also welcome the improvements to the loan guarantee scheme and the modification in the VAT regime. The Budget was a deregulating Budget, and that is welcome.

Of course we want the highest standards of safety and hygiene in our industry. However, we want as few pettifogging rules as possible. I am particularly delighted that the Minister responsible for deregulation, my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) lives so close to Chester, because I am going to ring him about specifics. My hon. Friend the Minister was right. People should not just groan about the generalities: they should be specific. We must say, "This regulation is holding us up. Will you please do something about it?" It is very easy to maunder on about generalities. We want specific help for the industry.

There is, however, one specific area where I believe there should be more help from the Government. The Government acknowledge that the tourism element of the standard spending assessment should ideally take account of day visitors. I believe that I am right in saying that the Departments of National Heritage and of the Environmment have commissioned a team at Newcastle university to develop a model to generate estimates of day visitors at district level. If that model proves to be sufficiently accurate, we will make progress on that front.

Mr. Key indicated assent.

Mr. Brandreth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for nodding so enthusiastically. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities for agreeing to see a delegation from Chester on that very issue.

What about money? We have millions of pounds of taxpayers' money——

Mr. Tony Banks: Give it back, then.

Mr. Brandreth: We are giving it back. We are investing it in tourism: in the Royal Opera house, the national theatre, the Royal Shakespeare Company—I am so relieved that the latest research has shown that it was Shakespeare who wrote those plays; there was talk that the author might have been Bacon. I feel that it would be very difficult to get people to work for the Royal Bacon Company. We have invested it in Windsor castle, English Heritage and the parks and galleries. I believe that the sum tops £1 billion.

What about the tricky question of the grants to the BTA and the ETB? I am clearly going to shock some of my friends inside and outside the House when I say that I am not so sure that the Government are not right to look afresh at such matters occasionally and to manage the change successfully. Despite what hon. Members have said, the funding of the BTA and the ETB has been constant in real terms over the past decade.

I think that I am right in saying that, in terms of funding spent in the European Community, the United Kingdom's spending is on a par as a proportion of tourist spend with any other country in the European Community. The marketing of tourism, in my experience—this is not theory; this is a practitioner speaking—must be led by those at the sharp end.

Recently, I had an interesting experience at the World Travel Market. I saw two counters. One was staffed by enthusiastic, well-meaning people from a local authority who sold professionally. The people staffing the next counter ran a hotel and a tourist attraction.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 23rd March, the Speaker shall at Ten o'clock put the Questions on the Motions in the name of Mr. Secretary Rifkind relating to Estimates, 1993-94 (Navy), (Army) and (Air) Vote A, and in the name of Mr. Stephen Dorrell relating to Estimates, 1991-92 Excesses and Supplementary Estimates, 1992-93.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

ACCOMMODATION AND WORKS COMMITTEE

That Dame Jill Knight be discharged from the Accommodation and Works Committee and Dame Peggy Fenner be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Education Funding (Brent)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): I know that it is customary for the Minister to say nice things about how it has been good that an hon. Member has won the ballot. I shall reciprocate in advance by saying that I have every sympathy with any Minister who must defend the education policies of Brent council and that no one will hold it against him.

Brent council, which has a track record for absolutely abysmal mismanagement and incompetence, used to be under Labour control. I condemned the Labour council when it was incompetent. Therefore, I feel that the complaints that I now make about the Conservative-controlled council are not simply partisan. I was prepared to attack a Labour council when it was failing in the area. I should be failing in my duty to represent the views of parents and teachers in the area when we see devastating proposals for reductions in the education service if I did not speak out now.

I originally put my name forward in the ballot for Adjournment debates when the issue was narrower—simply a proposal to close Chamberlayne Wood primary school. That underlines what the matter is about. The Conservative-controlled council has only one objective—to get re-elected at the municipal elections next year. Therefore, it wishes to reduce spending in order to be able to go into the election saying that it has reduced council tax. Since the Conservative party gained control of Brent council, there has been a consistent pattern of reducing education provision to achieve this.

Undoubtedly, hon. Members will recall my Adjournment debate more than a year ago on the closure of one of the most popular secondary schools in Brent, William Gladstone school. Parents were happy to send their children to that school. Its academic standards were improving and more children were going to it every year. However, the local Conservative council decided that the site could be sold off. The site was pleasant and faced a park, and its sale would bring in a good return of money. Therefore, the opposition of parents was overridden and the school was closed.

In the correspondence that I had with the Secretary of State for Education, it eventually transpired that the advice given to the Secretary of State by Brent education authority was inaccurate. If we had had accurate figures, the Government would probably have rejected the closure proposals. But, as we discovered in the previous Adjournment debate, there is no way in which we can reverse the closure.

Brent council had barely got agreement for the closure of William Gladstone school when it proposed to close four primary schools. The council overlooked the fact that a general election was coming in a few weeks and, in the uproar from literally thousands of parents who saw popular local primary schools being closed all over the borough, it backed off. Once the election was out of the way, and having dropped the proposals before the election, the council came back with the proposal to close one of the schools, Chamberlayne Wood, in my constituency.

I strongly suspect that we have a rolling programme. The council decided that the proposal to close four schools at once would magnify the opposition four times. Rather than close four schools at once, the council has decided to close the schools one at a time in an annual rolling programme. It will flog off the sites and help to keep the council tax down. At any one time, the council can cope with an uproar in just one of the many wards in my constituency.

I wish to spend a few moments talking about Chamberlayne Wood school because I know that the decision is with the Minister. I hope that he will not rush to reach a decision before he has had chance to visit the school. Chamberlayne ward has the fastest increasing birth rate in the south of the borough. It has increased more than 25 per cent. in the past 10 years. The source of that information is the London Research Centre.

All the local primary schools show a bulge in rolls, with lower numbers at the upper end, reflecting a time when schools in Brent were less popular. The infant and nursery schools have full or almost full rolls. The alleged reason for closure was the number of access places in the borough. However, once the local parents and teachers began to campaign, the borough council was forced to admit that the figure was grossly inflated. It had to reduce the alleged number of access places by 32 per cent., after calculating them more accurately. Brent's figures always seem to be inadequate.

Most of the access places tend to be in the top years of the schools. As the birth rate bulge works through, we shall not have surplus places. Local parents like Chamberlayne Wood school. They continue to send their children there. There is a waiting list of children for September 1993. The nearest school in the catchment area is a Church of England voluntary-aided school. Yet the majority of the children at Chamberlayne Wood school are non-Christian. They would face a long walk across two main routes of traffic into central London. That is clearly not suitable or acceptable for primary school children.

Many of the families in the area do not have cars. They are not particularly well off. Therefore, it would be a particular problem for parents to send their children to more distant schools. My fear is that, like so many other parents such as those of children at the soon to be closed William Gladstone school, parents will end up sending their children outside the borough.

Chamberlayne Wood school is on Brent Conservative council's hit list because it intends to move another school to the site. But Manor day school is for special needs children. As everyone would agree, such children need a small, quiet and safe environment. Yet Chamberlayne Wood is surrounded by busy roads. It is large and noisy and has numerous stairs and passageways—a typical, old Victorian school. There is no safe vehicular access. No one in their right mind would wish to send special needs children to that school.

However, if Brent council can clear the Manor day school site, it could be one of the most desirable sites for private housing development in the borough. It would turn in a nice little profit which would once again undoubtedly help to keep the council tax down in the run-up to the election. That is the underlying reason for this rolling programme of school closures.

The farce of this year's council budget is even worse. There has been a major series of reductions in educational provision and many educational psychologists have been dismissed. Only half the establishment is now available in Brent. The thing really began to take off when head teachers and chairs of governing bodies came together because it transpired that Brent council spent £12 million less on education than the Government recommended.

I am happy to abuse the Government, but here is a Conservative council spending less than the Government would prefer it to spend on education in the borough. That fact caused considerable uproar in the borough. It was magnified when it became apparent that the Conservative council proposed further education cuts in the coming year's budget. That led my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) to ask the Government to step in to prevent what was happening. In reply to my hon. Friend on 27 January, the Government declined to take the opportunity to investigate how education was provided in Brent.

Lest anyone thinks that those dreadful old lefties the hon. Members for Brent, South and for Brent, East are complaining again, I should add that the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), a well-respected Member of Parliament and in no sense a closet leftie, is responding to tremendous pressure and complaints from parents of children at schools in the north of the borough.

I shall read a letter from Kingsbury High School Guild —the parent-teachers association—to the leader of the council. The school is in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Brent, North and the letter reads:

"I write on behalf of the Committee of the Kingsbury High School Guild which met last evening to hear a report from the Headmaster, Mr. P. Snell concerning the prospect of an unbelievable cut of £320,000 from the Kingsbury High School budget from 1st April 1993 which is additional to the effects of the cuts in central services you announced last October. We are shocked that your Council seeks to withdraw funding from the Local Management of Schools formula which your administration championed as the salvation of Brent schools.

We are totally convinced that the cut of £160,000 from the 'split-site' factor after a majority of Kingsbury High School parents voted in favour of an application for Grant Maintained Status was a vindictive act—we call on you to reinstate this element. We remind councillors that, although Kingsbury High School may be given Grant Maintained Status, parents are aware that Brent Council largely decides the funding it will get and those same parents vote in local elections.

We entirely support the Kingsbury High School Governors in their refusal to consider redundancy of staff believing, as they do, that the school requires its full complement of staff to ensure the delivery of the curriculum. We are in sympathy with the Governors for the task they now face to curtail the planned and much needed maintenance and development programme of the school to cover the cut in revenue.

We are especially concerned that your administration has decided not to allocate the full amount of the Standard Spending Assessment share for Education and call on all Councillors to ensure that this is done for the benefit of all schools in Brent".

A campaign built up, because the decision was affecting all schools in the borough. A major and successful demonstration took place in Brent, with speeches from myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South and a message of support from the Conservative right hon. Member for Brent, North, who said that he was totally opposed to those policies and was on the side of the parents.

I must reiterate that Brent is spending £12 million a year less on education than it should do to comply with the standard spending assessment. In the run-up to the budget, Brent was proposing to slash another £5·5 million, which led to all governors in the borough meeting and discussing a mass resignation, on the ground that they no longer believed that they could carry out their lawful duties to provide a proper education service to conform to the national curriculum if the cuts went ahead.

I have endless letters here, which I do not have time to read, and which spell out how the cuts would affect different schools in my constituency, such as Anson and Salusbury road. The pattern is repeated across the borough. The letters are not merely from Labour-voting parents, because parents and teachers of all political persuasions have united against the council. The council's Labour opposition demanded a special meeting of Brent council to discuss the situation. It was remarkable that when the council should have met to discuss the issue, one particularly erratic Conservative councillor tabled a proposal for the reintroduction of female circumcision in Britain which managed to consume the entire evening with name-calling and some of the most vile accusations of a personal nature between members. The education cuts were agreed without debate after the guillotine had come down. Labour then demanded a special council meeting to discuss the cuts in detail, as there had been no discussion, and parents and teachers who had attended were disgusted with the way in which the matter had been handled.

The mayor told them that there would be a special council meeting, which would be held some time in the small hours after the council's annual budget meeting, at which it would set the council tax. That was a clever device which meant that people were not allowed to go along to see a proper debate. Effectively, no real debate took place because the financial decisions had been taken.

As I said, I have endless letters from school governors complaining about the proposals. At the last minute, the Conservative leader of the council, Councillor Bob Blackman reduced the scale of the cuts by £1 million, so the education cut was £3 million on top of the underspending that already takes place in Brent.

As the local paper reported, "Extra cash for schools still not enough". The Willesden and Brent Chronicle states:

"Parents and teachers fighting for the future of education in Brent describe the Tories' budget as a 'poorly contrived attempt to make less look like more'. They say nothing has changed and that schools are still facing a future with insufficient funds to maintain good standards. In announcing an extra £1m for schools, council leader Bob Blackman admitted that a delegation of headteachers . . . had persuaded him of the need for extra cash.

He says there is now no need for any of the threatened 140 teacher redundancies and promised that any teachers who are laid off will be found new jobs by the council.

But while the cash boost was the surprise element in Cllr Blackman's budget, it failed to put the smile back on the faces of school governors.

They say schools still face a budget cut of 7 per cent. per child".

As I have said, those are not just Labour governors but the totality of governors in Brent acting together. They are of all parties and many belong to no party. Alan Carter, the spokesman for the school governors, is quoted as saying:

"The council has failed to reinstate the £3m of cuts it has made. No allowance has been made for the 4·5 per cent. increase in school rolls or for inflation. Teachers will still lose their jobs."

To make matters worse, local day nurseries are being closed and some have the threat of closure hanging over them. That means increasing pressure on schools. There is an almost vindictive quality because not only are there cuts but disabled workers are being picked out by the council. Four out of five disabled workers have been sacked and some have been verbally abused by management. One of the four, Mr. Omar Osman, was told by senior management that he could not have a cup of tea in the morning because he had only one arm and therefore had to stop work every time he took a drink. Others were similarly abused. Brent has now been criticised for having less than 1 per cent. of disabled people on its work force when it is required by law to meet a 3 per cent. quota. Such cuts mean that the most vulnerable people often suffer first.

Nothing has changed in terms of the education cuts. School governors were meeting last night because they are still dissatisfied and want change. They want the Government to act. Although it may seem amazing, I am prepared for the Government to step in and administer education in Brent between now and the elections next year, because they could not do worse. A team of inspectors put in to administer the education department would be beneficial and would have massive support because the borough has completely lost confidence in the councillors' ability to manage education.

In case the Minister tells me that his belief in local democracy is such that local councillors must be left to manage these things, I can tell him that the council has no legitimacy. The Conservatives did not win control at the last election, which resulted in a hung council. The then Conservative leader, Councillor Bob Blackman, zeroed in on four of the more feeble-minded Labour members of the council and offered them deals that got them to cross the floor. That created an administration.

I shall spell out the deals. To Councillors Amalu Johnson and Poline Nyaga he gave a £1 million community centre as well as large personal allowances and their own office and support staff. That persuaded those two to cross the floor. To Harshad Barot, who was being investigated by the council about the disappearance of a council grant for a voluntary organisation for which he was responsible, Councillor Blackman offered that the investigation by the council would be dropped. Harshad Barot crossed the floor.

In the case of Judith Harper, a Labour member who had become homeless and had refused the traditional offer of a flat on an estate, Councillor Blackman intervened and said that she could have a nice house on a leafy road in Barnet. Lo and behold, she changed her political persuasion.

I have not the slightest doubt that a Labour party which selected idiots like those in the first place deserves to be taken to the cleaners. I have said that to many of my colleagues who are responsible for selecting such characters, but a Tory council that bribes people like that in order to win power and then devastates the education service that it has a duty to provide has lost all respect and support.

In Brent it is commonly known that Councillor Blackman is the municipal Robert Maxwell. There is nothing so venal that it will not be done. Last year they raided the pension fund. Those people are not fit to run education in Brent and I repeat that, as a Labour Member, I should prefer to see the Government take control of education in Brent and remove it from the hands of these idiots, some of whom should be inside for fraud. The Government could administer it via the inspectorate until the elections next year.

2.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Eric Forth): It is traditional on such occasions to congratulate the hon. Member on obtaining the debate, but I am in two minds whether to do so today as I have been brought to the House at such a time on a Friday afternoon. I am sure that the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) will understand why I say that.

The hon. Gentleman has raised important issues. I am not sure whether it is for me, as a junior Education Minister, to respond to the hon. Gentleman's allegations about the murky dealings of the past and present in Brent council. I shall stick more closely to the education matters that he rightly mentioned.

I am forced to say that many of the provisions for which the hon. Gentleman asked in his last remarks can be found in the Education Bill that has just completed its stages in the House and has now gone to another place. That Bill provides a mechanism whereby schools that are failing, or have been allowed to fail, by a local education authority, can be taken over by a new, independent body—an education association—and improved. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will look again at the Bill to see whether he may be able to support it when it returns to the House later this year.

I will not attempt to condemn previous administrations in Brent, although it would be easy for me to do so. The hon. Gentleman charitably and generously acknowledged that there were serious difficulties in the administration of Brent before the change of control. Much as I should like to do so, it is not my job today to seek to defend the present administration in Brent. However, it is making serious efforts to deal with the accumulated problems of the past and restore an element of responsibility and viability to local government in that part of London.

It is important that we all bear in mind the fact that the responsibility for the delivery of education remains very much that of the elected local education authority. That authority will have to account to the electorate for the discharge of its responsibilities in relation to education and other matters at future elections. That will be the case in Brent, as everywhere else.

The local education authority decides on the number of school places that will be provided, and where they will be provided. It is in that context that the proposal relating to Chamberlayne Wood school, mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, is being considered by my Department at present. We will carefully examine the representations and objections, as well as the points raised by the hon. Gentleman today, before deciding what to do.

It must be for a locally accountable local education authority to make its judgments on what provisions should be made in its area, and in different parts of its area. It must decide whether schools should be enlarged or closed —as they occasionally must be—and whether new schools should be opened. Those are rightly decisions for the local authority, which must account to the electorate for those decisions.

The hon. Gentleman graphically described how he moves in a world of protests, angry meetings and representations—as he and I know, they are all part of the democratic warp and weft of local and central Government. In the knowledge of all the circumstances, the local education authority—in Brent and elsewhere—must take responsible decisions on the right and best way to deliver education locally.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned standard spending assessments—the formula whereby local authorities are funded, largely by central Government. Brent's SSA for all services has increased by more than 28 per cent. over the past three financial years. The education SSA—that element which is designed to indicate the amount that might be spent on education—has increased by more than 24 per cent. in that period.

The hon. Gentleman made great play of his claim that the authority was underspending on its education SSA. I have looked at the figures for Brent for the past few years. In 1990-91, the spend was 2 per cent. below the education SSA; in 1991-92, the spend was 1 per cent. above the SSA; in 1992-93—the year just finishing—the figure was 6 per cent. below it. However, the planned or budgeted expenditure for 1993-94 brings Brent's expenditure on education back in line with the education SSA.

Therefore, although there have been ups and downs in the past, the current figures show that Brent intends to spend on education the amount that it is estimated it should spend. It does the authority less than justice to claim that its plans for next year show a shortfall of the kind that the hon. Gentleman suggested. It must be given credit for what it is doing.

We can look at a number of comparisons. For instance, Brent will be getting 30 per cent. more per pupil in 1993-94 than the national average. Its "per-pupil allowances" are about 17 per cent. higher than the average for outer London boroughs. The overall picture suggests, contrary to what the hon. Gentleman said, that Brent's difficult problems and its needs, which many would say are greater than those in other parts of the country, are recognised in its funding arrangements, generally and for education. Brent is responding by making proper allowance for its education spend.

I hasten to add that this is a global picture. What the authority chooses to do within these global arrangements —for particular schools, for primary and secondary education, or for post-16 provision—is for it to decide. That is what happens in the rest of the country, and the same goes for Brent.

The hon. Gentleman seemed to imply that there was something sinful about a local authority trying to make sure that the council tax it would levy on its electorate was as low as possible. He is wrong. An education authority must strike a balance between the taxes it will levy on its populace and the money it will spend.

Given past activities in Brent—to do with expenditure, tax levels and so on—and given the incubus of the past that the administration of Brent has to deal with, it is fair to say that Brent is doing remarkably well. It is bringing the finances back to something approaching a balance, and it is exercising its judgment in respect of educational need in Brent.

Brent is examining the local management of schools formula, determining whether it is useful and how it will affect different sorts of schools, and how far provision can be made within it. Given the exigencies of the present, the problems of the past, the countervailing pressures of the level of the council tax and of justified educational expenditure, I am sure that Brent council would say that it was getting the balance about right.

It was wrong of the hon. Gentleman to suggest that central Government should step in when local people express dissatisfaction and take over the administration of local government generally or of education. That would fly in the face of all that I—and, I am sure, the hon. Gentleman—believe in. We should not try to get around local accountability by deciding that, if an authority fails to discharge its responsibilities to the electorate, central Government should step in and take over.

There is no proper mechanism for that, and the Education Bill provides for a more specific approach—a much more fruitful approach. The inspectorate judges whether schools are failing their pupils and their parents. If they are, the LEA or the school governors will be given an opportunity to correct the problems. If that does not work, the Bill, if agreed to by Parliament, would provide that an education association be appointed to sort out the problems in a school or group of schools.

One should not condemn an entire authority and then argue that central Government should step in to run the service better. We hope to provide the mechanism to deal with schools and groups of schools. The independent inspectorate would judge whether they were being properly run or were failing; if the latter, the mechanism for which the Bill provides would be used.

Although I listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said, and although we shall continue to look carefully at the individual school cases that he raised, I cannot agree with what he said today—that we should condemn wholesale what this local education authority is doing, that we should ignore its valiant efforts to deal with the accumulated problems of the past and that we should give no credit to it for what is being done.

The one thing about which I think the hon. Gentleman and I will agree is that it will be the electors of Brent who decide at the next election whether the council has properly discharged its responsibilities. I just hope for his sake that, when that election comes, the candidates of his party who are put up to fight it are a sight more impressive than the ones he so graphically described today.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Granada Television

1. Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to meet the chairman of the Independent Television Commission to discuss the licence of Granada Television.

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Peter Brooke): None. That is a matter for the Independent Television Commission.

Mr. Sedgemore: Can the Minister explain why Sir George Russell, the chairman of the Independent Television Commission seems determined to give in to Granada Television's slippery and disingenuous response to the meticulously researched document produced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), which outlines breaches in its licence? Is he aware that Granada has expressed an interest in buying into Yorkshire Television? Will he halt all developments in that sphere, pending an inquiry into the reasons why Sir George Russell granted that company a licence when his staff presented him with a document questioning Yorkshire Television's viability?

Mr. Brooke: In the context of the hon. Gentleman's extravagant language, the phrase "give in" is irrelevant, not least since the Independent Television Commission is fulfilling a quasi-judicial function. The second part of the hon. Gentleman's question is also a matter for the ITC.

Mr. Sumberg: Instead of listening to those hon. Members who have no connection with the north-west of England, which is the area served by Granada Television——

Mr. Sedgemore: I worked for the company.

Mr. Sumberg: Will my right hon. Friend take it from me that I have not received one word of criticism about the quality of Granada Television from my constituents in Bury, South who, like me, will warmly welcome the fact that the ITC has roundly and completely rejected the unfounded criticism from the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) and other Opposition Members?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has declared his interest in the matter in his own inimitable way. I am grateful for the endorsement that my hon. Friend gave in his question.

Mrs. Clwyd: When very senior Granada personnel come to me and detail breaches of the company's licence, and when those same people are totally unconvinced by Granada's response, surely the ITC has a statutory duty to act rather than to accept wholesale misleading information? Why does the Secretary of State not admit that the Government and the ITC have made a complete mess of the licence applications, so that there are serious problems at Granada Television, Yorkshire Television and Tyne Tees Television? If there is a secret and explosive document —I know that there is, and that it relates to the financial viability of those companies—should it not be published so that we can see for ourselves whether the ITC has acted lawfully and with integrity? Or is there something to hide?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Lady referred to the ITC's statutory duty to act. She submitted a series of charges to the ITC, to which it responded and effectively disagreed with her. In that respect, the ITC has fulfilled its statutory duty.

National Lottery

2. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what recent representations he has received about the site for the headquarters of the national lottery.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Robert Key): My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations about the siting of the headquarters for the proposed national lottery. Recent representations have been received on behalf of Penwith district council, Liverpool city council, Princess Dock Development Co. Ltd., Craven council, Clacton-on-Sea, Devizes and East Cheam.

Mr. Amess: If my hon. Friend shares my desire for our national lottery to be the biggest, best and most exciting in the world, will he take my advice and have a word with the people responsible for the siting of its headquarters to encourage them to place it in Basildon—a town for a gamble and a town for winners?

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and he is, of course, such a winner. We shall see where the headquarters go. It will not be for Ministers to decide their location, although companies may wish to consider favourable schemes which may be on offer under the Government's assisted areas programme.

Rugby Football

3. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he next intends to meet the authorities of the rugby football unions to discuss public funding for that sport.

Mr. Key: It is for the Sports Councils to decide how much, if any, financial support they wish to give to the rugby football unions. I have no immediate plans to meet the English Rugby Football Union.

Mr. Hain: Will the Minister consider changing those plans in order to meet the rugby union authorities? When he does so, will he discuss not only funding, but lifting the ban on the Neath player, Stuart Evans, a former Welsh rugby international whose rugby league contract with St. Helens expired two years ago? Is the Minister aware that France and Australia interpret the rules more flexibly than our own authorities? Moreover, to end the hypocrisy of shamateurism and to avoid the likely humiliation of the rugby authorities, should Mr. Evans take his case to the European Court, will the Government press for changes in the rules so that rugby players can play rugby union and the oppressive and anachronistic bans may be ended?

Mr. Key: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his intention to raise this issue. It is, of course, for the rugby authorities to set and apply their own regulations and for players to decide which code they wish to play by and ensure that they are fully acquainted with those regulations. Only the courts can decide whether any breach of the law has occurred and it must be for the individual to decide whether to pursue the matter. The chairman of the Sports Council, Sir Peter Yarranton, has expressed his disappointment at this. He is a distinguished former English international and the immediate past president of the Rugby Football Union.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that national rugby football unions should be self-funded? With respect, Wales would be better able to fund itself if it played better rugby and won more matches. Does my hon. Friend also agree that those authorities have a function in helping school children into the game more widely through the clubs and should be funded to that end?

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the importance of sport for young people, both rugby union and rugby league. That is why a number of programmes of the Sports Council and other bodies fund such schemes.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Is the Minister aware of the contents of my early-day motion 1342, which has attracted 130 signatures from hon. Members of various parties, relating to the case of Mr. Steve Pilgrim, the Wasps rugby union player who was banned for a year by the rugby union for having an amateur trial with Leeds? He has not been signed by Leeds and now finds himself in a sporting no-man's-land. Is such an attitude appropriate for a sport which receives extensive public funding and in which players are already paid for playing rugby union, and rightly so? There are people in the Chamber now who have been paid for playing rugby union football.

Mr. Key: The latter point is a matter for dispute. The Rugby Football Union and the other rugby organisations are responsible for their own rules, but I accept the general tone of the hon. Gentleman's remark and I, too, am disappointed about that particular case.

Windsor Castle

4. Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he expects the final decision on the form of restoration of Windsor castle to be made.

Mr. Brooke: I hope to make a statement of progress on this shortly.

Mr. Mudie: Does the Minister think it makes good sense to spend millions of pounds of public money on this scheme when the nation was told last week that it is so poor that pensioners' fuel bills must be taxed? Can the Minister defend that order of priorities?

Mr. Brooke: As the hon. Gentleman knows, matters of public expenditure across the whole range are looked at individually. The commitment to Windsor castle goes back to an obligation undertaken by the state in 1831.

Mr. Robert Banks: I hope that a decision to start the restoration work will be made as soon as possible. Might not the Queen decide on the form of that restoration as she has to live there?

Mr. Brooke: I join my hon. Friend in hoping that we shall be able to make an early start. The decisions on restoration would be taken by Her Majesty the Queen on advice from the Government.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Secretary of State has confirmed that the taxpayer will have to find between £30 million and £40 million towards the cost of restoration. Where is that money to come from? Will it really come from the hard-pressed national heritage budget? Is it to come from increases in value added tax which the poor and the old will be paying? How much money has come into the trust fund that the Secretary of State set up when taxpayers objected to the large blank cheque that he was signing on their behalf? Why did the Minister say to me in his letter of last week that "no representations have been made to the Royal Household about a contribution towards the costs"?

If the taxpayers are having to fork out, why should not the Queen?

Mr. Brooke: The immediate emergency expenditure on the castle, which runs to about £1·5 million in the current year, has been met from my departmental budget. I am discussing with colleagues how we would fund the subsequent restoration. Contrary to what the hon. Lady has said, the trust fund was not set up by the Government. It is run by independent trustees, to whom she should address her questions. As for the answer that I gave when the hon. Lady raised the issue with me on 11 March—when she appeared to be ignorant of the fact that a public inquiry had been set up—the reason why I gave her that answer was that it was true.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will not the restoration of Windsor castle provide thousands of hours of employment for some of the best artisans in the world?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend is right in terms of the skills that will be required from craftsmen of every sort in the restoration of the castle.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Secretary of State realise that some of the greatest British architects have constructed important public buildings abroad, but have not been recognised in this country? In the context of the new opportunities for the display of the royal collection of paintings and other art works, will the Secretary of State give particular attention to the possibility of combining those challenges to provide an exciting new building at Windsor which would be representative of the best in Britain today?

Mr. Brooke: I join the hon. Gentleman in saluting the achievements of British architects abroad, and I am delighted to say that those same British architects also design buildings in this country. The substance of his question forms part of the general debate on restoration, on which I hope to make an announcement shortly.

West Coast Main Line

5. Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment he has made of the effect on the tourist industry in the north-west of the level of service on the west coast main line.

Mr. Key: According to latest available figures, 13 per cent. of visitors to the north-west staying one night or more travelled by train. Improvements to the west coast main line will encourage greater use by everyone, including tourists.

Mrs. Kennedy: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer, but what plans does he have for talks with his colleague the Secretary of State for Transport to ensure that such improvements actually take place so that day trippers and overseas visitors using the channel tunnel, other forms of transport and the west coast main line can visit exhibitions such as the Beatles exhibition and the Tate of the north in Liverpool?

Mr. Key: The hon. Lady is right to say that it is important that the improvements take place. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has announced, those improvements will take place as soon as resources allow.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that the announcement last week that the main channel tunnel terminus for routes to the north will be at St. Pancras will be of enormous benefit to tourism in the north-west, including my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mrs. Kennedy)? That is because the links between the north-west main line into Euston and the line from St. Pancras already exist, as was confirmed to me at a meeting as recently as this morning by the senior manager in charge of InterCity services for the north-west.

Mr. Key: I know of no one—apart, perhaps, from my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Elletson)—who is as well informed about Blackpool as my hon. Friend. He has hit the nail on the head. Of course it is true that a night service will run from Paris and Brussels up the west coast main line to Glasgow. There will also be daytime services from Paris and Brussels to Manchester, and a service between Paris and Birmingham. These trains are due to start towards the end of 1995. I understand that British Rail intends to run a connecting service between Manchester and Waterloo, to begin when regular train services commence from London in mid-1994.

Libraries

6. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment his Department has made of the impact of the current year's revenue support grant on public library provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: I collect information annually from English library authorities about their expenditure plans for the coming financial year and their actual expenditure in the previous year. This year's planned spending total was higher than the previous year's outturn.

Mr. Gerrard: Does the Minister accept that public library services are declining and that closures of libraries and reductions in opening hours are becoming commonplace under local authorities of all political persuasions? Is that not the inevitable result of the Government's financial pressure on local authorities to cut spending? What does the Minister intend to do to help local authorities to deliver efficient library services?

Mr. Key: No, I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. Total gross expenditure on public libraries in England rose by 17 per cent. in real terms over the past 10 years. I have looked carefully at actual and proposed cuts and there is no current evidence of a breach of statutory duty. Book issues were up 3 per cent. in the last year for which figures are available, issues of children's books were up by 8 per cent., and a staggering 489 million books were issued that year.

Mrs. Angela Knight: Is my hon. Friend aware that some local authorities such as Derbyshire see libaries as a soft target and will propose to close them or to curtail opening hours rather than trying to control expenditure in other areas? Will he undertake to keep such matters under careful scrutiny so that constituents such as mine in Erewash get the services that they require and pay for?

Mr. Key: Yes, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and to the Conservative county councillors on her council, for keeping me so well informed about the situation in Derbyshire. I have looked at it carefully and I am confident that there is no breach of statutory duty. I will not, therefore, be setting up a public inquiry, but I assure my hon. Friend that we are keeping the situation under careful review, especially in Derbyshire, and if there is any such evidence my chief library adviser will, of course, advise me accordingly.

Mr. Skinner: If the Minister intends to keep library services in Derbyshire under review, why does he not also guarantee that Derbyshire county council—which has had a mandate from the people against the Tory party, including the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), since 1981—has returned to it the £40 million of cuts in Government grant? Then no library in Derbyshire will be affected and the community education system will prosper. Let us have less hypocrisy from the Dispatch Box and from Tory Members about what is happening in Derbyshire, given that the Conservative Government are responsible for all the cuts.

Mr. Key: It is always a pleasure to be questioned by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), although I wish he would change the record once a year or so. I recall a similar exchange with him before. Standard spending assessments are set to take account of library services. Derbyshire, along with other authorities, has one problem: it contains a lot of reactionary people who seem to think that libraries should not change to match the changing requirements, aspirations and demands of their people.

When libraries do change, they flourish—as has happened in the past few years, with more books and more expenditure on public libraries.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: May I refer my hon. Friend to the good interview on LBC this morning, in which the non-statutory service offered by Westminster city council—the Westminster music library—was discussed? Will he consider the possibility of a national music library which might take over some of the funding responsibilities from Westminster, which currently provides a service—scores, compositions and other printed music—for most of the country's amateur and semi-professional orchestras?

Mr. Key: Not for the first time, my hon. Friend has come up with an interesting idea. I should like time to think about it.

Coarse Fishing

7. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what support his Department gives to the sport of coarse fishing.

Mr. Brooke: Most Government funding of sport is made through the Sports Council. In 1991, the Sports Council paid grant of £20,000 to the National Federation of Anglers, the governing body for course fishing. The grant paid so far for 1992 is £15,000, but final levels of grant for that year and this are likely to be decided in May.

Mr. Clarke: The Secretary of State will be aware that his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is setting up the Environment Protection Agency—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] Yes, I am.

Madam Speaker: Order. That is just the sort of confession for which I have been waiting. The hon. Gentleman knows that during Question Time hon. Members do not read.

Mr. Clarke: Will the Secretary of State ask his right hon. and learned Friend to confer with the 4 million anglers—it is the most popular sport in Britain—about the work of the proposed agency so that we can ensure that it benefits both the environment and the anglers who enjoy that most popular sport?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman makes what appears to be a wholly unexceptionable request. I will certainly talk to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend not find it slightly ironic that the cheers in favour of angling and fishing come from those who, on every other occasion, are against any form of blood sport?

Mr. Brooke: That particular contradiction has been remarked on by others. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning it again.

Children's Play

8. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what action he is taking to support or promote children's play and recreation other than in regard to direct and organised sporting activity; and what steps are being taken towards the fulfilment of the United Kingdom's obligations in respect of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child.

Mr. Key: We recognise the importance of play to children's development and are fully committed to providing appropriate funding and other support for it. From April 1993, the Sports Council will take over the play unit's responsibilities for the national play information centre and playwork education and training along with seven of the unit's current staff. Our obligations under the United Nations convention on the rights of the child are also being met through the work that both the Arts Council and the Sports Council are doing to promote wider leisure opportunities for young people, and through the policies of the Departments of the Environment and of Employment.

Mr. Hardy: In the light of that answer, and following the recent and not unhelpful meeting held with hon. Members from both sides of the House, may we take it that the Under-Secretary of State is confirming that the Sports Council fully recognises the importance of children's play and that no lesser dedication of resources will be provided than under the previous arrangements?

Mr. Key: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who rightly said that the all-party group had a constructive meeting. I assure him that the Sports Council takes its commitment seriously. It has already earmarked £220,000 as a base figure. It is also considering further funding for the four national centres for playwork education and the National Voluntary Council for Children's Play.

I should point out that this year the Great Britain Sports Council will be replaced by the United Kingdom Sports Commission and the Sports Council for England. We shall consider with them how their policy areas should develop.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the right of a child to recreation is preceded by the right to life? Does he therefore regret the fact that 4 million children have been murdered under the Abortion Act 1967, introduced by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel)?

Mr. Key: No.

Mr. Pendry: How can the Under-Secretary of State be satisfied that adequate resources will be made available to local play providers by the Sports Council at a time when that body is undergoing a major restructuring exercise following the Atkins review? Surely this is not the time to put at risk the good work of the play unit by merging it with the Sports Council—an organisation, incidentally, with no history of involvement in children's play other than that of accounting officer.

In the light of recent tragic events in Liverpool and elsewhere, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is vital that young children are offered stimulating alternatives to wandering the streets aimlessly? Even at this late stage, will he think again about the particular exercise that he is undertaking, because the play unit is the only agency dedicated to children's recreational needs?

Mr. Key: If that were true, I should be inclined to think again, but I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that the decision was reached after substantial consultation over many weeks. I recognise our responsibilities under article 31 of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child, on which the Children Act 1989 is based. The Government's commitment is underlined not just by the public money spent by the Sports Council, but through the Department of Employment. Its out-of-school care grant, paid via the training and enterprise councils, will be £45 million over three years and will give rise to 50,000 child care places.

National Lottery

9. Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what estimate he has made of the likely proceeds from the proposed national lottery which will be available for distribution to the arts, sport, heritage, charities and the millennium fund.

Mr. Key: That will depend on the total turnover of the lottery and the amounts devoted to prizes, expenses and taxation.

Mr. Kilfoyle: What does the Minister say to the many people who have high expectations of the national lottery, and who now realise that the Chancellor will take nearly three times as much of the proceeds as charities—and, indeed, any other beneficiaries? What will he tell those people, who realise that when—as is inevitable—the Chancellor raises the rate of taxation on the lottery, more money will go to the Exchequer than to all the other beneficiaries combined?

Mr. Key: The latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question is pure speculation. In answer to the earlier part, let me say first that it was always thought right for some taxation to apply, as it was always envisaged that some expenditure would be displaced from other goods and services bearing tax. Secondly, let me say that I am delighted that the level of tax has been set at only 12 per cent., although the hon. Gentleman and other Opposition Members have been telling us for some weeks in Committee that it would be between 20 and 30 per cent.

Mr. Tracey: I trust that my hon. Friend, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, will note that once the lottery's proceeds are distributed, the Treasury will make a considerable amount from VAT on capital projects and the like.

Are my hon. Friend's officials taking the earliest possible steps to appoint a director general and to produce the tender documents for promoters? We hope that those documents will be as simple as possible, thereby encouraging innovation.

Mr. Key: We are making progress as rapidly as we can, but we can make little further progress until the House has agreed to the legislation. We hope very much that we shall be able to do so before too long: following Royal Assent, which we hope will take place by the summer, we shall be in a position to make the appointments to which my hon. Friend has referred.

Mr. Corbett: Given what the National Council for Voluntary Organisations has called the Chancellor's "sheer greed" in taking 12p off the top of every £1 ticket, will not the five good causes have to share a maximum of between 25p and 26p? As was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle), that will leave the charities with 5p between them. Will the Minister join me in recognising that we made a mistake in Committee—that we should have nailed down a minimum of 35 per cent. for good causes on the face of the Bill? Will he now undertake to table an amendment to that effect on Report?

Mr. Key: No—for the very good reason that we debated that precise point at some length in Committee. I well recall explaining that putting a fixed figure on the amount to go to good causes would not necessarily be in the interests of those good causes, among whom the overall amount raised would then be distributed.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I know that my hon. Friend wants to be helpful to charities. Will he give an undertaking to monitor any displacement of charitable giving that may result from the national lottery, and also to monitor the net impact of the lottery on charitable giving?

Mr. Key: Yes, of course. That is precisely why we have laid down on the face of the Bill that the 20 per cent. to be received by each of the five categories of good cause should be reviewed by the House of Commons in the lifetime of each Parliament.

Mr. Barry Jones: Will the Minister confirm that regional orchestras will receive money from the lottery's proceeds?

Mr. Key: Fortunately, that will not be for Ministers to decide; it will be decided by the committees of the arts councils responsible. That is why I think that the establishment of a separate arts council for Wales will benefit Welsh orchestras.

Mr. John Carlisle: If the proceeds of the national lottery are as generous as my hon. Friend and many other hon. Members hope, will my hon. Friend consider adjusting the ring fence that he has placed around it? It might then be possible for the money received to replace taxpayers' funding of the arts, sport and so forth. Public expenditure would be saved and sport would benefit, because, on that calculation, it would receive more than it receives now.

Mr. Key: I think that my hon. Friend must have had lunch with my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

10. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what examination his Department has made of the impact of the proposed national lottery on fund raising for non-league soccer clubs, rugby union and other sports clubs; and what representations he has had by or on behalf of such clubs.

Mr. Brooke: We received a number of representations from sports clubs and have amended the Bill. We do not anticipate that the national lottery will have any demonstrable impact on the fund-raising activities of football or sports clubs. Participation in those activities is primarily motivated by an interest in or association with the organisation concerned.

Mr. Mackinlay: Is the Secretary of State aware that thousands upon thousands of people enjoy and benefit from watching soccer at the level below the Football League—the Vauxhall conference, and the Diadora Isthmian, Beazer Homes and HFS Loans leagues? The clubs who play in those leagues, and other non-league clubs, are very much dependent on local lotteries and scratch cards. Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that those clubs will not be prejudiced in their fund raising by the impact of the lottery Bill and may continue to raise funds by a combination of scratch cards and their own lotteries, as well as benefiting from the spot-the-ball competitions that fund some of the clubs' activities?

Mr. Brooke: The National Lottery Etc. Bill contains measures to increase the maximum proceeds in any one society or local authority lottery, to increase the maximum prize, and to amend existing registration requirements for lotteries. All those measures will make small lotteries more attractive. My hon. Friend the Minister and I listened to constructive criticism in Committee and have sought to make those changes more attractive.

Mr. Alton: Will the Secretary of State introduce further amendments on Report? Is he not aware that many small football clubs, from Tranmere to Rochdale, and many small charities are concerned about the national lottery's effects on them? Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to use proceeds from the national lottery to finance Olympic projects in the Manchester bid? If so, is that not money which otherwise might have been used for sport and the arts?

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and I will look at observations that were made in Committee before the Bill reaches Report stage. When I watched Bolton Wanderers score a notable victory over Leyton Orient, Bolton Wanderers took the opportunity to make representations to me. I have not yet replied to them. In the context of the Olympic bid, it is important first to secure the nomination of Manchester in September.

Libraries

11. Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment his Department has made of changes in public library opening hours.

Mr. Key: I continue to assess the provision of public library services in England, including opening hours, by analysing statistics and by listening to users and providers of the service.

Ms Jackson: Is the Minister aware that public libraries provide a great deal more than books, music and pictures for borrowing? They provide a safe, warm environment for many elderly people. As the Government have imposed value added tax on fuel, which will preclude the elderly and those on low incomes heating their own homes in future winters, will the Minister ensure that local authorities are encouraged to expand and extend public library opening hours, and are funded accordingly?

Mr. Key: I should love to, but the hon. Lady ought to have a word with her own Labour council in Camden. It was Camden's misfortune to have to take a vote on whether its libraries remained open. It was a close-run thing. They remained open on the casting vote of the chairman, with the Conservatives in favour, but the Labour party voting against the libraries remaining open.

Mr. Matthew Banks: Does my hon. Friend agree that flexibility is the most important factor in library opening hours? Rather than having simply nine-to-five opening hours, libraries should open when it is sensible for them to open and when the public want them to be open.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is as true of rural areas as of urban areas. The flexibility shown in rural areas by the use of mobile public libraries proves just how much library professionals are moving ahead of some who seek to govern them.

Sports Commission and Sports Council

12. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultations he has held with staff at the Sports Council concerning the creation of the United Kingdom Sports Commission and the Sports Council for England.

Mr. Brooke: I have had no such discussions. The Sports Council is responsible for its own day-to-day management, including employee relations, and I understand that it is currently discussing the implications of the reorganisation with its staff.

Mr. Barnes: When will the Sports Council be given the go-ahead to engage in the reorganisation that it proposed, which involves staff restructuring? The Secretary of State's answer was disgraceful. He should be involved in the discussions. Some people do not want to dither and dodge, as the Secretary of State's Department does, so the Sports Council should be allowed to go ahead with the reorganisation.

Mr. Brooke: I received broad proposals regarding the functions and resources of the successor bodies towards the end of last year, and the detailed staffing proposals in support of them during January. My officials have been involved in detailed discussions with the Sports Council to ensure that the proposed package provides the best value for money. In the light of these discussions, I expect shortly to receive revised proposals from the Sports Council.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Police Officers (False Evidence)

30. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Attorney-General if it is his practice to review other similar cases involving any police officer convicted of concocting or giving false evidence.

The Attorney-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): Whenever a police officer is convicted of such an offence, the Crown prosecution service reviews all pending prosecutions and appeals, of which it is aware, in which that officer is involved.

Mr. Bottomley: The House will be glad to have heard my right hon. and learned Friend's answer. He will not know that one of my first cases 17 years ago was that of a young man who had been wrongly convicted on the false evidence of a detective constable. It was only by chance, five years later, when the detective constable had become a detective sergeant in a different police service, that we saw a newspaper report about his conviction, which led to the quashing of an unsafe conviction some time before. Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider consulting the prosecuting authorities and the chief constables to find out whether it would be possible to re-examine concluded cases, sometimes going back over many years, in order to ascertain whether there have been miscarriages of justice which might be detected?

The Attorney-General: It is not necessarily easy to trace back in every case to find out exactly which officer gave evidence. However, in any case where the Crown prosecution service has reason to believe that such an officer's evidence may have adversely affected the safety of a conviction, the Crown prosecution service will take steps to ensure proper disclosure to the defendant so that he may take such action, by way of appeal, albeit out of time, as he thinks fit.

Convictions (Magistrates Courts)

31. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General what proportion of cases pursued by the Crown prosecution service in the magistrates courts in 1991-92 resulted in a conviction.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Derek Spencer): Of the 1,068,750 defendants tried in the magistrates courts during the year 1991-92, 1,040,997 were convicted or pleaded guilty, representing a conviction rate of 97·4 per cent.

Mr. Taylor: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware of the increasing anxiety among police officers that attacks and assaults on them during the course of their duty are not being prosecuted with the necessary severity by the Crown prosecution service, which often downgrades the charges made, or even drops them altogether? Given that 239 officers in Surrey were assaulted in 1992 alone, is that not an outrage and should not people who assault police officers in the course of their duties automatically be locked up?

The Solicitor-General: I hope that I can reassure my hon. Friend that things are not as gloomy as the picture that he has just painted. Whenever offences are reduced in gravity, it is always done consistent with the interests of justice. There is a wide range of penalties to deal with assaults and obstructing the police. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that, as compared with assaults on other victims, the use of custody as a penalty for police assaults is consistently higher—nearly twice as high for a section 20 assault, three times as high for a section 47 assault and five times as high for common assault.

Mr. John Morris: In view of the appalling and worsening crime wave, what is the explanation for the apparent reduction in the number of cases coming before magistrates courts? Have any instructions been given that there should be greater use of cautioning and, if so, by whom? And is that connected with the Government's attempt to limit costs in the courts?

The Solicitor-General: The Crown prosecution service is not responsible for the number of people charged or arrested. Last year, the discontinuance rate in the magistrates court was 13·3 per cent. and in the Crown court it was 7·8 per cent. Those rates were not gravely different from those of the preceding year. The purpose of the Crown prosecution service is to weed out weak cases. There is absolutely no point in the Crown prosecution service conducting cases that are going to result in an acquittal. I assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that discontinuance does not take place on ground of cost.

Convictions (Fraud)

32. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Attorney-General how many cases have been brought to trial by the Serious Fraud Office since its inception; and how many defendants have been convicted.

The Solicitor-General: The Serious Fraud Office has brought 103 cases to trial, involving 221 defendants of whom 139 were convicted.

Mr. Rowe: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that that is some comfort? Is it not the case that, by concentrating so heavily on a small number of very well-publicised cases in which defendants have been acquitted, we are receiving a wholly distorted view of the important work of this office?

The Solicitor-General: My hon. Friend is quite right. The SFO prosecutes cases that previously would not have been prosecuted because they were too complex and unmanageable. It is at the leading edge of criminal jurisprudence. A disproportionate amount of publicity is given to a few isolated acquittals. In the last year, 43 defendants were tried and 29 were convicted. That gives a conviction rate of 67 per cent.

Ms Abbott: Is the Minister aware of public dissatisfaction with the work of the Serious Fraud Office, especially in the Guinness trial, when all manner of crooks and spivs were able to walk free? Why should there be one law for rich people who swindle millions of pounds of other people's money and another law for the poor?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Lady seems to have lost contact with reality. In the case that she quoted, a number of defendants were convicted. In fact, the argument that we hear about the powers of the Serious Fraud Office is that they should be extended to the fraud investigation group.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that many believe that there are a few very lucky men in this country, and some people would like the Roskill report's recommendations on fraud trials to be brought into operation?

The Solicitor-General: Most of the recommendations of the Roskill commission were brought into effect. One that was not brought into effect was the replacement of trial by jury with trial in some other way. That was a very serious step which the House decided not to take. Most people take the view that we should perfect existing means of trial before considering a trial other than by jury.

Mr. Alan Moses QC

33. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General on how many occasions Mr. Alan Moses QC has appeared as counsel to Her Majesty's Government.

The Attorney-General: Alan Moses QC has appeared frequently for the Crown in civil and criminal proceedings. From 1985 until 1990, he was Standing Counsel for the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Dalyell: Why did he say that he had read the relevant documents and did not consider them to be of any use to the defence for the foreseeable future? What explanation can there be, other than that so able and experienced a lawyer was trying, quite improperly, to protect Ministers, even though it meant that directors of Matrix Churchill could land up in prison? And, please, do not hide behind the skirts of Lord Justice Scott.

The Attorney-General: Alan Moses is independent counsel of high standing and integrity. Instead of casting aspersions in his own way, the hon. Gentleman should await the outcome of the careful and independent inquiry being conducted by Lord Justice Scott.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Is not it the case that the defence counsel in the Matrix trial wrote to The Times and stated specifically that Mr. Alan Moses for the Crown had behaved perfectly properly in every way and had performed in accordance with decided cases? Is not it, therefore, an appalling slur on Mr. Moses that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has totally refused to consult the defence counsel before making his allegation?

The Attorney-General: My hon. and learned Friend draws attention to a letter which is in the public domain and which could well be consulted by the House generally. I suggest that it gives a more balanced view than that of earlier questioners.

Mr. Dalyell: In view of the totally unsatisfactory reply, I should like to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Right to Silence

34. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Attorney-General what submission his Department has made to the Royal Commission on criminal justice on changes to the right to silence; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I discussed this issue with the royal commission at a meeting at which it sought my views on a range of issues. My personal thoughts on the ability of the court to draw inferences from silence in appropriate cases were set out in my speech last October to the Howard League for Penal Reform, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Brazier: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer and I welcome his views, as far as they go, set out in that speech. Many people would like the Government to go further and to remove altogether the right to silence in cases in which people have been killed, such as cases in which children have been killed at home. The country looks to the Government and not to the liberal consciences of the Runciman commission to take the ultimate view on the matter.

The Attorney-General: We should not anticipate the advice of the royal commission. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the Murray case, a recent case in the House of Lords, which shows the proper balance to be considered when discussing the right to silence. It points to the fact that inferences can be drawn only in a case in which there is already a prima facie case and in circumstances in which it is proper, in the legal sense of that word, to do so.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Russia

39. Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on British and EC aid to Russia.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): Since 1991, the United Kingdom has committed almost £400 million in bilateral help for Russia to support political and economic reform. We have also contributed one sixth of the EC's assistance programmes.

Mr. Mandelson : As I recently visited Russia in the company of Lord Healey, will the Minister accept from me that the reports of Russia's economic crisis are certainly not exaggerated and that the crisis is considerably worsened by the political paralysis there? Does he agree with the view of the German Foreign Minister, Klaus Kinkel, that international aid needs to be increased radically if Russia's economic reforms are to have any chance of success? Will the Minister accept the view of the French Government that an emergency meeting of the G7 countries should take place to organise that effort?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Government strongly support President Yeltsin's economic and political reforms, which are going through an extremely difficult period. The G7 countries are urgently considering how best to demonstrate support for President Yeltsin, both politically and substantially, and that includes consideration of meetings at some stage in the early future.

Mr. Garnier: What assistance, other than technical assistance, is this country giving to the Russians?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Russia will, for example, receive the lion's share of our know-how fund, worth £100 million over the next six years, £13 million of which has been used in Russia so far with many projects now in the pipeline.

Mr. Meacher: Will the Minister accept that whatever the needs of Russia are, the need of sub-Saharan Africa, which contains two thirds of the world's poorest 50 countries, is far greater? Why, then, does he propose a large real-terms increase in British aid to Russia and to eastern Europe at the expense of a large real-terms cut in British aid to Africa? Why does he also propose to triple the proportion of British aid that is channelled through the European Community over the next five years when EC aid policy does not concentrate on the poorest countries, but prioritises eastern Europe and when Commissioner Marin, the Spanish EC aid Commissioner, is now downgrading Africa in favour of Spanish-speaking Latin American countries?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Gentleman should accept —as he never will—that the increase this year in aid generally to the poor world is 1 per cent. in real terms. Our contributions to European Community aid are determined by our share of European Community aid and are not for decision by the British Government in the first instance.

Tools for Self Reliance

40. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance he will give Tools for Self Reliance in providing practical help to poorer countries.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Tools for Self Reliance is welcome to apply to us for assistance.

Mr. Colvin: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to congratulate Tools for Self Reliance, which has its headquarters in my constituency and runs some 165 centres for the collection and refurbishment of tools for export to third-world countries? As the Government's philosophy is that the intention of overseas aid should be to assist other countries in helping themselves, will my hon. Friend give favourable consideration to an application, if received, in respect of assistance for the refurbishment and export of tools to make tools, such as lathes and blacksmiths' equipment? If my hon. Friend has seen early-day motion 1050, which has all-party support, will he get the message across to other Departments of State—particularly the Ministry of Defence, which is unfortunately likely to have a large number of spare tools available in the near future?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As I have suggested to my hon. Friend privately, I think that it would be a good idea if Tools for Self Reliance contacted the Overseas Development Administration and entered into discussion with it. Of course, British non-governmental organisations such as the one to which my hon. Friend refers have received strong Government support under the joint funding scheme, whose budget has increased rapidly over the past few years—indeed, it has more than doubled over the past four years. We do, indeed, help such projects, although we should clearly have to discuss what was proposed.

Mr. Olner: Did the Minister see the exhibition in the Jubilee Room about tools for third-world countries? I agree absolutely that those countries need tools, but does the Minister agree that the reference made at that meeting to the young people of African countries gaining dignity through being able to work could apply equally to the young people of Birmingham, Nuneaton and the west midlands, or anywhere else in Britain, and that we should really be giving the young people of this country some dignity through work?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As regards Tools for Self Reliance and other similar organisations, the Overseas Development Administration gives significant help and certainly helps through grants in support of appropriate technology projects that help underdeveloped countries in Africa with tools. We certainly make a large contribution in that respect.

Bosnian Orphans

41. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received about the fate of Bosnian orphans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have received a number of representations and share the deep concern felt by many in this country about the fate of children who have been orphaned in the tragic conflict in Bosnia.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the concerns of British couples who are prepared to adopt orphans abandoned by mothers who have been raped by Serbian soldiers? Will he confirm that up to 20,000 women were so violated?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I cannot confirm the figures that my hon. Friend cites, but I can say that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health has taken a close interest in this particular tragic matter and has made it clear that, in appropriate cases, his Department will help with the adoption of children who have been conceived as a result of rape.

Mr. Tony Banks: Does the Minister recall the suggestion of His Holiness the Pope that Bosnian Muslim women who had been raped should bear their children? Given that many of us found that offensive, what steps do the Government propose to take now to counsel those women who decide to take the Pope's advice?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, a report was carried out by Dame Anne Warburton into that dreadful area. The ODA has commissioned Marie Stopes International to examine the practical problems of managing and implementing the recommendations made by the Warburton mission in Bosnia.

Somalia

42. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the present level of British aid being sent to Somalia.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Britain has pledged almost £43 million worth of emergency relief assistance for Somalia since January 1992, including its share of European Community aid.

Mr. Fabricant: Is my hon. Friend aware that the United Nations has stated that British aid is the most effective in the western world? Is he further aware that Britain has peculiar and special expertise in the sourcing and finding of fresh water supplies in villages in Africa? What are we doing in Somalia?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Britain is the third largest bilateral donor to the relief effort in Somalia: some £43 million has been pledged in the past 15 months. I would add that there is £5·5 million worth available immediately on the table for suitable non-governmental organisations and United Nations projects that may apply for it. The British Government have also given substantial money to the north of Somalia which includes, as my hon. Friend referred to it, rehabilitation of water supply projects.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. John MacGregor): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the proposed new railway line between the channel tunnel and London, and about the Ashford international passenger station.

I have today given the go-ahead for the Ashford international passenger station. I have given British Rail both a full approval and the funding it needs to carry out immediately all the track, signalling and platform works, totalling £30 million. In parallel, my Department and British Rail will explore urgently with the private sector ways of involving its expertise and capital in the construction of the station buildings. The Government are fully committed to having the station completed as soon as possible, so that Kent and other parts of the south-east can gain the full benefits from the channel tunnel.

Turning to the channel tunnel rail link, the House will recall that my predecessor announced in October 1991 the route corridor preferred by the Government, which approaches London from the east via Stratford and terminates at King's Cross; and he invited British Rail to refine the route. For this work, British Rail formed a subsidiary, Union Railways, which draws on the skills of both the public and private sectors. Its work has been thorough and professional.

Great effort has gone into achieving a route with proper environmental standards which largely follows existing transport corridors and at the same time reduces the costs substantially. As a result of this work, the line is now estimated to cost between £2 billion and £3 billion—considerably less than before, without any loss in the overall benefits, environmental or otherwise, of the route, and with some gain.

The Union Railways report offers a series of options on the precise route, and does not make recommendations between them. The Government have concluded that the route which should now be put to public consultation is as follows.

Between the channel tunnel and Detling, north of Maidstone, the route would largely follow the previously safeguarded route. However, at Ashford the route would run to the north of the town, with a tunnel under the M20 and then running parallel to the motorway. This route is environmentally superior to the former safeguarded route. It is also £86 million less expensive, and it would have less impact on existing and potential development within the town.

For the section of the route crossing the Medway valley, we prefer an option in the report which, from the east, would diverge from the M20 corridor, passing through a 4 km tunnel under Blue Bell hill, before crossing the Medway alongside the existing M2 bridge and following the corridor of the M2 and A2 on the surface. This is not the cheapest option, but it has substantial environmental advantages, at a modest additional cost.

South of Gravesend, there is provision for a connection to Waterloo. The main route would run along the Ebbsfleet valley then tunnel under the Thames, to run alongside the existing London, Tilbury and Southend railway from north of Purfleet to east of Barking. From there it would enter a tunnel to Stratford, where there remains an option for a station. This route overcomes a number of engineering and environmental difficulties associated with the more southerly route published in 1991.

West of Stratford, there are two options. One option is for a tunnel all the way to the proposed King's Cross low-level station. The alternative is for a tunnel from Stratford to a point on the north London line railway west of Dalston Kingsland station, then continuing alongside the north London line by reinstating the original four-track alignment within the existing railway boundaries, before finally swinging south over railway lands into St. Pancras station.

The tunnel route to King's Cross has significantly more impact on property settlement and noise levels than the route via the north London line, which is an important consideration from the environmental point of view. The St. Pancras option also appears to be less expensive than the King's Cross low-level proposal, and that is important in terms of practical feasibility, in relation both to public expenditure and private capital.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget speech, the Government's preference is for the St. Pancras option. We recognise that, before we come to the final view, futher work will be needed on the environmental, planning, regeneration, safety and engineering aspects of the proposal, and on exploring the options for developing the Thameslink services. I have asked Union Railways to carry this forward as a matter of urgency.

The new railway will bring great benefits. It will reduce journey times for international passengers, compared to what will be available in the early years following the opening of the channel tunnel, by at least 33 minutes, and by more in the commuter peaks, to 2 hours 27 minutes from London to Paris and 2 hours 7 minutes to Brussels.

The railway will transform commuting from many parts of Kent, with a large increase in capacity, enhanced reliability and dramatic reductions in journey times. Construction of the railway will create about 15,000 jobs. The railway will also contribute substantially to the regeneration of the east Thames corridor and more widely. The Union Railways report also sets out ideas for related rail projects which could stimulate further regeneration.

The Government consider that the benefits of this project are such that it should now go forward as a joint venture between the public and private sectors. The Government are prepared in principle to provide substantial public sector support in recognition of the domestic transport benefits from the new line.

The next stage is to consult on the proposals. I want the consultation to be thorough and well informed. It will be led by Union Railways, and I should like it to be completed by mid-October. Only then will we take the final decisions on the route, and I shall then safeguard it. In the meantime, I am releasing the safeguarding from the two sections of route which have been superseded by that which I have just announced. The Union Railways report and the independent review of Union Railways' work undertaken by my advisers Samuel Montagu and W. S. Atkins are available in the Vote Office.

In parallel with the public consultation, my Department, with Samuel Montagu and Union Railways, will be discussing with the private sector its participation in a joint venture. Our aim is to find a way of taking the project forward which offers the private sector a proper return on its investment and secures value for money to the taxpayer. Union Railways will be made into a separate, initially Government-owned, company once the relevant powers have been granted under the Railways Bill now before the House and we intend that in due course the project will be transferred to the private sector.

Following safeguarding, the project will proceed by hybrid Bill. Provided that we press ahead quickly, it should be possible for the railway to be completed by around the turn of the decade—[HON. MEMBERS: "Next century."] Equally, it should be completed by the end of the decade, which is only seven years away.

The time has come to end the uncertainty. Our decision to give the go-ahead to the new railway will enable us to secure the benefits which it will bring for international travellers, for Kent and Essex commuters, and for regeneration in the east Thames corridor. This will be a massive undertaking. The preferred route I have proposed today is environmentally sensitive, realistic and financially feasible as a joint venture.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): It is almost five years since the decision was taken to build a dedicated channel tunnel high-speed rail route from London. The Secretary of State's announcement today confirms further delay, uncertainty and planning blight, with the completion of the line pushed into the next century—not to the end of the decade. The use of the line has been delayed until 10 years after the opening of the channel tunnel.

While Britain will enter the 21st century on the back of a 19th-century railway system, our French partners, who started at the same time, have built their modern system ready for the opening of the tunnel and 10 years ahead of Britain. Last week they announced a further 200-mile extension of their tunnel rail link to Strasbourg, at a price of £2 billion.

The delay can be fairly laid at the Government's door. It has been caused by their lack of strategic thinking and their ideological requirement that the rail link should be private finance-led, receive no public financial support, and be privately owned. That has maximised delay, planning blight and uncertainty, and damaged Britain's economic future in Europe.

The handling of the issue was typically illustrated by the way in which the Government botched even the delayed announcement of the route and the leak by the Meridian television company. They are a Government of blunder and blight. They lack vision, commitment and common sense. They will severely damage our economic processes in Europe and cause a decade of misery and uncertainty in large areas of Kent and London.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that the high-speed rail link to the channel tunnel cannot be financed by the private sector alone? His statement today seemed to suggest that Government money and guarantees will be required if proper environmental safeguards were to be met. Does the Secretary of State accept that the southern route was effectively cancelled by his predecessor Lord Parkinson in June 1989 because the Government were not prepared to find the £500 million capital grant guarantee required by the private sector? Does his statement today mean that there has been a change in the Government's policy to ensure that the priorities of least cost and maximum profit do not overrule the major environmental priorities, especially in the Kent and London area?

Is it still the Government's policy that the environmental damage in Kent should be reduced by tunnelling, as in the London section? Will he reaffirm the assurance given in October 1991 by the previous Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) that the southern route, which involved 25 km of tunnelling, would be replaced by the east London route, which involved 38 km of tunnelling, including tunnelling under the beautiful area of the Boxley valley? Will the Secretary of State confirm that the Union Railways route which he has just announced represents less than one third of the original tunnelling proposal, and that yet again the Government are reneging on one of their past commitments?

Will the Secretary of State consider a more generous compensation scheme, along the lines proposed by the French in their channel tunnel rail project, in view of the tremendous disruption along any proposed route in the Kent and London areas? Is it still the Government's view that choosing the eastern route was justified because the eastern corridor provided tremendous regeneration opportunities for north Kent and east London? When can we expect him, or, indeed, the Department of the Environment, to make a statement on that?

Can the Secretary of State tell us anything about the station strategy on the route, especially as he appears to have decided that St. Pancras should be the London terminus and has announced the Ashford centre? What studies have been done to justify the selection of St. Pancras? What compensation has been paid by British Rail to the developers of the King's Cross site? What are the consequences for Thameslink, crossrail and the Jubilee line, all of which are dependent on private finance and all of which have been considerably delayed?

Does the Secretary of State accept that the channel tunnel is of utmost importance to areas outside London and Kent, and especially parts of the north? Will the choice of St. Pancras over King's Cross delay passenger through journeys to the north in any way? What plans does the Secretary of State have to modernise the west coast main line?

Does the Secretary of State accept that other areas need a Euro-gauge standard route for freight? Will he agree that it is necessary to review the present freight transport route, which is based at Willesden and requires London rail freight traffic to travel across London rather than around it, forcing thousands of lorries to use roads from the north through Kent, rather than the rail alternative?

If the Government had adopted Labour's proposals for the route, which were published three years ago, and if they had accepted public and private financing, it would now have been well on the way to completion. Britain will once again pay a heavy price for the Government's sheer incompetence.

Mr. MacGregor: I noticed that the hon. Gentleman accused me of incompetence last week because I did not make the statement then, but that was typical of him. I shall explain that incompetence to the House. It was outrageous of the hon. Gentleman, because I wished to make a statement last Wednesday, following the Chancellor's announcement, but did not do so and agreed to make a statement today to accommodate the Opposition, through the usual channels.

Then what happened? The hon. Gentleman got hold of a leak on Thursday and provoked unjustified worries and fears among many people in Kent, through widespread coverage of the leak. It is typical of the hon. Gentleman to accuse me of incompetence when I was trying to accommodate the Opposition, and when he himself led to the problem.

I find it amusing to discover that one of the hon. Gentleman's main opening attacks was to accuse me of saying that the channel tunnel would be completed next century, rather than at the end of the decade. Does the hon. Gentleman not know that they are both the same? It was a rather pathetic attack.

I shall deal with as many of the hon. Gentleman's questions as possible, although it would require a speech to answer them all. Obviously, I wish to diminish the delay, uncertainty and planning blight; that is why, the moment that I became Secretary of State, I focused on the channel tunnel rail link, and why I am pleased to announce the decision today. I am anxious to minimise the uncertainty, which the statement does to a great extent, including de-safeguarding some of the routes. I am anxious to get rid of planning blight as quickly as possible, and that is why we have removed quite a number of areas from it through the announcement.

I am keen to get on with consultation—I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not think that I am avoiding it—so that we can come to a decision finally on the route and its safeguarding.

On the comparison with the French, the hon. Gentleman will know that the Waterloo terminal is nearly completed and that there will be full connections until the end of the decade. The problem is that, after the end of the decade, there will be congestion on those lines, which is why we are going ahead with the channel tunnel high-speed link now. The hon. Gentleman does not seem to recognise that it is easier to carry through a route more quickly in the north of France, which is flat and less congested, and which has fewer of the many difficult areas and issues that we have had to tackle on the whole route through Kent, which is one of the loveliest but most geologically difficult parts of the country, as well as one of the most congested. The hon. Gentleman does not understand the difference between the two.

The hon. Gentleman referred to no public financial support. He clearly was not listening, because I made it clear today—in a specific, clear and new announcement—that the Government will give public financial support. The hon. Gentleman describes that as changing policy, but it comes as a result of a thorough investigation of the whole issue. I should have thought that he would welcome the announcement today. In recognition of the many benefits to domestic passenger services, particularly in Kent but also in Essex, it is right to make that public contribution, and we have made that clear for the first time.

Next, the hon. Gentleman asked whether we were going for the least-cost option. In some cases we are not. I have made it clear that, where environmental benefits justify it, we have gone for a more expensive option. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would have given credit to Union Railways and to the many people who assisted the company to produce a solution—as a result of defining more clearly all the aspects of the original Ove Arup route—that is environmentally more beneficial and costs less. I should have thought that he would have given them some credit for doing so, but it is typical of the hon. Gentleman to justify everything by the amount of public money that he wishes to throw at it, and not to consider whether we are getting value for money.

I shall be unable to deal with all the points raised by the hon. Gentleman, but, on tunnelling, the options are set out in the Union Railways report. In all but one case, the environmental impact of going for tunnelling would be worse or no better than not going for tunnelling. Let me be clear about that. In the one case where it would be better, which is the long tunnel at the Medway, the additional cost would be between £150 million and £200 million. We did not think that that was justified. At least three quarters of the route, as now defined, will be in tunnel or will make use of or be alongside existing transport corridors. The report has been extremely skilfully worked out, and has provided environmental benefits and less cost.

The hon. Gentleman asked me whether the choice of the east route was justified. I have already made it clear that I fully supported the route that was decided by my predecessor. It is justified not least because of the regeneration effects along the east Thames corridor. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will make a statement about that shortly.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether studies had been made to justify the option of St. Pancras. Yes, they have. Once we had decided to go for the route from Stratford and east of London, a key element was the fact that it became possible to consider the St. Pancras option. It would have been difficult to do that from the southern route. I asked Union Railways and British Rail to look again at that option. They gave me a report last month, and I thought it right to come to the House quickly to say that it is the preferred option. I have asked Union Railways to do more work on it.

We can agree about the utmost importance of the channel tunnel high-speed link to areas outside London, particularly the north and Scotland. I can confirm to the hon. Gentleman that, if we go for the option of St. Pancras, it will have no detrimental effect on the speed with which we can get direct services through to the north and Scotland. I recognise the importance of that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I shall not hesitate to intervene if Members make statements or long comments. This is question time, so brisk questions and answers, please.

Sir Keith Speed (Ashford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I very much welcome his statement about Ashford international station? Will he give an undertaking that the work will start as quickly as possible, because time is now of the essence? My constituents do not share his optimism about the route itself. Will the consultation process be a real one, so that people in my area can argue for the original safeguarded route if they so wish?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I know how hard and strongly he has pressed for the Ashford international passenger station. I am therefore extremely glad to have been able to make a statement about it today. I know that he has worked closely with the chairman of planning and transportation of Kent county council, Mr. Bruce Lockhart, and I recognise the strength of their case in respect of that station and the benefits that it will bring to Kent commuters. We have taken those benefits into account. I hope that the work will proceed very quickly.

As to consultation, I can assure my hon. Friend that it will be possible for those who still prefer the existing route to make their case. I think that there are many advantages in the new route, because the environmental assessment is superior, fewer properties are affected, and, of course, it is less expensive. We concentrated as much on the property and environmental aspects as on the cost, and they led me to believe that that was the preferred route.

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): Is it not true that the United Kingdom has wasted the six years since the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 was enacted—in stark contrast, whatever the Minister may say, to the French? Have we not wasted taxpayers' money on the south London route and the King's Cross option? Is not this statement about cutting costs? Is the Minister's timetable credible if public consultation must be followed by a hybrid Bill and a five-year engineering project? Whatever The Sun may have said about the Budget, is the Minister sure that it is wise for the route to go through the editor's golf club?

Mr. MacGregor: On the hon. Gentleman's last point, it is inevitable that such a controversial and difficult issue will adversely affect some areas. I hope that it would be prefectly possible to move that clubhouse were it to be affected by the route.

The hon. Gentleman must recognise, as I have certainly recognised during my time as Secretary of State for Transport, that this is one of the most controversial and difficult projects to be undertaken. I entirely reject the hon. Gentleman's accusations about cheapness. Not only is the project massively expensive, but it affects very large numbers of people and businesses, and will have a big environmental impact. We could scarcely have chosen a part of the country that would present more difficulties, but we had no other choice. It was inevitable that it would take time to resolve such problems, and that the process would be controversial. It was important to get the best answer, which is what we have ultimately achieved.

On procedure, I think that the hybrid Bill is the quickest way to proceed with the legislation, and I hope that we shall have the hon. Gentleman's co-operation in getting it through as quickly as possible.

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway): My constituents will be pleased that my right hon. Friend took to heart the Ove Arup route over the Medway. Has the European Community done its environmental assessment? Will we receive any money from the EC for the important Euro-link, which will serve the rest of the country and, in doing so, present great environmental difficulties for Kent?

Mr. MacGregor: I recognise the environmental affects, to which we paid particular attention. I stress to my hon. Friend—to whom I am grateful for her remarks—that great attention was paid to environmental aspects in the report of the Union Railways, which was assisted by 12 environmental consultancies. Very shortly—early next month—they will publish their environmental report as an appendix to the Union Railways report that I am placing in the Vote Office today. There will be an opportunity to conduct the full environmental impact assessment as we move beyond the consultation stage. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall give as much attention as possible to—and meet all our European commitments on—tackling the environmental assessments.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Will the Secretary of State assure us that there will be an international passenger station at Stratford? He will know that he has the full-hearted support of the London borough of Newham for the eastern route. Would it not be a betrayal of that support if there were to be no international station at Stratford?

Mr. MacGregor: When the hon. Gentleman looks at the Union Railways report he will see that it lists a number of options, both for international stations and domestic stations to serve commuter lines. We have decided that at this stage it would not be right for us to declare preferred stations. We shall listen carefully to the responses to the public consultation on stations and to those from possible promoters and developers before taking final decisions. Clearly, Stratford is one option.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I do not think that I heard my right hon. Friend mention the word "freight". Is he aware how very keen Kent county council and all the people in Kent are for a severely diminution in the number of lorry movements through Kent? Will he assure us that Union Railways, which is to become a private company, is sufficiently objective in its proposals to give independent advice to the Government, or will the Government ensure that it takes charge of the consultation process?

Mr. MacGregor: Clearly, we shall be heavily involved in the consultation process. The Government will introduce the hybrid Bill, so they will clearly be in the lead. It was entirely right that Union Railways, with the aid of its consultants, should conduct the study which I asked it to carry out. One of the benefits of the high-speed rail link is that it will enable additional freight to use it. As I asked, the report covers the two loops in the line. The main benefit will come from the fact that the high-speed rail link will release existing railways so that they can take more freight traffic, and the potential will exist for much more freight to go by rail.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): As the only Opposition Member of Parliament for Kent or Essex, can I ask the Secretary of State whether he is aware that his announcement will be greeted with great anger and dismay among people in those counties? How on earth can people have confidence in the consultation that he proposes if, as he has said, it is led by Union Railways? Will not Union Railways be judge and advocate in its own court?

Were we not reassured by the Secretary of State's predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), that there had been widespread consultation when he made the historic announcement about the route at the Conservative party conference in October 1991? What has gone wrong since then? What confidence can anyone in Kent or Essex have in a Government choosing a route that suits them politically instead of maximising the opportunities offered by the channel tunnel in the best transport interests of the United Kingdom?

Mr. MacGregor: If the hon. Gentleman is the only Opposition Member from Kent or Essex to be affected by the route, I must tell him that he has not made a good fist of it today: he is wrong on every point. The fact is that I will ultimately take the decisions on the route, just as I have made the announcement about the preferred route today. Union Railways studied all the options, and on that basis we made the decision about the preferred route.

Kent commuters will benefit greatly from the reductions in times—some of them are dramatic. In parts of Kent suffering from high unemployment, there will also be benefits in the form of regeneration. My announcement of the international passenger station at Ashford ensures that Kent benefits from the link. In Essex and east London there can be no doubt that the route that we have chosen, which the hon. Gentleman seemed to criticise, will greatly help the regeneration of the east Thames corridor.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his announcement today is warmly welcomed by my constituents and by me, especially in view of his decision to introduce a tunnel under Blue Bell hill, which represents a substantial environmental improvement on the previous scheme? Can he give me an assurance, however, that there will be no return to a mid-Kent parkway station in the northern part of the parish of Aylesford, as previously proposed? Can he give me a further assurance that the gradient of the new line will be such as to permit the heaviest and longest international freight trains to travel on it?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, the line will be able to take the heaviest and longest international freight trains, although long trains of more than 1,000 tonnes may sometimes need two locomotives—but that is not a great bar. I can give my right hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks about the station at Kit's Coty. I am also most grateful for my right hon. Friend's first remarks. It seemed to us important in taking the decision about the Medway valley that the original proposal would have involved substantial environmental disbenefits, which is why we have gone for these proposals.

Ms Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): Will the Secretary of State accept that the people of south London, in my constituency particularly, will welcome his announcement that the southerly route is dead and buried? They will be far less happy, however, with his subsequent statement that there will be an increase in freight traffic along south London lines. Will he publish the changes that he expects in freight traffic? Will he look at the environmental impact and then do something about it? Furthermore, will he tell us exactly when he will be able to announce what will happen to the Thameslink services, which are crucial to transport movements in south London, and which are needed to compensate for the difficulties in our road network?

Mr. MacGregor: I have noted what the hon. Lady says about the freight impact on south London. It is rather early to be able to conduct any proper study of that, but I take note of what she said. We are, after all, talking about events into the next decade.

As for Thameslink, today's announcement was about the channel tunnel high speed rail link. It will remain possible, in the study that I am asking Union Railways to do of the St. Pancras and King's Cross options, if so desired, to take forward Thameslink 2000—in its currently planned or in a revised form—but that will depend on decisions to be taken later involving all sorts of implications. Meanwhile, I am asking Union Railways to take that into account in its further work.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Will the Secretary of State confirm that one of the reasons why a statement was not made last Wednesday was that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) was busy filming for the popular television programme "Through the Keyhole"?
